HISTORICAL

Bender 133
THERE are very few states in the Union that have a more varied and a more interesting history than California; and there are few if any whose history is so vaguely and so indefinitely known. This is largely due to the fact that its colonization was effected by one race and its evolution as a state by another.

In the rapid development of the state by the conquering race, the trials and struggles of the first colonists have been forgotten. No forefathers' day keeps their memory green, and no observance celebrates the anniversary of their landing. To many of its people, the history of California begins with the discovery of gold, and all behind that is regarded of little importance. The race characteristics of the two peoples who have dominated California differ widely; and from this divergence arises the lack of sympathetic unison. Perhaps no better expression for this difference can be given than is found in popular bywords of each. The "poco tiempo" (by and by) of the Spaniard is significant of a people who are willing to wait—who would rather defer till mañana—to-morrow—than hurry to-day. The "go ahead" of the American is indicative of haste, of rush, of a strenuous struggle to overcome obstacles, whatever they may be, in the present.

In narrating the story of California, I have endeavored to deal justly with the different eras and episodes of its history; to state facts; to tell the truth without favoritism or prejudice; to give credit where credit is due and blame where it is deserved. In the preparation of this history I have tried to make it readable. I have avoided dull details and have omitted cumbrous statistics.

The subject has been presented by topic, observing so far as possible the chronological order of the events. In collecting material for this work, I have visited all the large libraries of the state, have consulted state and county archives, and have scanned thousands of pages of newspapers and magazines. Where extracts have been made, due credit has been given in the body of the work. I have received valuable assistance from librarians, from pioneers of the state, from editors and others. To all who have assisted me, I return my sincere thanks.

J. M. GUINN.

BIOGRAPHICAL

THE high standing of the San Joaquin Valley is due not alone to ideal climate and rare beauty of scenery. Other regions boasting an environment as attractive, have nevertheless remained unknown to the great world of commerce and of thought. When we study the progress made in this section of our country, especially during the past two decades of the nineteenth century and the opening years of the twentieth century, we are led to the conclusion that the present gratifying condition is due to the enterprise of public-spirited citizens. They have not only developed commercial possibilities and horticultural resources, but they have also maintained a commendable interest in public affairs, and have given to their commonwealth some of its ablest statesmen. The prosperity of the past has been gratifying; and, with the building of the canal to connect the Atlantic and the Pacific, with the increasing of railroad facilities, with the further development of local resources, there is every reason to believe that the twentieth century will witness the most marvelous growth this region has ever made.

In the compilation of this work and the securing of necessary data, a number of writers have been engaged for months. They have visited leading citizens and used every endeavor to produce a work accurate and trustworthy in every detail. Owing to the great care exercised, and to the fact that every opportunity was given to those represented to secure accuracy in their biographies, the publishers believe they are giving to their readers a volume containing few errors of consequence. The biographies of a number of representative citizens will be missed from the work. In some instances this was caused by their absence from home when our writers called, and in some instances was caused by a failure on the part of the men themselves to understand the scope of the work. The publishers, however, have done all within their power to make this work a representative one.

The value of the data herein presented will grow with the passing years. Posterity will preserve the volume with care, from the fact that it perpetuates biographical history that otherwise would be wholly lost. In those now far-distant days will be realized, to a greater extent than at the present time, the truth of Macauley's statement, "The history of a country is best told in the lives of its people."

CHAPTER I.

SPANISH EXPLORATIONS AND DISCOVERIES.

FOR centuries there had been a vague tradition of a land lying somewhere in the seemingly limitless expanse of ocean stretching westward from the shores of Europe. The poetical fancy of the Greeks had located in it the Garden of Hesperides, where grew the Golden Apples. The myths and superstitions of the middle ages had peopled it with gorgons and demons and made it the abode of lost souls.

When Columbus proved the existence of a new world beyond the Atlantic, his discovery did not altogether dispel the mysteries and superstitions that for ages had enshrouded the fabled Atlantis, the lost continent of the Hesperides. Romance and credulity had much to do with hastening the exploration of the newly discovered western world. Its interior might hold wonderful possibilities for wealth, fame and conquest to the adventurers who should penetrate its dark unknown. The dimly told traditions of the natives were translated to fit the cupidity or the credulity of adventurers, and sometimes served to promote enterprises that produced results far different from those originally intended.

The fabled fountain of youth lured Ponce de Leon over many a league in the wilds of Florida; and although he found no spring spouting forth the elixir of life, he explored a rich and fertile country, in which the Spaniards planted the first settlement ever made within the territory now held by the United States. The legend of El Dorado, the gilded man of the golden lake, stimulated adventurers to brave the horrors of the miasmatic forests of the Amazon and the Orinoco; and the search for that gold-covered hombre hastened, perhaps, by a hundred years, the exploration of the tropical regions of South America. Although the myth of Quivira that sent Coronado wandering over desert, mountain and plain, far into the interior of North America, and his quest for the seven cities of Cibola, that a romancing monk, Marcos de Niza, "led by the Holy Ghost," imagined he saw in the wilds of Pimeria, brought neither wealth nor pride of conquest to that adventurous explorer, yet these myths were the indirect cause of giving to the world an early knowledge of the vast regions to the north of Mexico.

When Cortés' lieutenant, Gonzalo de Sandoval, gave his superior officer an account of a wonderful island ten days westward from the Pacific coast of Mexico, inhabited by women only, and exceedingly rich in pearls and gold, although he no doubt derived his story from Montalvo's romance, "The Sergias of Esplandian," a popular novel of that day, yet Cortés seems to have given credence to his subordinate's tale, and kept in view the conquest of the island.

To the energy, the enterprise and the genius of Hernan Cortés is due the early exploration of the northwest coast of North America. In 1522, eighty-five years before the English planted their first colony in America, and nearly a century before the landing of the Pilgrims on Plymouth rock, Cortés had established a shipyard at Zacatula, the most northern port on the Pacific coast of the country that he had just conquered. Here he intended to build ships to explore the upper coast of the South Sea (as the Pacific Ocean was then called), but his good fortune, that had hitherto given success to his undertakings, seemed to have deserted him, and disaster followed disaster. His warehouse, filled with material for shipbuilding, that with great labor and expense had been packed on muleback from Vera Cruz, took fire and all was destroyed. It required years to accumulate another supply. He finally, in 1527, succeeded in launching four ships. Three of these were taken possession of by the king's orders for service in the East Indies. The fourth and the smallest made a short voyage up the coast. The commander, Maldonado, returned with glowing reports of a rich country he had discovered. He imagined he had seen evidence of the existence of gold and silver, but he brought none with him.

In 1528 Cortés was unjustly deprived of the government of the country he had conquered. His successor, Nuno de Guzman, president of the royal audiencia, as the new form of government for New Spain (Mexico) was called, had pursued him for years with the malignity of a demon. Cortés returned to Spain to defend himself against the rancorous and malignant charges of his enemies. He was received at court with a show of high honors, but which in reality were hollow professions of friendship and insincere expressions of esteem. He was rewarded by the bestowal of an empty title. He was empowered to conquer and colonize countries at his own expense, for which he was to receive the twelfth part of the revenue. Cortés returned to Mexico and in 1532 he had two ships fitted out, which sailed from Acapulco, in June of that year, up the coast of Jalisco. Portions of the crews of each vessel mutinied. The mutineers were put aboard of the vessel commanded by Mazuela and the other vessels, commanded by Hurtado, continued the voyage as far as the Yaqui country. Here, having landed in search of provisions, the natives massacred the commander and all the crew. The crew of the other vessel shared the same fate lower down the coast. The stranded vessel was afterwards plundered and dismantled by Nuno de Guzman, who was about as much of a savage as the predatory and murderous natives.

In 1533 Cortés, undismayed by his disasters, fitted out two more ships for the exploration of the northern coast of Mexico. On board one of these ships, commanded by Bercerra de Mendoza, the crew, headed by the chief pilot, Jiminez, mutinied. Mendoza was killed and all who would not join the mutineers were forced to go ashore on the coast of Jalisco. The mutineers, to escape punishment by the authorities, under the command of the pilot, Fortuno Jiminez, sailed westerly away from the coast of the main land. After several days' sailing out of sight of land, they discovered what they supposed to be an island. They landed at a place now known as La Paz, Lower California. Here Jiminez and twenty of his confederates were killed by the Indians, or their fellow mutineers, it is uncertain which. The survivors of the ill-fated expedition managed to navigate the vessel back to Jalisco, where they reported the discovery of an island rich in gold and pearls. This fabrication doubtlessly saved their necks. There is no record of their punishment for mutiny. Cortés' other ship accomplished even less than the one captured by the mutineers. Grixalvo, the commander of this vessel, discovered a desolate island, forty leagues south of Cape San Lucas, which he named Santo Tomas. But the discovery that should immortalize Grixalvo, and place him in the category with the romancing Monk, de Niza and Sandoval of the Amazonian isle, was the seeing of a merman. It swam about the ship for a long time, playing antics like a monkey for the amusement of the sailors, washing its face with its hands, combing its hair with its fingers; at last, frightened by a sea bird, it disappeared.

Cortés, having heard of Jiminez's discovery, and possibly believing it to be Sandoval's isle of the Amazons, rich with gold and pearls, set about building more ships for exploration and for the colonization of the island. He ordered the building of three ships at Tehauntepec. The royal audiencia having failed to give him any redress or protection against his enemy, Nuno de Guzman, he determined to punish him himself. Collecting a considerable force of cavaliers and soldiers, he marched to Chiametla. There he found his vessel, La Concepcion, lying on her beam ends, a wreck, and plundered of everything of value. He failed to find Guzman, that worthy having taken a hasty departure before his arrival. His ships having come up from Tehautepec, he embarked as many soldiers and settlers as his vessels would carry, and sailed away for Jimenez's island. May 3, 1535, he landed at the port where Jimenez and his fellow mutineers were killed, which he named Santa Cruz. The colonists were landed on the supposed island and the ships were sent back to Chiametla for the remainder of the settlers. His usual ill luck followed him. The vessels became separated on the gulf in a storm and the smaller of the three returned to Santa Cruz. Embarking in it, Cortés set sail to find his missing ships. He found them at the port of Guaya-bal, one loaded with provisions, the other dismantled and run ashore. Its sailors had deserted and those of the other ship were about to follow. Cortés stopped this, took command of the vessels and had them repaired. When the repairs were completed he set sail for his colony. But misfortune followed him. His chief pilot was killed by the falling of a spar when scarce out of sight of land. Cortés took command of the vessels himself. Then the ships encountered a terrific storm that threatened their destruction. Finally they reached their destination, Santa Cruz. There again misfortune awaited him. The colonists could obtain no sustenance from the barren soil of the desolate island. Their provisions exhausted, some of them died of starvation and the others killed themselves by over-eating when relief came.

Cortés, finding the interior of the supposed island as desolate and forbidding as the coast, and the native inhabitants degraded and brutal savages, without houses or clothing, living on vermin, insects and the scant products of the sterile land, determined to abandon his colonization scheme. Gathering together the wretched survivors of his colony, he embarked them on his ships and in the early part of 1537 landed them in the port of Acapulco.

At some time between 1535 and 1537 the name California was applied to the supposed island, but whether applied by Cortés to encourage his disappointed colonists, or whether given by them in derision, is an unsettled question. The name itself is derived from a Spanish romance, the "Sergas de Esplandian," written by Ordenez de Montalvo and published in Seville, Spain, about the year 1510. The passage in which the name California occurs is as follows: "Know that on the right hand of the Indies there is an island called California, very near the terrestrial paradise, which was peopled with black women, without any men among them, because they were accustomed to live after the fashion of Amazons. They were of strong and hardened bodies, of ardent courage and great force. The island was the strongest in the world from its steep rocks and great cliffs. Their arms were all of gold and so were the caparison of the wild beasts which they rode, after having trained them, for in all the island there is no other metal." The "steep rocks and great cliffs" of Jimenez's island may have suggested to Cortés or to his colonists some fancied resemblance to the California of Montalvo's romance, but there was no other similarity.

For years Cortés had been fitting out expeditions by land and sea to explore the unknown regions northward of that portion of Mexico which he had conquered, but disaster after disaster had wrecked his hopes and impoverished his purse. The last expedition sent out by him was one commanded by Francisco Ulloa, who, in 1539, with two ships, sailed up the Gulf of California, or Sea of Cortés, on the Sonora side, to its head. Thence he proceeded down the inner coast of Lower California to the cape at its southern extremity, which he doubled, and then sailed up the outer coast to Cabo del Engano, the "Cape of Deceit." Failing to make any progress against the head winds, April 5, 1540, the two ships parted company in a storm. The smaller one, the Santa Agueda, returned safely to Santiago. The larger, La Trinidad, after vainly endeavoring to continue the voyage, turned back. The fate of Ulloa and of the vessel too, is uncertain. One authority says he was assassinated after reaching the coast of Jalisco by one of his soldiers, who, for some trivial cause, stabbed him to death; another account says that nothing is known of his fate, nor is it certainly known whether his vessel ever returned. The only thing accomplished by this voyage was to demonstrate that Lower California was a peninsula. Even this fact, although proved by Ulloa's voyage, was not fully admitted by geographers until two centuries later.

In 1540 Cortes returned to Spain to obtain, if possible, some recognition and recompense from the king for his valuable services. His declining years had been filled with bitter disappointments. Shipwreck and mutiny at sea; disaster and defeat to his forces on land; the treachery of his subordinates and the jealousy of royal officials continually thwarted his plans and wasted his substance. After expending nearly a million dollars in explorations, conquests and attempts at colonization, fretted and worried by the indifference and the ingratitude of a monarch for whom he had sacrificed so much, disappointed, disheartened, impoverished, he died at an obscure hamlet near Seville, Spain, in December, 1547.

The next exploration that had something to do with the discovery of California was that of Hernando de Alarcon. With two ships he sailed from Acapulco, May 9, 1540, up the Gulf of California. His object was to co-operate with the expedition of Coronado. Coronado, with an army of four hundred men, had marched from Culiacan, April 22, 1540, to conquer the seven cities of Cibola. In the early part of 1537 Alvaro Nunez Cabaza de Vaca and three companions (the only survivors of six hundred men that Panfilo de Narvaes, ten years before, had landed in Florida for the conquest of that province) after almost incredible sufferings and hardships arrived in Culiacan on the Pacific coast. On their long journey passing from one Indian tribe to another they had seen many wondrous things and had heard of many more. Among others they had been told of seven great cities in a country called Cibola that were rich in gold and silver and precious stones.

A Franciscan friar, Marcos de Niza, having heard their wonderful stories determined to find the seven cities. Securing the service of Estevanico, a negro slave, who was one of Cabeza de Vaca's party, he set out in quest of the cities. With a number of Indian porters and Estevanico as a guide, he traveled northward a hundred leagues when he came to a desert that took four days to cross. Beyond this he found natives who told him of people four days further away who had gold in abundance. He sent the negro to investigate and that individual sent back word that Cibola was yet thirty days' journey to the northward. Following the trail of his guide, Niza travelled for two weeks crossing several deserts. The stories of the magnificence of the seven cities increased with every tribe of Indians through whose country he passed. At length, when almost to the promised land, a messenger brought the sad tidings that Estevanico had been put to death with all of his companions but two by the inhabitants of Cibola. To go forward meant death to the monk and all his party, but before turning back he climbed a high mountain and looked down upon the seven cities with their high houses and teeming populations thronging their streets. Then he returned to Culiacan to tell his wonderful stories. His tales fired the ambition and stimulated the avarice of a horde of adventurers. At the head of four hundred of these Coronado penetrated the wilds of Pimeria (now Arizona). He found seven Indian towns but no lofty houses, no great cities, no gold or silver. Cibola was a myth. Hearing of a country called Quivira far to the north, richer than Cibola, with part of his force he set out to find it. In his search he penetrated inland as far as the plains of Kansas, but Quivira proved to be as poor as Cibola, and Coronado returned disgusted. The Friar de Niza had evidently drawn on his imagination which seemed to be quite rich in cities.

Alarcon reached the head of the Gulf of California. Seeing what he supposed to be an inlet, but the water proving too shallow for his ships to enter it, he manned two boats and found his supposed inlet to be the mouth of a great river. He named it Buena Guia (Good Guide) now the Colorado. He sailed up it some distance and was probably the first white man to set foot upon the soil of Upper California. He heard of Coronado in the interior but was unable to establish communication with him. He descended the river in his boats, embarked on his vessels and returned to Mexico. The Viceroy Mendoza, who had fitted out the expedition of Alarcon, was bitterly disappointed on the return of that explorer. He had hoped to find the ships loaded with the spoils of the seven cities.

The report of the discovery of a great river did not interest his sordid soul. Alarcon found himself a disgraced man. He retired to private life and not long after died a broken hearted man.

CHAPTER II.

ALTA OR NUEVA CALIFORNIA.

WHILE Coronado was still wandering in the interior of the continent searching for Quivira and its king, Tatarax, who wore a long beard, adored a golden cross and worshipped an image of the queen of heaven, Pedro de Alvarado, one of Cortés' former lieutenants, arrived from Guatemala, of which country he was governor, with a fleet of twelve ships. These were anchored in the harbor of Navidad. Mendoza, the viceroy, had been intriguing with Alvarado against Cortés; obtaining an interest in the fleet, he and Alvarado began preparations for an extensive scheme of exploration and conquest. Before they had perfected their plans an insurrection broke out among the Indians of Jalisco, and Pedro de Alvarado in attempting to quell it was killed. Mendoza fell heir to the fleet. The return of Coronado about this time dispelled the popular beliefs in Cibola and Quivira and put an end to further explorations of the inland regions of the northwest.

It became necessary for Mendoza to find something for his fleet to do. The Islas de Poiniente, or Isles of the Setting Sun (now the Philippines), had been discovered by Magellan. To these Mendoza dispatched five ships of the fleet under command of Lopez de Villalobos to establish trade with the natives. Two ships of the fleet, the San Salvador and the Vitoria, were placed under the command of Juan Rodriguez Cabrillo, reputed to be a Portuguese by birth and dispatched to explore the northwest coast of the Pacific. Cabrillo sailed from Navidad, June 27, 1542. Rounding the southern extremity of the peninsula of Lower California, he sailed up its outer coast. August 20 he reached Cabo del Engano, the most northerly point of Ulloa's exploration. On the 28th of September, 1542, he entered a bay which he named San Miguel (now San Diego), where he found "a land locked and very good harbor." He remained in this harbor until October 3. Continuing his voyage he sailed along the coast eighteen leagues, discovering two islands about seven leagues from the main land. These he named San Salvador and Vitoria after his ships (now Santa Catalina and San Clemente). On the 8th of October he crossed the channel between the islands and main land and anchored in a bay which he named Bahia de los Fumos y Fuegos, the Bay of Smokes and Fires (now known as the Bay of San Pedro). Heavy clouds of smoke hung over the headlands of the coast; and inland, fierce fires were raging. The Indians either through accident or design had set fire to the long dry grass that covered the plains at this season of the year.

After sailing six leagues further up the coast he anchored in a large ensenada or bight, now the Bay of Santa Monica. It is uncertain whether he landed at either place. The next day he sailed eight leagues to an Indian town which he named the Pueblo de las Canoas (the town of Canoes). This town was located on or near the present site of San Buenaventura. Sailing northwestward he passed through the Santa Barbara Channel, discovering the islands of Santa Cruz, Santa Rosa and San Miguel. Continuing up the coast he passed a long narrow point of land extending into the sea, which from its resemblance to a galley boat he named Cabo de la Galera, the Cape of the Galley (now called Point Concepcion). Baffled by head winds, the explorers slowly beat their way up the coast. On the 17th of November, they cast anchor in a large bay which they named Bahia de los Pinos, the Bay of Pines (now the Bay of Monterey). Finding it impossible to land on account of the heavy sea Cabrillo continued his voyage northward. After reaching a point on the coast in 40 degrees north latitude, according to his reckoning, the increasing cold and the storms becoming more frequent, he turned back and ran down the coast to the island of San Miguel, which he reached November 23. Here he decided to winter.

While on the island in October, he had broken his arm by a fall. Suffering from his broken arm he had continued in command. Exposure and unskillful surgery caused his death. He died January 3, 1543, and was buried on the island. His last resting place is supposed to be on the shore of Cuyler's harbor, on the island of San Miguel. No trace of his grave has ever been found. His companions named the island Juan Rodriguez, but he has been robbed of even this slight tribute to his memory. It would be a slight token of regard if the state would name the island Cabrillo. Saint Miguel has been well remembered in California and could spare an island.

Cabrillo on his death bed urged his successor in command, the pilot Bartolome Ferrollo, to continue the exploration. Ferrollo prosecuted the voyage of discovery with a courage and daring equal to that of Cabrillo. About the middle of February he left the harbor where he had spent most of the winter and after having made a short voyage in search of more islands he sailed up the coast. February 28, he discovered a cape which he named Mendocino in honor of the viceroy, a name it still bears. Passing the cape he encountered a fierce storm which drove him violently to the northeast, greatly endangering his ships. On March 1st, the fog partially lifting, he discovered a cape which he named Blanco, in the southern part of what is now the state of Oregon. The weather continuing stormy and the cold increasing as he sailed northward, Ferrollo reluctantly turned back. Running down the coast he reached the island of San Clemente. There in a storm the ships parted company and Ferrollo, after a search, gave up the Vitoria as lost. The ships, however, came together at Cerros island and from there, in sore distress for provisions, the explorers reached Navidad April 18, 1543. On the discoveries made by Cabrillo and Ferrollo the Spaniards claimed the territory on the Pacific coast of North America up to the forty-second degree of north latitude, a claim that they maintained for three hundred years.

The next navigator who visited California was Francis Drake, an Englishman. He was not seeking new lands, but a way to escape the vengeance of the Spaniards. Francis Drake, the "Sea King of Devon," was one of the bravest men that ever lived. Early in his maritime life he had suffered from the cruelty and injustice of the Spaniards. Throughout his subsequent career, which reads more like romance than reality, he let no opportunity slip to punish his old-time enemies. It mattered little to Drake whether his country was at peace or war with Spain; he considered a Spanish ship or a Spanish town his legitimate prey. On one of his predatory expeditions he captured a Spanish town on the isthmus of Panama named El Nombre de Dios, The Name of God. Its holy name did not protect it from Drake's rapacity. While on the isthmus he obtained information of the Spanish settlements of the South Pacific and from a high point of land saw the South sea, as the Pacific ocean was then called. On his return to England he announced his intention of fitting out a privateering expedition against the Spaniards of the South Pacific. Although Spain and England were at peace, he received encouragement from the nobility, even Queen Elizabeth herself secretly contributing a thousand crown towards the venture.

Drake sailed out of Plymouth harbor, England, December 13, 1577, in command of a fleet of five small vessels, bound for the Pacific coast of South America. Some of his vessels were lost at sea and others turned back, until when he emerged from the Straits of Magellan he had but one left, the Pelican. He changed its name to the Golden Hind. It was a ship of only one hundred tons' burden. Sailing up the South Pacific coast, he spread terror and devastation among the Spanish settlements, robbing towns and capturing ships until, in the quaint language of a chronicler of the expedition, he "had loaded his vessel with a fabulous amount of fine wares of Asia, precious stones, church ornaments, gold plate and so mooch silver as did ballas the Goulden Hinde."

From one treasure ship, the Caca Fuego, he obtained thirteen chests of silver, eighty pounds weight of gold, twenty-six tons of uncoined silver, two silver drinking vessels, precious stones and a quantity of jewels; the total value of his prize amounted to three hundred and sixty thousand pesos (dollars). Having spoiled the Spaniards of treasure amounting to "eight hundred sixty-six thousand pesos of silver * * * a hundred thousand pesos of gold * * * and other things of great worth, he thought it not good to return by the streight (Magellan) * * * least the Spaniards should there waite and attend for him in great numbers and strength, whose hands, he being left but one ship, he could not possibly escape."

Surfeited with spoils and his ship loaded with plunder, it became necessary for him to find the shortest and safest route home. To return by the way he came was to invite certain destruction to his ship and death to all on board. At an island off the coast of Nicaragua he overhauled and refitted his ship. He determined to seek the Straits of Anian that were believed to connect the Atlantic and Pacific oceans. Striking boldly out on an unknown sea, he sailed more than a thousand leagues northward. Encountering contrary winds and the cold increasing as he advanced, he gave up his search for the mythical straits, and, turning, he ran down the northwest coast of North America to latitude 38°, where "hee found a harborrow for his ship." He anchored in it June 17, 1579. This "convenient and fit harborrow" is under the lee of Point Reyes and is now known as Sir Francis Drake's Bay.

Fletcher, the chronicler of Drake's voyage, in his narrative, "The World Encompassed," says: "The 3rd day following, viz., the 21st, our ship having received a leake at sea was brought to anchor neerer the shoare that her goods being landed she might be repaired; but for that we were to prevent any danger that might chance against our safety our Generall first of all landed his men with necessary provision to build tents and make a fort for defense of ourselves and goods; and that we might under the shelter of it with more safety (whatsoever should befall) end our business."

The ship was drawn upon the beach, careened on its side, caulked and refitted. While the crew were repairing the ship the natives visited them in great numbers. From some of their actions Drake inferred that they regarded himself and his men as gods. To disabuse them of this idea, Drake ordered his chaplain, Fletcher, to perform divine service according to the English Church Ritual and preach a sermon. The Indians were greatly delighted with the psalm singing, but their opinion of Fletcher's sermon is not known.

From certain ceremonial performance Drake imagined that the Indians were offering him the sovereignty of their land and themselves as subjects of the English crown. Drake gladly accepted their proffered allegiance and formally took possession of the country in the name of the English sovereign, Queen Elizabeth. He named it New Albion, "for two causes: the one in respect of the white bankes and cliffs which ly towards the sea; and the other because it might have some affinitie with our own country in name which sometimes was so called."

Having completed the repairs to his ship, Drake made ready to depart, but before leaving "Our Generall with his company made a journey up into the land. The inland we found to be farre different from the shoare; a goodly country and fruitful soyle, stored with many blessings fit for the use of man; infinite was the company of very large and fat deere which there we saw by thousands as we supposed in a heard."* They saw great numbers of small burrowing animals, which they called conies, but which were probably ground squirrels. Before departing, Drake set up a monument to show that he had taken possession of the country. To a large post firmly set in the ground he nailed a brass plate on which was engraved the name of the English Queen, the date of his arrival and the statement that the king and people of the country had voluntarily become vassals of the English crown; a new sixpence was fastened to the plate to show the Queen's likeness.

*World Encompassed.

After a stay of thirty-six days, Drake took his departure, much to the regret of the Indians. He stopped at the Farallones islands for a short time to lay in a supply of seal meat; then he sailed for England by the way of the Cape of Good Hope. After encountering many perils, he arrived safely at Plymouth, the port from which he sailed nearly three years before, having "encompassed" or circumnavigated the globe. His exploits and the booty he brought back made him the most famous naval hero of his time. He was knighted by Queen Elizabeth and accorded extraordinary honors by the nation. He believed himself to be the first discoverer of the country he called New Albion. "The Spaniards never had any dealings or so much as set foote in this country; the utmost of their discoveries reaching only to many degrees southward of this place."* The English founded no claim on Drake's discoveries. The land hunger that characterizes that nation now had not then been developed.

Fifty years passed after Cabrillo's visit to California before another attempt was made by the Spaniards to explore her coast. Through all these years on their return voyage far out beyond the islands the Manila galleons, freighted with the wealth of "Ormus and Ind," sailed down the coast of Las Californias from Cape Mendocino to Acapulco. Often storm-tossed and always scourged with that dread malady of the sea, the scurvy, there was no harbor of refuge for them to put into because his most Catholic Majesty, the King of Spain, had no money to spend in exploring an unknown coast where there was no return to be expected except perhaps the saving of a few sailors' lives.

In 1593, the question of a survey of the California coast for harbors to accommodate the increasing Philippine trade was agitated and Don Luis de Velasco, viceroy of New Spain, in a letter dated at Mexico, April 8, 1593, thus writes to his majesty: "In order to make the exploration or demarcation of the harbors of this main as far as the Philippine islands, as your majesty orders, money is lacking, and if it be not taken from the royal strong box it cannot be supplied, as for some time past a great deal of money has been owing to the royal treasury on account of fines forfeited to it, legal cost and the like." Don Luis fortunately discovers a way to save the contents of the royal strong box and hastens to acquaint his majesty with his plan. In a letter written to the king from the City of Mexico, April 6, 1594, he says: "I ordered the navigator who at present sails in the flag ship, who is named Sebastian Rodriguez Cermeño, and who is a man of experience in his calling, one who can be depended upon and who has means of his own, although he is a Portuguese, there being no Spaniards of his profession whose services are available, that he should make the exploration and demarcation, and I offered, if he would do this, to give him his remuneration in the way of taking on board merchandise; and I wrote to the governor (of the Philippines) that he should allow him to put on board the ship some tons of cloth that he might have the benefit of the freight-money." The result of Don Luis's economy and the outcome of attempting to explore an unknown coast in a heavily laden merchant ship are given in a paragraph taken from a letter written by a royal officer from Acapulco, February 1, 1596, to the viceroy Conde de Monterey, the successor of Velasco: "On Wednesday, the 31st of January of this year, there entered this harbor a vessel of the kind called in the Philippines a viroco, having on board Juan de Morgana, navigating officer, four Spanish sailors, five Indians and a negro, who brought tidings that the ship San Agustin, of the exploring expedition, had been lost on a coast where she struck and went to pieces, and that a barefooted friar and another person of those on board had been drowned and that the seventy men or more who embarked in this small vessel only these came in her, because the captain of said ship, Sebastian Rodriguez Cermeño, and the others went ashore at the port of Navidad, and, as they understand, have already arrived in that city (Mexico). An account of the voyage and of the loss of the ship, together with the statement made under oath by said navigating officer, Juan de Morgana, accompany this. We visited officially the vessel, finding no kind of merchandise on board, and that the men were almost naked. The vessel being so small it seems miraculous that she should have reached this country with so many people on board." A viroco was a small vessel without a deck, having one or two square sails, and propelled by sweeps. Its hull was formed from a single tree, hollowed out and having the sides built up with planks. The San Agustin was wrecked in what is now called Francis Drake's Bay, about thirty miles north of San Francisco. To make a voyage from there to Acapulco in such a vessel, with seventy men on board, and live to tell the tale, was an exploit that exceeded the most hazardous undertakings of the Argonauts of '49.

The viceroy, Conde de Monte Rey, in a letter dated at Mexico, April 19, 1596, gives the king tidings of the loss of the San Agustin. He writes: "Touching the loss of the ship, San Agustin, which was on its way from the islands of the west (the Philippines) for the purpose of making the exploration of the coast of the South Sea, in accordance with your Majesty's orders to Viceroy, Don Luis de Velasco, I wrote to Your Majesty by the second packet (mailship) what I send as duplicate with this." He then goes on to tell how he had examined the officers in regard to the loss of the vessel and that they tried to inculpate one another. The navigating officer even in the viroco tried to explore the principal bays which they crossed, but on account of the hunger and illness they experienced he was compelled to hasten the voyage. The viceroy concludes: "Thus I take it, as to this exploration the intention of Your Majesty has not been carried into effect. It is the general opinion that this enterprise should not be attempted on the return voyage from the islands and with a laden ship, but from this coast and by constantly following along it." The above account of the loss of the San Agustin is taken from Volume II, Publications of the Historical Society of Southern California, and is the only correct account published. In September, 1595, just before the viceroy, Don Luis de Velasco, was superseded by Conde de Monte Rey, he entered into a contract with certain parties of whom Sebastian Viscaino, a ship captain, was the principal, to make an expedition up the Gulf of California "for the purpose of fishing for pearls."—There was also a provision in the contract empowering Viscaino to make explorations and take possession of his discoveries for the crown of Spain. The Conde de Monte Rey seems, from a letter written to the King, to have seriously doubted whether Viscaino was the right man for so important an expedition, but finally allowed him to depart. In September, 1596, Viscaino sailed up the gulf with a fleet of three vessels, the flag ship San Francisco, the San José and á Lancha. The flag ship was disabled and leit at La Paz. With the other two vessels he sailed up the gulf to latitude 29°. He encountered severe storms. At some island he had trouble with the Indians and killed several. As the long boat was departing an Indian wounded one of the rowers with an arrow. The sailor dropped his oar, the boat careened and upset, drowning twenty of the twenty-six soldiers and sailors in it.

Viscaino returned without having procured any pearls or made any important discoveries. He proposed to continue his explorations of the Californias, but on account of his misfortunes his request was held in abeyance. He wrote a letter to the king in 1597, setting forth what supplies he required for the voyage. His inventory of the items needed is interesting, but altogether too long for insertion here. Among the items were "$35,000 in money"; "eighty arrobas of powder"; "twenty quintals of lead"; "four pipes of wine for mass and sick friars"; "vestments for the clergy and $2,000 to be invested in trifles for the Indians for the purpose of attracting them peaceably to receive the holy gospel." Viscaino's request was not granted at that time. The viceroy and the royal audiencia at one time ordered his commission revoked. Philip II died in 1598 and was succeeded by Philip III. After five years' waiting, Viscaino was allowed to proceed with his explorations. From Acapulco on the 5th of May, 1602, he writes to the king that he is ready to sail with his ships "for the discovery of harbors and bays of the coast of the South Sea as far as Cape Mendocino." "I report," he says, "merely that the said Viceroy (Conde de Monterey) has entrusted to me the accomplishment of the same in two ships, a lancha and a barcoluengo, manned with sailors and soldiers and provisioned for eleven months. To-day being Sunday, the 5th of May, I sail at five o'clock in the names of God and his blessed mother and your majesty."

Viscaino followed the same course marked out by Cabrillo sixty years before. November 10, 1602, he anchored in Cabrillo's Bay of San Miguel. Whether the faulty reckoning of Cabrillo left him in doubt of the points named by the first discoverer, or whether it was that he might receive the credit of their discovery, Viscaino changed the names given by Cabrillo to the islands, bays and headlands along the California coast. Cabrillo's Bahia San Miguel became the Bay of San Diego; San Salvador and Vitoria were changed to Santa Catalina and San Clemente, and Cabrillo's Bahia de los Fumos y Fuegos appears on Viscaino's map as the Ensenada de San Andres, but in a description of the voyage compiled by the cosmographer, Cabrero Bueno, it is named San Pedro. It is not named for the Apostle St. Peter, but for St. Peter, Bishop of Alexandria, whose day in the Catholic calendar is November 26, the day of the month Viscaino anchored in the Bay of San Pedro.

Sailing up the coast, Viscaino passed through the Santa Barbara channel, which was so named by Antonio de la Ascencion, a Carmelite friar, who was chaplain of one of the ships. The expedition entered the channel December 4, which is the day in the Catholic calendar dedicated to Santa Barbara. He visited the mainland near Point Concepcion where the Indian chief of a populous rancheria offered each Spaniard who would become a resident of his town ten wives. This generous offer was rejected. December 15, 1602, he reached Point Pinos, so named by Cabrillo, and cast anchor in the bay formed by its projection. This bay he named Monterey, in honor of the viceroy, Conde de Monte Rey. Many of his men were sick with the scurvy and his provisions were becoming exhausted; so, placing the sick and disabled on the San Tomas, he sent them back to Acapulco; but few of them ever reached their destination. On the 3d of January, 1603, with two ships, he proceeded on his search for Cape Mendocino, the northern limit of his survey. The Manila galleons on their return voyage from the Philippines sailed up the Asiatic coast to the latitude of Japan, when, taking advantage of the westerly winds and the Japan current, they crossed the Pacific, striking the North American coast in about the latitude of Cape Mendocino, and from there they ran down the coast of Las Californias and across the gulf to Acapulco. After leaving Point Reyes a storm separated his ships and drove him as far north as Cape Blanco. The smaller vessel, commanded by Martin de Aguilar, was driven north by the storm to latitude 43°, where he discovered what seemed to be the mouth of a great river; attempting to enter it, he was driven back by the swift current. Aguilar, believing he had discovered the western entrance of the Straits of Anian, sailed for New Spain to report his discovery. He, his chief pilot and most of his crew died of scurvy before the vessel reached Navidad. Viscaino, after sighting Cape Blanco, turned and sailed down the coast of California, reaching Acapulco March 21, 1603.

Viscaino, in a letter to the King of Spain, dated at the City of Mexico, May 23, 1603, grows enthusiastic over California climate and productions. It is the earliest known specimen of California boom literature. After depicting the commodiousness of Monterey Bay as a port of safety for the Philippine ships, he says: "This port is sheltered from all winds, while on the immediate shores there are pines, from which masts of any desired size can be obtained, as well as live oaks and white oaks, rosemary, the vine, the rose of Alexandria, a great variety of game, such as rabbits, hare, partridges and other sorts and species found in Spain. This land has a genial climate, its waters are good and it is fertile, judging from the varied and luxuriant growth of trees and plants; and it is thickly settled with people whom I found to be of gentle disposition, peaceable and docile. * * * Their food consists of seeds which they have in great abundance and variety, and of the flesh of game such as deer, which are larger than cows, and bear, and of neat cattle and bisons and many other animals. The Indians are of good stature and fair complexion, the women being somewhat less in size than the men, and of pleasing countenance. The clothing of the people of the coast lands consists of the skins of the sea wolves (otter) abounding there, which they tan and dress better than is done in Castile; they possess also in great quantity flax like that of Castile, hemp and cotton, from which they make fishing lines and nets for rabbits and hares. They have vessels of pine wood, very well made, in which they go to sea with fourteen paddlemen of a side, with great dexterity in very stormy weather. * * * They are well acquainted with gold and silver and said that these were found in the interior."

The object of Viscaino's boom literature of three hundred years ago was the promotion of a colony scheme for the founding of a settlement on Monterey Bay. He visited Spain to obtain the consent of the king and assistance in planting a colony. After many delays, Philip III, in 1606, ordered the viceroy of New Spain to fit out immediately an expedition to be commanded by Viscaino for the occupation and settlement of the port of Monterey. Before the expedition could be gotten ready Viscaino died and his colonization scheme died with him. Had he lived to carry out his scheme, the settlement of California would have antedated that of Jamestown, Va., by one year.

CHAPTER III.

COLONIZATION OF ALTA CALIFORNIA.

A HUNDRED and sixty years passed after the abandonment of Viscaino's colonization scheme before the Spanish crown made another attempt to utilize its vast possessions in Alta California. The Manila galleons sailed down the coast year after year for more than a century and a half, yet in all this long space of time none of them so far as we know ever entered a harbor or bay on the upper California coast. Spain still held her vast colonial possessions in America, but with a loosening grasp. As the years went by she had fallen from her high estate. Her power on sea and land had weakened. Those brave old sea kings, Drake, Hawkins and Frobisher, had destroyed her invincible Armada and burned her ships in her very harbors. The English and Dutch privateers had preyed upon her commerce on the high seas and the buccaneers had robbed her treasure ships and devastated her settlements on the islands and the Spanish main, while the freebooters of many nations had time and again captured her galleons and ravished her colonies on the Pacific coast. The energy and enterprise that had been a marked characteristic of her people in the days of Cortés and Pizarro were ebbing away. The cruelty and religious intolerance of her kings, her nobles and her clergy, had sapped the bravery of her people. The fear of her Holy Inquisition palsied effort and substituted in her people cringing for courage. For three centuries the rack and the thumb-screw of her Holy Office had never been allowed to rust from disuse nor its fires to burn out for want of victims. In trying to kill heresy her rulers were slowly but surely killing Spain. Proscriptive laws and the fear of the inquisition had driven into exile the most enterprising and the most intelligent classes of her people. Spain was decaying with the dry rot of bigotry. Other nations stood ready to take advantage of her decadence. Her old-time enemy, England, which had gained in power as Spain had lost, was ever on the alert to take advantage of her weakness; and another power, Russia, almost unknown among the powers of Europe when Spain was in her prime, was threatening her possessions in Alta California. To hold this vast country it must be colonized, but her restrictions on commerce and her proscriptive laws against foreign immigrants had shut the door to her colonial possessions against colonists from all other nations. Her sparse settlements in Mexico could spare no colonists. The indigenous inhabitants of California must be converted to Christianity and made into citizens. Poor material indeed were these degraded savages, but Spain's needs were pressing and missionary zeal was powerful. Indeed, the pristine courage and daring of the Spanish soldier seemed to have passed to her missionary priest.

The Jesuits had begun missionary work in 1697 among the degraded inhabitants of Lower California. With a perseverance that was highly commendable and a bravery that was heroic, under their devoted leaders, Salvatierra, Kino, Ugarte, Piccolo and their successors, they founded sixteen missions on the peninsula. Father Kino (or Kuhn), a German Jesuit, besides his missionary work, between 1694 and 1702, had made explorations around the head of the Gulf of California and up the Rio Colorado to the mouth of the Gila, which had clearly demonstrated that Lower California was a peninsula and not an island. Although Ulloa had sailed down the inner coast and up the outer coast of Lower California and Domingo del Castillo, a Spanish pilot, had made a correct map showing it to be a peninsula, so strong was the belief in the existence of the Straits of Anian that one hundred and sixty years after Ulloa's voyage Las Californias were still believed to be islands and were sometimes called Islas Carolinas, or the Islands of Charles, named so for Charles II. of Spain. Father Kino had formed the design of establishing a chain of missions from Sonora around the head of the gulf and down the inner coast of Lower California to Cape San Lucas. He did not live to complete his ambitious project. The Jesuit missions of Baja California never grew rich in flocks and herds. The country was sterile and the few small valleys of fertile land around the missions gave the padres and the neophytes at best but a frugal return for their labors.

For years there had been, in the Catholic countries of Europe, a growing fear and distrust of the Jesuits. Portugal had declared them traitors to the government and had banished them in 1759 from her dominions. France had suppressed the order in her domains in 1764. In 1767, King Carlos III., by a pragmatic sanction or decree, ordered their expulsion from Spain and all her American colonies. So great and powerful was the influence of the order that the decree for their expulsion was kept secret until the moment of its execution. Throughout all parts of the kingdom, at a certain hour of the night, a summons came to every college, monastery or other establishment where members of the order dwelt, to assemble by command of the king in the chapel or refectory immediately. The decree of perpetual banishment was then read to them. They were hastily bundled into vehicles that were awaiting them outside and hurried to the nearest seaport, where they were shipped to Rome. During their journey to the sea-coast they were not allowed to communicate with their friends nor permitted to speak to persons they met on the way. By order of the king, any subject who should undertake to vindicate the Jesuits in writing should be deemed guilty of treason and condemned to death.

The Lower California missions were too distant and too isolated to enforce the king's decree with the same haste and secrecy that was observed in Spain and Mexico. To Governor Gaspar de Portolá was entrusted the enforcement of their banishment. These missions were transferred to the Franciscans, but it took time to make the substitution. He proceeded with great caution and care lest the Indians should become rebellious and demoralized. It was not until February, 1768, that all the Jesuit missionaries were assembled at La Paz; from there they were sent to Mexico and on the 13th of April, at Vera Cruz, they bade farewell to the western continent.

At the head of the Franciscan contingent that came to Bahía, Cal., to take charge of the abandoned missions, was Father Junipero Serra, a man of indomitable will and great missionary zeal. Miguel José Serra was born on the island of Majorica in the year 1713. After completing his studies in the Lullian University, at the age of eighteen he became a monk and was admitted into the order of Franciscans. On taking orders he assumed the name of Junipero (Juniper). Among the disciples of St. Francis was a very zealous and devoted monk who bore the name of Junipero, of whom St. Francis once said,

"Would to God, my brothers, that I had a whole forest of such Junipers." Serra's favorite study was the "Lives of the Saints," and no doubt the study of the life of the original Junipero influenced him to take that saint's name. Serra's ambition was to become a missionary, but it was not until he was nearly forty years of age that his desire was gratified. In 1749 he came to Mexico and January 1, 1750, entered the College of San Fernando. A few months later he was given charge of an Indian mission in the Sierra Gorda mountains, where, with his assistant and lifelong friend, Father Palou, he remained nine years. Under his instructions the Indians were taught agriculture and the mission became a model establishment of its kind. From this mountain mission Serra returned to the city of Mexico. He spent seven years in doing missionary work among the Spanish population of the capital and surrounding country. His success as a preacher and his great missionary zeal led to his selection as president of the missions of California, from which the Jesuits had been removed. April 2, 1768, he arrived in the port of Loreto with fifteen associates from the College of San Fernando. These were sent to the different missions of the peninsula. These missions extended over a territory seven hundred miles in length and it required several months to locate all the missionaries. The scheme for the occupation and colonization of Alta California was to be jointly the work of church and state. The representative of the state was José de Galvez, visitador-general of New Spain, a man of untiring energy, great executive ability, sound business sense and, as such men are and ought to be, somewhat arbitrary. Galvez reached La Paz in July, 1768. He immediately set about investigating the condition of the peninsula missions and supplying their needs. This done, he turned his attention to the northern colonization. He established his headquarters at Santa Ana near La Paz. Here he summoned Father Junipero for consultation in regard to the founding of missions in Alta California. It was decided to proceed to the initial points San Diego and Monterey by land and sea. Three ships were to be dispatched carrying the heavier articles, such as agricultural implements, church ornaments, and a supply of provisions for the support of the soldiers and priest after their arrival in California. The expedition by land was to take along cattle and horses to stock the country. This expedition was divided into two detachments, the advance one under the command of Rivera y Moncada, who had been a long time in the country, and the second division under Governor Gaspar de Portolá, who was a newcomer. Captain Rivera was sent northward to collect from the missions all the live stock and supplies that could be spared and take them to Santa Maria, the most northern mission of the peninsula. Stores of all kinds were collected at La Paz. Father Serra made a tour of the missions and secured such church furniture, ornaments and vestments as could be spared.

The first vessel fitted out for the expedition by sea was the San Carlos, a ship of about two hundred tons burden, leaky and badly constructed. She sailed from La Paz January 9, 1769, under the command of Vicente Vila. In addition to the crew there were twenty-five Catalonian soldiers, commanded by Lieutenant Fages, Pedro Prat, the surgeon, a Franciscan friar, two blacksmiths, a baker, a cook and two tortilla makers. Galvez in a small vessel accompanied the San Carlos to Cape San Lucas, where he landed and set to work to fit out the San Antonio. On the 15th of February this vessel sailed from San José del Cabo (San José of the Cape), under the command of Juan Perez, an expert pilot, who had been engaged in the Philippine trade. On this vessel went two Franciscan friars, Juan Viscaïno and Francisco Gomez. Captain Rivera y Moncada, who was to pioneer the way, had collected supplies and cattle at Velicatá on the northern frontier. From here, with a small force of soldiers, a gang of neophytes and three muleteers, and accompanied by Padre Crespi, he began his march to San Diego on the 24th of March, 1769.

The second land expedition, commanded by Governor Gaspar de Portolá in person, began its march from Loreto, March 9, 1769. Father Serra, who was to have accompanied it, was detained at Loreto by a sore leg. He joined the expedition at Santa Maria, May 5, where it had been waiting for him some time. It then proceeded to Rivera's camp at Velicatá, sixty miles further north, where Serra founded a mission, naming it San Fernando. Campa Coy, a friar who had accompanied the expedition thus far, was left in charge. This mission was intended as a frontier post in the travel between the peninsula missions and the Alta California settlements. On the 15th of May Portolá began his northern march, following the trail of Rivera. Galvez had named, by proclamation, St. Joseph as the patron saint of the California expeditions. Santa Maria was designated as the patroness of conversions.

The San Antonia, the last vessel to sail, was the first to arrive at San Diego. It anchored in the bay April 11, 1769, after a prosperous voyage of twenty-four days. There she remained at anchor, awaiting the arrival of the San Carlos, the flag ship of the expedition, which had sailed more than a month before her. On the 29th of April the San Carlos, after a disastrous voyage of one hundred and ten days, drifted into the Bay of San Diego, her crew prostrated with the scurvy, not enough able-bodied men being left to man a boat. Canvas tents were pitched and the afflicted men taken ashore. When the disease had run its course nearly all of the crew of the San Carlos, half of the soldiers who had come on her, and nine of the sailors of the San Antonio, were dead.

On the 14th of May Captain Rivera y Moncada's detachment arrived. The expedition had made the journey from Velicatá in fifty-one days. On the first of July the second division, commanded by Portolá, arrived. The journey had been uneventful. The four divisions of the grand expedition were now united, but its numbers had been greatly reduced. Out of two hundred and nineteen who had set out by land and sea only one hundred and twenty-six remained; death from scurvy and the desertion of the neophytes had reduced the numbers nearly one-half. The ravages of the scurvy had destroyed the crew of one of the vessels and greatly crippled that of the other, so it was impossible to proceed by sea to Monterey, the second objective point of the expedition. A council of the officers was held and it was deecided to send the San Antonia back to San Blas for supplies and sailors to man the San Carlos. The San Antonia sailed on the 9th of July and after a voyage of twenty days reached her destination; but short as the voyage was, half of the crew died of the scurvy on the passage. In early American navigation the scurvy was the most dreaded scourge of the sea, more to be feared than storm and shipwreck. These might happen occasionally, but the scurvy always made its appearance on long voyages, and sometimes destroyed the whole ship's crew. Its appearance and ravages were largely due to the neglect of sanitary precautions and to the utter indifference of those in authority to provide for the comfort and health of the sailors. The intercession of the saints, novenas, fasts and penance were relied upon to protect and save the vessel and her crew, while the simplest sanitary measures were utterly disregarded. A blind, unreasoning faith that was always seeking interposition from some power without to preserve and ignoring the power within, was the bane and curse of that age of superstition.

If the mandates of King Carlos III. and the instructions of the visitador-general, José de Galvez, were to be carried out, the expedition for the settlement of the second point designated (Monterey) must be made by land; accordingly Governor Portolá set about organizing his forces for the overland journey. On the 14th of July the expedition began its march. It consisted of Governor Portolá, Padres Crespi and Gomez, Captain Rivera y Moncada, Lieutenant Pedro Fages, Engineer Miguel Constansó, soldiers, muleteers and Indian servants, numbering in all sixty-two persons.

On the 16th of July, two days after the departure of Governor Portolá, Father Junipero, assisted by Padres Viscaino and Parron, founded the mission of San Diego. The site selected was in what is now Old Town, near the temporary presidio, which had been hastily constructed before the departure of Governor Portolá. A hut of boughs had been constructed and in this the ceremonies of founding were held. The Indians, while interested in what was going on, manifested no desire to be converted. They were willing to receive gifts, particularly of cloth, but would not taste the food of the Spaniards, fearing that it contained poison and attributing the many deaths among the soldiers and sailors to the food. The Indians had a great liking for pieces of cloth, and their desire to obtain this led to an attack upon the people of the mission. On the 14th of August, taking advantage of the absence of Padre Parron and two soldiers, they broke into the mission and began robbing it and the beds of the sick. The four soldiers, a carpenter and a blacksmith rallied to the defense, and after several of their numbers had fallen by the guns of the soldiers, the Indians fled. A boy servant of the padres was killed and Father Viscaino wounded in the hand. After this the Indians were more cautious.

We now return to the march of Portolá's expedition. As the first exploration of the main land of California was made by it, I give considerable space to the incidents of the journey. Crespi, Constansó and Fages kept journals of the march. I quote from those of Constansó and Crespi. Lieutenant Constansó thus describes the order of the march. "The setting-forth was on the 14th day of June* of the cited year of '69. The two divisions of the expedition by land marched in one, the commander so arranging because the number of horse-herd and packs was much, since of provisions and victuals alone they carried one hundred packs, which he estimated to be necessary to ration all the folk during six months; thus providing against a delay of the packets, altho' it was held to be impossible that in this interval some one of them should fail to arrive at Monterey. On the marches the following order was observed: At the head went the commandant with the officers, the six men of the Catalonia volunteers, who added themselves at San Diego, and some friendly Indians, with spades, mattocks, crow-bars, axes and other implements of pioneers, to chop and open a passage whenever necessary. After them followed the pack-train, divided into four bands with the muleteers and a competent number of garrison soldiers for their escort with each band. In the rear guard with the rest of the troops and friendly Indians came the captain, Don Fernando Rivera, conveying the horse-herd and the mule herd for relays."

"It must be well considered that the marches of these troops with such a train and with such embarrassments thro' unknown lands and unused paths could not be long ones; leaving aside the other causes which obliged them to halt and camp early in the afternoon, that is to say, the necessity of exploring the land one day for the next, so as to regulate them (the marches) according to the distance of the watering-places and to take in consequence the proper precautions; setting forth again on special occasions in the evening, after having given water to the beasts in that same hour upon the sure information that in the following stretch there was no water or that the watering place was low, or the pasture scarce. The restings were measured by the necessity, every four days, more or less, according to the extraordinary fatigue occasioned by the greater roughness of the road, the toil of the pioneers, or the wandering off of the beasts which were missing from the horse herd and which it was necessary to seek by their tracks. At other times, by the necessity of humoring the sick, when there were any, and with time there were many who yielded up their strength to the continued fatigue, the excessive heat and cruel cold. In the form and according to the method related the Spaniards executed their marches; traversing immense lands more fertile and more pleasing in proportion as they penetrated more to the north. All in general are peopled with a multitude of Indians, who came out to meet them and in some parts accompanied them from one stage of the journey to the next; a folk very docile and tractable chiefly from San Diego onward."

Constansó's description of the Indians of Santa Barbara will be found in the chapter on the "Aborigines of California." "From the channel of Santa Barbara onward the lands are not so populous nor the Indians so industrious, but they are equally affable and tractable. The Spaniards pursued their voyage without opposition up to the Sierra of Santa Lucia, which they contrived to cross with much hardship. At the foot of said Sierra on the north side is to be found the port of Monterey, according to ancient reports, between the Point of Pines and that of Año Nuevo (New Year). The Spaniards caught sight of said points on the 1st of October of the year '69, and, believing they had arrived at the end of their voyage, the commandant sent the scouts forward to reconnoitre the Point of Pines; in whose near vicinity lies said Port in 36 degrees and 40 minutes North Latitude. But the scant tokens and equivocal ones which are given of it by the Pilot Cabrera Bueno, the only clue of this voyage, and the character of this Port, which rather merits the name of Bay, being spacious (in likeness to that of Cadiz), not corresponding with ideas which it is natural to form in reading the log of the aforementioned Cabrera Bueno, nor with the latitude of 37 degrees in which he located it, the scouts were persuaded that the Port must be farther to the north and they returned to the camp which our people occupied with the report that what they sought was not to be seen in those parts."

They decided that the Port was still further north and resumed their march. Seventeen of their number were sick with the scurvy, some of whom, Constansó says, seemed to be in their last extremity; these had to be carried in litters. To add to their miseries, the rains began in the latter part of October, and with them came an epidemic of diarrhea, "which spread to all without exception; and it came to be feared that this sickness which prostrated their powers and left the persons spiritless, would finish with the expedition altogether. But it turned out quite to the contrary." Those afflicted with the scurvy began to mend and in a short time they were restored to health. Constansó thus describes the discovery of the Bay of San Francisco: "The last day of October the Expedition by land came in sight of Punta de Los Reyes and the Farallones of the Port of San Francisco, whose landmarks, compared with those related by the log of the Pilot Cabrera Bueno, were found exact. Thereupon it became of evident knowledge that the Port of Monterey had been left behind; there being few who stuck to the contrary opinion. Nevertheless the commandant resolved to send to reconnoitre the land as far as Point de los Reyes. The scouts who were commissioned for this purpose found themselves obstructed by immense estuaries, which run extraordinarily far back into the land and were obliged to make great detours to get around the heads of these. * * * Having arrived at the end of the first estuary and reconnoitered the land that would have to be followed to arrive at the Point de Los Reyes, interrupted with new estuaries, scant pasturage and firewood and having recognized, besides this, the uncertainty of the news and the misapprehension the scouts had labored under, the commandant, with the advice of his officers, resolved upon a retreat to the Point of Pines in hopes of finding the Port of Monterey and encountering in it the Packet San José or the San Antonia, whose succor already was necessary; since of the provisions which had been taken in San Diego no more remained than some few sacks of flour of which a short ration was issued to each individual daily."

"On the eleventh day of November was put into execution the retreat in search of Monterey. The Spaniards reached said port and the Point of Pines on the 28th of November. They maintained themselves in this place until the 10th of December without any vessel having appeared in this time. For which reason and noting also a lack of victuals, and that the sierra of Santa Lucia was covering itself with snow, the commandant, Don Gaspar de Portolá, saw himself obliged to decide to continue the retreat unto San Diego, leaving it until a better occasion to return to the enterprise. On this retreat the Spaniards experienced some hardships and necessities, because they entirely lacked provisions, and because the long marches, which necessity obliged to make to reach San Diego, gave no time for seeking sustenance by the chase, nor did game abound equally everywhere. At this juncture they killed twelve mules of the pack-train on whose meat the folk nourished themselves unto San Diego, at which new establishment they arrived, all in health, on the 24th of January, 1770."

The San José, the third ship fitted out by Visitador-General Galvez, and which Governor Portolá expected to find in the Bay of Monterey, sailed from San José del Cabo in May, 1770, with supplies and a double crew to supply the loss of sailors on the other vessels, but nothing was ever heard of her afterwards. Provisions were running low at San Diego, no ship had arrived, and Governor Portolá had decided to abandon the place and return to Loreto. Father Junipero was averse to this and prayed unceasingly for the intercession of Saint Joseph, the patron of the expedition. A novena or nine days' public prayer was instituted to terminate with a grand ceremonial on March 19th, which was the saint's own day. But on the 23rd of March, when all were ready to depart, the packet San Antonia arrived. She had sailed from San Blas the 20th of December. She encountered a storm which drove her four hundred leagues from the coast; then she made land in 35 degrees north latitude. Turning her prow southward, she ran down to Point Concepcion, where at an anchorage in the Santa Barbara channel the captain, Perez, took on water and learned from the Indians of the return of Portolá's expedition. The vessel then ran down to San Diego, where its opportune arrival prevented the abandonment of that settlement.

With an abundant supply of provisions and a vessel to carry the heavier articles needed in forming a settlement at Monterey, Portolá organized a second expedition. This time he took with him only twenty soldiers and one officer, Lieutenant Pedro Fages. He set out from San Diego on the 17th of April and followed his trail made the previous year. Father Serra and the engineer, Constansó, sailed on the San Antonia, which left the port of San Diego on the 16th of April. The land expedition reached Monterey on the 23d of May and the San Antonia on the 31st of the same month. On the 3d of June, 1770, the mission of San Carlos Borromeo de Monterey was formally founded with solemn church ceremonies, accompanied by the ringing of bells, the crack of musketry and the roar of cannon. Father Serra conducted the church services. Governor Portolá took possession of the land in the name of King Carlos III. A presidio or fort of palisades was built and a few huts erected. Portolá, having formed the nucleus of a settlement, turned over the command of the territory to Lieutenant Fages. On the 9th of July, 1770, he sailed on the San Antonia for San Blas. He never returned to Alta California.

CHAPTER IV.

ABORIGINES OF CALIFORNIA.

WHETHER the primitive California Indian was the low and degraded being that some modern writers represent him to have been, admits of doubt. A mission training continued through three generations did not elevate him in morals at least. When freed from mission restraint and brought in contact with the white race he lapsed into a condition more degraded and more debased than that in which the missionaries found him. Whether it was the inherent fault of the Indian or the fault of his training is a question that is useless to discuss now. If we are to believe the accounts of the California Indian given by Viscaino and Constansó, who saw him before he had come in contact with civilization he was not inferior in intelligence to the nomad aborigines of the country east of the Rocky mountains.

Sebastian Viscaino thus describes the Indians he found on the shores of Monterey Bay three hundred years ago:

"The Indians are of good stature and fair complexion, the women being somewhat less in size than the men and of pleasing countenance. The clothing of the people of the coast lands consists of the skins of the sea-wolves (otter) abounding there, which they tan and dress better than is done in Castile; they possess also, in great quantity, flax like that of Castile, hemp and cotton, from which they make fish-g-lines and nets for rabbits and hares. They have vessels of pine wood very well made, in which they go to sea with fourteen paddle men on a side with great dexterity, even in stormy weather."

Indians who could construct boats of pine boards that took twenty-eight paddle men to row were certainly superior in maritime craft to the birch bark canoe savages of the east. We might accuse Viscaïno, who was trying to induce King Philip III. to found a colony on Monterey Bay, of exaggeration in regard to the Indian boats were not his statements confirmed by the engineer, Miguel Constansó, who accompanied Portolá's expedition one hundred and sixty-seven years after Viscaïno visited the coast. Constansó, writing of the Indians of the Santa Barbara Channel, says, "The dexterity and skill of these Indians is surpassing in the construction of their launches made of pine planking. They are from eight to ten varas (twenty-three to twenty-eight feet) in length, including their rake and a vara and a half (four feet three inches) beam. Into their fabric enters no iron whatever, of the use of which they know little. But they fasten the boards with firmness, one to another, working their drills just so far apart and at a distance of an inch from the edge, the holes in the upper boards corresponding with those in the lower, and through these holes they pass strong lashings of deer sinews. They pitch and calk the seams, and paint the whole in sightly colors. They handle the boats with equal cleverness, and three or four men go out to sea to fish in them, though they have capacity to carry eight or ten. They use long oars with two blades and row with unspeakable lightness and velocity. They know all the arts of fishing, and fish abound along their coasts as has been said of San Diego. They have communication and commerce with the natives of the islands, whence they get the beads of coral which are current in place of money through these lands, although they hold in more esteem the glass beads which the Spaniards gave them, and offered in exchange for these whatever they had like trays, otter skins, baskets and wooden plates. * * *

"They are likewise great hunters. To kill deer and antelope they avail themselves of an admirable ingenuity. They preserve the hide of the head and part of the neck of some one of these animals, skinned with care and leaving the horns attached to the same hide, which they stuff with grass or straw to keep its shape. They put this said shell like a cap upon the head and go forth to the woods with this rare equipage. On sighting the deer or antelope they go dragging themselves along the ground little by little with the left hand. In the right they carry the bow and four arrows. They lower and raise the head, moving it to one side and the other, and making other demonstrations so like these animals that they attract them without difficulty to the snare; and having them within a short distance, they discharge their arrows at them with certainty of hitting."

In the two chief occupations of the savage, hunting and fishing, the Indians of the Santa Barbara Channel seem to have been the equals if not the superiors of their eastern brethren. In the art of war they were inferior. Their easy conquest by the Spaniards and their tame subjection to mission rule no doubt had much to do with giving them a reputation for inferiority.

The Indians of the interior valleys and those of the coast belonged to the same general family. There were no great tribal divisions like those that existed among the Indians east of the Rocky mountains. Each rancheria was to a certain extent independent of all others, although at times they were known to combine for war or plunder. Although not warlike, they sometimes resisted the whites in battle with great bravery. Each village had its own territory in which to hunt and fish and its own section in which to gather nuts, seeds and herbs. While their mode of living was somewhat nomadic they seem to have had a fixed location for their rancherias.

The early Spanish settlers of California and the mission padres have left but very meager accounts of the manners, customs, traditions, government and religion of the aborigines. The padres were too intent upon driving out the old religious beliefs of the Indian and instilling new ones to care much what the aborigine had formerly believed or what traditions or myths he had inherited from his ancestors. They ruthlessly destroyed his fetiches and his altars wherever they found them, regarding them as inventions of the devil.

The best account that has come down to us of the primitive life of the Southern California aborigines is found in a series of letters written by Hugo Reid and published in the Los Angeles Star in 1851-52. Reid was an educated Scotchman, who came to Los Angeles in 1834. He married an Indian woman, Dona Victoria, a neophyte of the San Gabriel mission. She was the daughter of an Indian chief. It is said that Reid had been crossed in love by some high toned Spanish señorita and married the Indian woman because she had the same name as his lost love. It is generally believed that Reid was the putative father of Helen Hunt Jackson's heroine, Ramona.

From these letters, now in the possession of the Historical Society of Southern California, I briefly collate some of the leading characteristics of the Southern Indians:

GOVERNMENT.

"Before the Indians belonging to the greater part of this country were known to the whites they comprised, as it were, one great family under distinct chiefs; they spoke nearly the same language, with the exception of a few words, and were more to be distinguished by a local intonation of the voice than anything else. Being related by blood and marriage war was never carried on between them. When war was consequently waged against neighboring tribes of no affinity it was a common cause."

"The government of the people was invested in the hands of their chiefs, each captain commanding his own lodge. The command was hereditary in a family. If the right line of descent ran out they elected one of the same kin nearest in blood. Laws in general were made as required, with some few standing ones. Robbery was never known among them. Murder was of rare occurrence and punished with death. Incest was likewise punished with death, being held in such abhorrence that marriages between kinsfolk were not allowed. The manner of putting to death was by shooting the delinquent with arrows. If a quarrel ensued between two parties the chief of the lodge took cognizance in the case and decided according to the testimony produced. But if a quarrel occurred between parties of distinct lodges, each chief heard the witnesses produced by his own people, and then, associated with the chief of the opposite side, they passed sentence. In case they could not agree an impartial chief was called in, who heard the statements made by both and he alone decided. There was no appeal from his decision. Whipping was never resorted to as a punishment. All fines and sentences consisted in delivering shells, money, food and skins."

RELIGION.

"They believed in one God, the Maker and Creator of all things, whose name was and is held so sacred among them as hardly ever to be used, and when used only in a low voice. That name is Qua-o-ar. When they have to use the name of the supreme being on an ordinary occasion they substitute in its stead the word Y-yo-ha-rory-nain or the Giver of Life. They have only one word to designate life and soul."

"The world was at one time in a state of chaos, until God gave it its present formation, fixing it on the shoulders of seven giants, made expressly for this end. They have their names, and when they move themselves an earthquake is the consequence. Animals were then formed, and lastly man and woman were formed, separately from earth and ordered to live together. The man's name was Tobahar and the woman's Probavit. God ascended to Heaven immediately afterward, where he receives the souls of all who die. They had no bad spirits connected with their creed, and never heard of a 'devil' or a 'hell' until the coming of the Spaniards. They believed in no resurrection whatever"

MARRIAGE.

"Chiefs had one, two or three wives, as their inclination dictated, the subjects only one. When a person wished to marry and had selected a suitable partner, he advertised the same to all his relatives, even to the nineteenth cousin. On a day appointed the male portion of the lodge brought in a collection of money beads. All the relations having come in with their share, they (the males) proceeded in a body to the residence of the bride, to whom timely notice had been given. All of the bride's female relations had been assembled and the money was equally divided among them, the bride receiving nothing, as it was a sort of purchase. After a few days the bride's female relations returned the compliment by taking to the bridegroom's dwelling baskets of meal made of chia, which was distributed among the male relatives. These preliminaries over, a day was fixed for the ceremony, which consisted in decking out the bride in innumerable strings of beads, paint, feathers and skins. On being ready she was taken up in the arms of one of her strongest male relatives, who carried her, dancing, towards her lover's habitation. All of her family, friends and neighbors accompanied, dancing around, throwing food and edible seeds at her feet at every step. These were collected in a scramble by the spectators as best they could. The relations of the bridegroom met them half way, and, taking the bride, carried her themselves, joining in the ceremonious walking dance. On arriving at the bridegroom's (who was sitting within his hut) she was inducted into her new residence by being placed alongside of her husband, while baskets of seeds were liberally emptied on their heads to denote blessings and plenty. This was likewise scrambled for by the spectators, who, on gathering up all the bride's seed cake, departed, leaving them to enjoy their honeymoon according to usage. A grand dance was given on the occasion, the warriors doing the dancing, the young women doing the singing. The wife never visited her relatives from that day forth, although they were at liberty to visit her."

BURIALS.

"When a person died all the kin collected to mourn his or her loss. Each one had his own peculiar mode of crying or howling, as easily distinguished the one from the other as one song is from another. After lamenting awhile a mourning dirge was sung in a low whining tone, accompanied by a shrill whistle produced by blowing into the tube of a deer's leg bone.

Dancing can hardly be said to have formed a part of the rites, as it was merely a monotonous action of the foot on the ground. This was continued alternately until the body showed signs of decay, when it was wrapped in the covering used in life. The hands were crossed upon the breast and the body tied from head to foot. A grave having been dug in their burial ground, the body was deposited with seeds, etc., according to the means of the family. If the deceased were the head of the family or a favorite son, the hut in which he lived was burned up, as likewise were all his personal effects."

FEUDS—THE SONG FIGHTS.

"Animosity between persons or families was of long duration, particularly between those of different tribes. These feuds descended from father to son until it was impossible to tell of how many generations. They were, however, harmless in themselves, being merely a war of songs, composed and sung against the conflicting party, and they were all of the most obscene and indecent language imaginable. There are two families at this day (1851) whose feud commenced before the Spaniards were ever dreamed of and they still continue singing and dancing against each other. The one resides at the mission of San Gabriel and the other at San Juan Capistrano; they both lived at San Bernardino when the quarrel commenced. During the singing they continue stamping on the ground to express the pleasure they would derive from tramping on the graves of their foes. Eight days was the duration of the song fight."

UTENSILS.

"From the bark of nettles was manufactured thread for nets, fishing lines, etc. Needles, fish-hooks, awls and many other articles were made of either bone or shell; for cutting up meat a knife of cane was invariably used. Mortars and pestles were made of granite. Sharp stones and perseverance were the only things used in their manufacture, and so skillfully did they combine the two that their work was always remarkably uniform. Their pots to cook in were made of soapstone of about an inch in thickness and procured from the Indians of Santa Catalina.

Their baskets, made out of a certain species of rush, were used only for dry purposes, although they were water proof. The vessels in use for liquids were roughly made of rushes and plastered outside and in with bitumen or pitch."

INDIANS OF THE SANTA BARBARA CHANNEL.

Miguel Constansó, the engineer who accompanied Portolá's expedition in 1769, gives us the best description of the Santa Barbara Indians extant.

"The Indians in whom was recognized more vivacity and industry are those that inhabit the islands and the coast of the Santa Barbara channel. They live in pueblos (villages) whose houses are of spherical form in the fashion of a half orange covered with rushes. They are up to twenty varas (fifty-five feet) in diameter. Each house contains three or four families. The hearth is in the middle and in the top of the house they leave a vent or chimney to give exit for the smoke. In nothing did these gentiles give the lie to the affability and good treatment which were experienced at their hands in other times (1602) by the Spaniards who landed upon those coasts with General Sebastian Vizcaino. They are men and women of good figure and aspect, very much given to painting and staining their faces and bodies with red ochre.

"They use great head dresses of feathers and some panderellas (small darts) which they bind up amid their hair with various trinkets and beads of coral of various colors. The men go entirely naked, but in time of cold they sport some long capes of tanned skins of nutrias (otters) and some mantles made of the same skins cut in long strips, which they twist in such a manner that all the fur remains outside; then they weave these strands one with another, forming a weft, and give it the pattern referred to.

"The women go with more decency, girt about the waist with tanned skins of deer which cover them in front and behind more than half down the leg, and with a mantelet of nutria over the body. There are some of them with good features. These are the Indian women who make the trays and vases of rushes, to which they give a thousand different forms and graceful patterns, according to the uses to which they are destined, whether it be for eating, drinking, guarding their seeds, or for other purposes; for these peoples do not know the use of earthen ware as those of San Diego use it.

"The men work handsome trays of wood, with finer inlays of coral or of bone; and some vases of much capacity, closing at the mouth, which appear to be made with a lathe—and with this machine they would not come out better hollowed nor of more perfect form. They give the whole a luster which appears the finished handiwork of a skilled artisan. The large vessels which hold water are of a very strong weave of rushes pitched within; and they give them the same form as our water jars.

"To eat the seeds which they use in place of bread they toast them first in great trays, putting among the seeds some pebbles or small stones heated until red; then they move and shake the tray so it may not burn; and getting the seed sufficiently toasted they grind it in mortars or almireses of stone. Some of these mortars were of extraordinary size, as well wrought as if they had had for the purpose the best steel tools. The constancy, attention to trifles, and labor which they employ in finishing these pieces are well worthy of admiration. The mortars are so appreciated among themselves that for those who, dying, leave behind such handiworks, they are wont to place them over the spot where they are buried, that the memory of their skill and application may not be lost.

"They inter their dead. They have their cemeteries within the very pueblo. The funerals of their captains they make with great pomp, and set up over their bodies some rods or poles, extremely tall, from which they hang a variety of utensils and chattels which were used by them. They likewise put in the same place some great planks of pine, with various paintings and figures in which without doubt they explain the exploits and prowesses of the personage.

"Plurality of wives is not lawful among these peoples. Only the captains have a right to marry two. In all their pueblos the attention was taken by a species of men who lived like the women, kept company with them, dressed in the same garb, adorned themselves with beads, pendants, necklaces and other womanish adornments, and enjoyed great consideration among the people. The lack of an interpreter did not permit us to find out what class of men they were, or to what ministry they were destined, though all suspect a defect in sex, or some abuse among those gentiles.

"In their houses the married couples have their separate beds on platforms elevated from the ground. Their mattresses are some simple petates (mats) of rushes and their pillows are of the same petates rolled up at the head of the bed. All these beds are hung about with like mats, which serve for decency and protect from the cold."

From the descriptions given by Viscaïno and Constansó of the coast Indians they do not appear to have been the degraded creatures that some modern writers have pictured them. In mechanical ingenuity they were superior to the Indians of the Atlantic seaboard or those of the Mississippi valley. Much of the credit that has been given to the mission padres for the patient training they gave the Indians in mechanical arts should be given to the Indian himself. He was no mean mechanic when the padres took him in hand.

Bancroft says "the Northern California Indians were in every way superior to the central and southern tribes." The difference was more in climate than in race. Those of Northern California living in an invigorating climate were more active and more warlike than their sluggish brethren of the south. They gained their living by hunting larger game than those of the south whose subsistence was derived mostly from acorns, seeds, small game and fish. Those of the interior valleys of the north were of lighter complexion and had better forms and features than their southern kinsmen. They were divided into numerous small tribes or clans, like those of central and Southern California. The Spaniards never penetrated very far into the Indian country of the north and consequently knew little or nothing about the habits and customs of the aborigines there. After the discovery of gold the miners invaded their country in search of the precious metal. The Indians at first were not hostile, but ill treatment soon made them so. When they retaliated on the whites a war of extermination was waged against them. Like the mission Indians of the south they are almost extinct.

All of the coast Indians seem to have had some idea of a supreme being. The name differed with the different tribes. According to Hugo Reid the god of the San Gabriel Indian was named Quaoâr. Father Boscana, who wrote "A Historical Account of the Origin, Customs and Traditions of the Indians" at the missionary establishment of San Juan Capistrano, published in Alfred Robinson's "Life in California," gives a lengthy account of the religion of those Indians before their conversion to Christianity. Their god was Chingichinich. Evidently the three old men from whom Boscana derived his information mixed some of the religious teachings of the padres with their own primitive beliefs, and made up for the father a nondescript religion half heathen and half Christian. Boscana was greatly pleased to find so many allusions to Scriptural truths, evidently never suspecting that the Indians were imposing upon him.

The religious belief of the Santa Barbara Channel Indians appears to have been the most rational of any of the beliefs held by the California aborigines. Their god, Chupu, was the deification of good; and Nunaxus, their Satan, the personification of evil. Chupu the all-powerful created Nunaxus, who rebelled against his creator and tried to overthrow him; but Chupu, the almighty, punished him by creating man who, by devouring the animal and vegetable products of the earth, checked the physical growth of Nunaxus, who had hoped by liberal feeding to become like unto a mountain. Foiled in his ambition, Nunaxus ever afterwards sought to injure mankind. To secure Chupu's protection, offerings were made to him and dances were instituted in his honor. Flutes and other instruments were played to attract his attention. When Nunaxus brought calamity upon the Indians in the shape of dry years, which caused a dearth of animal and vegetable products, or sent sickness to afflict them, their old men interceded with Chupu to protect them; and to exorcise their Satan they shot arrows and threw stones in the direction in which he was supposed to be.

Of the Indian myths and traditions Hugo Reid says: "They were of incredible length and contained more metamorphoses than Ovid could have engendered in his brain had he lived a thousand years."

The Cahuilla tribes who formerly inhabited the mountain districts of the southeastern part of the state had a tradition of their creation. According to this tradition the primeval Adam and Eve were created by the Supreme Being in the waters of a northern sea. They came up out of the water upon the land, which they found to be soft and miry. They traveled southward for many moons in search of land suitable for their residence and where they could obtain sustenance from the earth. This they found at last on the mountain sides in Southern California.

Some of the Indian myths when divested of their crudities and ideas clothed in fitting language are as poetical as those of Greece or Scandinavia. The following one which Hugo Reid found among the San Gabriel Indians bears a striking resemblance to the Grecian myths of Orpheus and Eurydice but it is not at all probable that the Indians ever heard the Grecian fable. Ages ago, so runs this Indian myth, a powerful people dwelt on the banks of the Arroyo Seco and hunted over the hills and plains of what are now our modern Pasadena and the valley of San Fernando. They committed a grievous crime against the Great Spirit. A pestilence destroyed them all save a boy and girl who were saved by a foster mother possessed of supernatural powers. They grew to manhood and womanhood and became husband and wife. Their devotion to each other angered the foster mother, who fancied herself neglected. She plotted to destroy the wife. The young woman, divining her fate, told her husband that should he at any time feel a tear drop on his shoulder, he might know that she was dead. While he was away hunting the dread signal came. He hastened back to destroy the hag who had brought death to his wife, but the sorceress had escaped. Disconsolate he threw himself on the grave of his wife. For three days he neither ate nor drank. On the third day a whirlwind arose from the grave and moved toward the south. Perceiving in it the form of his wife, he hastened on until he overtook it. Then a voice came out of the cloud saying: "Whither I go, thou canst not come. Thou art of earth but I am dead to the world. Return, my husband, return!" He plead piteously to be taken with her. She consenting, he was wrapt in the cloud with her and borne across the illimitable sea that separates the abode of the living from that of the dead. When they reached the realms of ghosts a spirit voice said: "Sister, thou comest to us with an odor of earth; what dost thou bring?" Then she confessed that she had brought her living husband. "Take him away!" said a voice stern and commanding. She plead that he might remain and recounted his many virtues. To test his virtues, the spirits gave him four labors. First to bring a feather from the top of a pole so high that its summit was invisible. Next to split a hair of great length and exceeding fineness; third to make on the ground a map of the constellation of the lesser bear and locate the north star and last to slay the celestial deer that had the form of black beetles and were exceedingly swift. With the aid of his wife he accomplished all the tasks.

But no mortal was allowed to dwell in the abodes of death. "Take thou thy wife and return with her to the earth," said the spirit. "Yet remember, thou shalt not speak to her; thou shalt not touch her until three suns have passed. A penalty awaits thy disobedience." He promised. They pass from the spirit land and travel to the confines of matter. By day she is invisible but by the flickering light of his camp-fire he sees the dim outline of her form. Three days pass. As the sun sinks behind the western hills he builds his camp-fire. She appears before him in all the beauty of life. He stretches forth his arms to embrace her. She is snatched from his grasp. Although invisible to him yet the upper rim of the great orb of day hung above the western verge. He had broken his promise. Like Orpheus, disconsolate, he wandered over the earth until, relenting, the spirits sent their servant Death to bring him to Tecupar (Heaven).

The following myth of the mountain Indians of the north bears a strong resemblance to the Norse fable of Gyoll the River of Death and its glittering bridge, over which the spirits of the dead pass to Hel, the land of spirits. The Indian, however, had no idea of any kind of a bridge except a foot log across a stream. The myth in a crude form was narrated to me many years ago by an old pioneer.

According to this myth when an Indian died his spirit form was conducted by an unseen guide over a mountain trail unknown and inaccessible to mortals, to the rapidly flowing river which separated the abode of the living from that of the dead. As the trail descended to the river it branched to the right and left. The right hand path led to a foot bridge made of the massive trunk of a rough barked pine which spanned the Indian styx; the left led to a slender, fresh peeled birch pole that hung high above the roaring torrent. At the parting of the trail an inexorable fate forced the bad to the left, while the spirit form of the good passed on to the right and over the rough barked pine to the happy hunting grounds, the Indian heaven. The bad reaching the river's brink and gazing longingly upon the delights beyond, essayed to cross the slippery pole—a slip, a slide, a clutch at empty space, and the ghostly spirit form was hurled into the mad torrent below, and was borne by the rushing waters into a vast lethean lake where it sunk beneath the waves and was blotted from existence forever.

CHAPTER V.

FRANCISCAN MISSIONS OF ALTA CALIFORNIA.

SAN DIEGO DE ALCALÁ.

THE two objective points chosen by Vis- itador General Galvez and President Junipero Serra to begin the spiritual conquest and civilization of the savages of Alta California, were San Diego and Monterey. The expeditions sent by land and sea were all united at San Diego July 1, 1769. Father Serra lost no time in beginning the founding of missions. On the 16th of July, 1769, he founded the mission of San Diego de Alcalá. It was the first link in the chain of missionary establishments that eventually stretched northward from San Diego to Solano, a distance of seven hundred miles, a chain that was fifty-five years in forging. The first site of the San Diego mission was at a place called by the Indians "Cosoy." It was located near the presidio established by Governor Portolá before he set out in search of Monterey. The locality is now known as Old Town.

Temporary buildings were erected here but the location proved unsuitable and in August, 1774, the mission was removed about two leagues up the San Diego river to a place called by the natives "Nipaguay." Here a dwelling for the padres, a store house, a smithy and a wooden church 18x57 feet were erected.

The mission buildings at Cosoy were given up to the presidio except two rooms, one for the visiting priests and the other for a temporary store room for mission supplies coming by sea. The missionaries had been fairly successful in the conversions of the natives and some progress had been made in teaching them to labor. On the night of November 4, 1775, without any previous warning, the gentiles or unconverted Indians in great numbers attacked the mission. One of the friars, Fray Funster, escaped to the soldiers' quarters; the other, Father Jaume, was killed by the savages. The blacksmith also was killed; the carpenter succeeded in reaching the soldiers. The Indians set fire to the buildings which were nearly all of wood. The soldiers, the priest and carpenter were driven into a small adobe building that had been used as a kitchen. Two of the soldiers were wounded. The corporal, one soldier and the carpenter were all that were left to hold at bay a thousand howling fiends. The corporal, who was a sharp shooter, did deadly execution on the savages.

Father Funster saved the defenders from being blown to pieces by the explosion of a fifty pound sack of gunpowder. He spread his cloak over the sack and sat on it, thus preventing the powder from being ignited by the sparks of the burning building. The fight lasted till daylight, when the hostiles fled. The Christian Indians who professed to have been coerced by the savages then appeared and made many protestations of sorrow at what had happened. The military commander was not satisfied that they were innocent but the padres believed them. New buildings were erected at the same place, the soldiers of the presidio for a time assisting the Indians in their erection.

The mission was fairly prosperous. In 1800 the cattle numbered 6,960 and the agricultural products amounted to 2,600 bushels. From 1769 to 1834 there were 6,638 persons baptized and 4,428 buried. The largest number of cattle possessed by the mission at one time was 9,245 head in 1822. The old building now standing on the mission site at the head of the valley is the third church erected there. The first, built of wood and roofed with tiles, was erected in 1774; the second, built of adobe, was completed in 1780 (the walls of this were badly cracked by an earthquake in 1803); the third was begun in 1808 and dedicated November 12, 1813. The mission was secularized in 1834.

SAN CARLOS DE BORROMEIO.

As narrated in a former chapter, Governor Portolá, who with a small force had set out from San Diego to find Monterey Bay, reached that port May 24, 1770. Father Serra, who came up by sea on the San Antonia, arrived at the same place May 31. All things being in readiness the Presidio of Monterey and the mission of San Carlos de Borromeo were founded on the same day—June 3, 1770. The boom of artillery and the roar of musketry accompaniments to the service of the double founding frightened the Indians away from the mission and it was some time before the savages could muster courage to return. In June, 1771, the site of the mission was moved to the Carmelo river. This was done by Father Serra to remove the neophytes from the contaminating influence of the soldiers at the presidio. The erection of the stone church still standing was begun in 1793. It was completed and dedicated in 1797. The largest neophyte population at San Carlos was reached in 1794, when it numbered nine hundred and seventy-one. Between 1800 and 1810 it declined to seven hundred and forty-seven. In 1820 the population had decreased to three hundred and eighty-one and at the end of the next decade it had fallen to two hundred and nine. In 1834, when the decree of secularization was put in force, there were about one hundred and fifty neophytes at the mission. At the rate of decrease under mission rule, a few more years would have produced the same result that secularization did, namely, the extinction of the mission Indian.

SAN ANTONIO DE PADUA.

The third mission founded in California was San Antonio de Padua. It was located about twenty-five leagues from Monterey. Here, on the 14th of June, 1771, in La Canada de los Robles, the cañon of oaks beneath a shelter of branches, Father Serra performed the services of founding. The Indians seem to have been more tractable than those of San Diego or Monterey. The first convert was baptized one month after the establishment of the mission. San Antonio attained the highest limit of its neophyte population in 1805, when it had twelve hundred and ninety-six souls within its fold. In 1831 there were six hundred and sixty-one Indians at or near the mission. In 1834, the date of secularization, there were five hundred and sixty-seven. After its disestablishment the property of the mission was quickly squandered through inefficient administrators. The buildings are in ruins.

SAN GABRIEL ARCANGEL.

San Gabriel Arcángel was the fourth mission founded in California. Father Junipero Serra, as previously narrated, had gone north in 1770 and founded the mission of San Carlos Borromeo on Monterey Bay and the following year he established the mission of San Antonio de Padua on the Salinas river about twenty-five leagues south of Monterey.

On the 6th of August, 1771, a cavalcade of soldiers and musketeers escorting Padres Somero and Cambon set out from San Diego over the trail made by Portolá's expedition in 1769 (when it went north in search of Monterey Bay) to found a new mission on the River Jesus de los Temblores or to give it its full name, El Rio del Dulcísimo Nombre de Jesus de los Temblores, the river of the sweetest name of Jesus of the Earthquakes. Not finding a suitable location on that river (now the Santa Ana) they pushed on to the Rio San Miguel, also known as the Rio de los Temblores. Here they selected a site where wood and water were abundant. A stockade of poles was built inclosing a square within which a church was erected, covered with boughs.

September 8, 1771, the mission was formally founded and dedicated to the archangel Gabriel. The Indians who at the coming of the Spaniards were docile and friendly, a few days after the founding of the mission suddenly attacked two soldiers who were guarding the horses. One of these soldiers had outraged the wife of the chief who led the attack. The soldier who committed the crime killed the chieftain with a musket ball and the other Indians fled. The soldiers then cut off the chief's head and fastened it to a pole at the presidio gate. From all accounts the soldiers at this mission were more brutal and barbarous than the Indians and more in need of missionaries to convert them than the Indians. The progress of the mission was slow. At the end of the second year only seventy-three children and adults had been baptized. Father Serra attributed the lack of conversions to the bad conduct of the soldiers.

The first buildings at the mission Vieja were all of wood. The church was 45x18 feet, built of logs and covered with tule thatch. The church and other wooden buildings used by the padres stood within a square inclosed by pointed stakes. In 1776, five years after its founding, the mission was moved from its first location to a new site about a league distant from the old one. The old site was subject to overflow by the river. The adobe ruins pointed out to tourists as the foundations of the old mission are the debris of a building erected for a ranch house about sixty years ago. The buildings at the mission Vieja were all of wood and no trace of them remains. A chapel was first built at the new site. It was replaced by a church built of adobes one hundred and eight feet long by twenty-one feet wide. The present stone church, begun about 1794, and completed about 1806, is the fourth church erected.

The mission attained the acme of its importance in 1817, when there were seventeen hundred and one neophytes in the mission fold.

The largest grain crop raised at any mission was that harvested at San Gabriel in 1821, which amounted to 29,400 bushels. The number of cattle belonging to the mission in 1830 was 25,725. During the whole period of the mission's existence, i. e., from 1771 to 1834, according to statistics compiled by Bancroft from mission records, the total number of baptisms was 7,854, of which 4,355 were Indian adults and 2,459 were Indian children and the remainder gente de razon or people of reason. The deaths were 5,656, of which 2,916 were Indian adults and 2,363 Indian children. If all the Indian children born were baptized it would seem (if the statistics are correct) that but very few ever grew up to manhood and womanhood. In 1834, the year of its secularization, its neophyte population was 1,320.

The missionaries of San Gabriel established a station at old San Bernardino about 1820. It was not an asistencia like pala, but merely an agricultural station or ranch headquarters. The buildings were destroyed by the Indians in 1834.

SAN LUIS OBISPO DE TOLOSA.

On his journey southward in 1782, President Serra and Padre Cavaller, with a small escort of soldiers and a few Lower California Indians, on September 1, 1772, founded the mission of San Luis Obispo de Tolosa (St. Louis, Bishop of Toulouse). The site selected was on a creek twenty-five leagues southerly from San Antonio. The soldiers and Indians were set at work to erect buildings. Padre Cavaller was left in charge of the mission, Father Serra continuing his journey southward. This mission was never a very important one. Its greatest population was in 1803, when there were eight hundred and fifty-two neophytes within its jurisdiction. From that time to 1834 their number declined to two hundred and sixty-four. The average death rate was 7.30 per cent of the population—a lower rate than at some of the more populous missions. The adobe church built in 1793 is still in use, but has been so remodeled that it bears but little resemblance to the church of mission days.

SAN FRANCISCO DE ASIS.

The expedition under command of Portolá in 1769 failed to find Monterey Bay but it passed on and discovered the great bay of San Francisco. So far no attempt had been made to plant a mission or presidio on its shores. Early in 1775, Lieutenant Ayala was ordered to explore the bay with a view to forming a settlement near it. Rivera had previously explored the land bordering on the bay where the city now stands. Captain Anza, the discoverer of the overland route from Mexico to California via the Colorado river, had recruited an expedition of two hundred persons in Sonora for the purpose of forming a settlement at San Francisco. He set out in 1775 and reached Monterey March 10, 1776. A quarrel between him and Rivera, who was in command at Monterey, defeated for a time the purpose for which the settlers had been brought, and Anza, disgusted with the treatment he had received from Rivera, abandoned the enterprise. Anza had selected a site for a presidio at San Francisco. After his departure Rivera changed his policy of delay that had frustrated all of Anza's plans and decided at once to proceed to the establishment of a presidio. The presidio was formally founded September 17, 1776, at what is now known as Fort Point. The ship San Carlos had brought a number of persons; these with the settlers who had come up from Monterey made an assemblage of more than one hundred and fifty persons.

After the founding of the presidio Lieutenant Moraga in command of the military and Captain Quiros of the San Carlos, set vigorously at work to build a church for the mission. A wooden building having been constructed on the 9th of October, 1776, the mission was dedicated, Father Palou conducting the service, assisted by Fathers Cambon, Nocedal and Peña. The site selected for the mission was on the Laguna de los Dolores. The lands at the mission were not very productive. The mission, however, was fairly prosperous. In 1820 it owned 11,240 cattle and the total product of wheat was 114,480 bushels. In 1820 there were 1,252 neophytes attached to it. The death rate was very heavy—the average rate being 12.4 per cent of the population. In 1832 the population had decreased to two hundred and four and at the time of secularization it had declined to one hundred and fifty. A number of neophytes had been taken to the new mission of San Francisco Solano.

SAN JUAN CAPISTRANO.

The revolt of the Indians at San Diego delayed the founding of San Juan Capistrano a year. October 30, 1775, the initiatory services of the founding had been held when a messenger came with the news of the uprising of the savages and the massacre of Father Jaume and others. The bells which had been hung on a tree were taken down and buried. The soldiers and the padres hastened to San Diego. November 1, 1776, Fathers Serra, Mugartegui and Amurrio, with an escort of soldiers, arrived at the site formerly selected. The bells were dug up and hung on a tree, an enramada of boughs was constructed and Father Serra said mass. The first location of the mission was several miles northeasterly from the present site at the foot of the mountain. The abandoned site is still known as la Mision Vieja (the Old Mission). Just when the change of location was made is not known.

The erection of a stone church was begun in February, 1797, and completed in 1806. A master builder had been brought from Mexico and under his superintendence the neophytes did the mechanical labor. It was the largest and handsomest church in California and was the pride of mission architecture. The year 1812 was known in California as el año de los temblores—the year of earthquakes. For months the seismic disturbance was almost continuous. On Sunday, December 8, 1812, a severe shock threw down the lofty church tower, which crashed through the vaulted roof on the congregation below. The padre who was celebrating mass escaped through the sacristy. Of the fifty persons present only five or six escaped. The church was never rebuilt. "There is not much doubt," says Bancroft, "that the disaster was due rather to faulty construction than to the violence of the temblor." The edifice was of the usual cruciform shape, about 90x180 feet on the ground, with very thick walls and arched dome-like roof all constructed of stones imbedded in mortar or cement. The stones were not hewn, but of irregular size and shape, a kind of structure evidently requiring great skill to ensure solidity. The mission reached its maximum in 1819; from that on till the date of its secularization there was a rapid decline in the numbers of its live stock and of its neophytes.

This was one of the missions in which Governor Figueroa tried his experiment of forming Indian pueblos of the neophytes. For a time the experiment was a partial success, but eventually it went the way of all the other missions. Its lands were granted to private individuals and the neophytes scattered. Its picturesque ruins are a great attraction to tourists.

SANTA CLARA.

The mission of Santa Clara was founded January 12, 1777. The site had been selected some time before and two missionaries designated for service at it, but the comandante of the territory, Rivera y Moncada, who was an exceedingly obstinate person, had opposed the founding on various pretexts, but positive orders coming from the viceroy Rivera did not longer delay, so on the 6th of January, 1777, a detachment of soldiers under Lieutenant Moraga, accompanied by Father Peña, was sent from San Francisco to the site selected which was about sixteen leagues south of San Francisco. Here under an enramada the services of dedication were held. The Indians were not averse to receiving a new religion and at the close of the year sixty-seven had been baptized.

The mission was quite prosperous and became one of the most important in the territory. It was located in the heart of a rich agricultural district. The total product of wheat was 175,800 bushels. In 1828 the mission flocks and herds numbered over 30,000 animals. The neophyte population in 1827 was 1,464. The death rate was high, averaging 12.63 per cent of the population. The total number of baptisms was 8,640; number of deaths 6,950. In 1834 the population had declined to 800. Secularization was effected in 1837.

SAN BUENAVENTURA.

The founding of San Buenaventura had been long delayed. It was to have been among the first missions founded by Father Serra; it proved to be his last. On the 26th of March, 1782, Governor de Neve, accompanied by Father Serra (who had come down afoot from San Carlos), and Father Cambon, with a convoy of soldiers and a number of neophytes, set out from San Gabriel to found the mission. At the first camping place Governor de Neve was recalled to San Gabriel by a message from Col. Pedro Fazes, informing him of the orders of the council of war to proceed against the Yumas who had the previous year destroyed the two missions on the Colorado river and massacred the missionaries.

On the 29th, the remainder of the company reached a place on the coast named by Portolá in 1769, Asuncion de Nuestra Señora, which had for some time been selected for a mission site. Near it was a large Indian rancheria. On Easter Sunday, March 31st, the mission was formally founded with the usual ceremonies and dedicated to San Buenaventura (Giovanni de Fidenza of Tuscany), a follower of St. Francis, the founder of the Franciscans.

The progress of the mission was slow at first, only two adults were baptized in 1782, the year of its founding. The first buildings built of wood were destroyed by fire. The church still used for service, built of brick and adobe, was completed and dedicated, September 9, 1809. The earthquake of December 8, 1812, damaged the church to such an extent that the tower and part of the façade had to be rebuilt. After the earthquake the whole site of the mission for a time seemed to be sinking. The inhabitants, fearful of being engulfed by the sea, removed to San Joaquin y Santa Ana, where they remained several months. The mission attained its greatest prosperity in 1816, when its neophyte population numbered 1,330 and it owned 23,400 cattle.

SANTA BARBARA.

Governor Felipe de Neve founded the presidio of Santa Barbara April 21, 1782. Father Serra had hoped to found the mission at the same time, but in this he was disappointed. His death in 1784 still further delayed the founding and it was not until the latter part of 1786 that everything was in readiness for the establishing of the new mission. On the 22d of November Father Lasuen, who had succeeded Father Serra as president of the missions, arrived at Santa Barbara, accompanied by two missionaries recently from Mexico. He selected a site about a mile distant from the presidio. The place was called Taynagan (Rocky Hill) by the Indians. There was a plentiful supply of stone on the site for building and an abundance of water for irrigation.

On the 15th of December, 1786, Father Lasuen, in a hut of boughs, celebrated the first mass; but December 4, the day that the fiesta of Santa Barbara is commemorated, is considered the date of its founding. Part of the services were held on that day. A chapel built of adobes and roofed with thatch was erected in 1787. Several other buildings of adobe were erected the same year. In 1788, tile took the place of thatch. In 1789, a second church, much larger than the first, was built. A third church of adobe was commenced in 1793 and finished in 1794. A brick portico was added in 1795 and the walls plastered.

The great earthquake of December, 1812, demolished the mission church and destroyed nearly all the buildings. The years 1813 and 1814 were spent in removing the debris of the ruined buildings and in preparing for the erection of new ones. The erection of the present mission church was begun in 1815. It was completed and dedicated September 10, 1820.

Father Caballeria, in his History of Santa Barbara, gives the dimensions of the church as follows: "Length (including walls), sixty varas; width, fourteen varas; height, ten varas (a vara is thirty-four inches)." The walls are of stone and rest on a foundation of rock and cement. They are six feet thick and are further strengthened by buttresses. Notwithstanding the building has withstood the storms of four score years, it is still in an excellent state of preservation. Its exterior has not been disfigured by attempts at modernizing.

The highest neophyte population was reached at Santa Barbara in 1803, when it numbered 1,792. The largest number of cattle was 5,200 in 1809. In 1834, the year of secularization, the neophytes numbered 556, which was a decrease of 155 from the number in 1830. At such a rate of decrease it would not, even if mission rule had continued, have taken more than a dozen years to depopulate the mission.

LA PURISIMA CONCEPCION.

Two missions, San Buenaventura and Santa Barbara, had been founded on the Santa Barbara channel in accordance with Neve's report of 1777, in which he recommended the founding of three missions and a presidio in that district. It was the intention of General La Croix to conduct these on a different plan from that prevailing in the older missions. The natives were not to be gathered into a missionary establishment, but were to remain in their rancherias, which were to be converted into mission pueblos. The Indians were to receive instruction in religion, industrial arts and self-government while comparatively free from restraint. The plan which no doubt originated with Governor de Neve, was a good one theoretically, and possibly might have been practically. The missionaries were bitterly opposed to it. Unfortunately it was tried first in the Colorado river missions among the fierce and treacherous Yumas. The massacre of the padres and soldiers of these missions was attributed to this innovation.

In establishing the channel missions the missionaries opposed the inauguration of this plan and by their persistence succeeded in setting it aside; and the old system was adopted. La Purisima Concepcion, or the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin, the third of the channel missions, was founded December 8, 1787, by Father Lasuen at a place called by the natives Algsacupi. Its location is about twelve miles from the ocean on the Santa Ynez river. Three years after its founding three hundred converts had been baptized but not all of them lived at the mission. The first church was a temporary structure. The second church, built of adobe and roofed with tile, was completed in 1802. December 21, 1812, an earthquake demolished the church and also about one hundred adobe houses of the neophytes. A site across the river and about four miles distant from the former one, was selected for new buildings. A temporary building for a church was erected there. A new church, built of adobe and roofed with tile, was completed and dedicated in 1818.

The Indians revolted in 1824 and damaged the building. They took possession of it and a battle lasting four hours was fought between one hundred and thirty soldiers and four hundred Indians. The neophytes cut loop holes in the church and used two old rusty cannon and a few guns they possessed; but, unused to fire arms, they were routed with the loss of several killed. During the revolt which lasted several months four white men and fifteen or twenty Indians were killed. The hostiles, most of whom fled to the Tulares, were finally subdued. The leaders were punished with imprisonment and the others returned to their missions.

This mission's population was largest in 1804, when it numbered 1,520. In 1834 there were but 407 neophytes connected with it. It was secularized in February, 1835. During mission rule from 1787 to 1834, the total number of Indian children baptized was 1,492; died 902, which was a lower death rate than at most of the southern missions.

SANTA CRUZ.

Santa Cruz, one of the smallest of the twenty-one missions of California, was founded September 25, 1790. The mission was never very prosperous. In 1798 many of the neophytes deserted and the same year a flood covered the planting fields and damaged the church. In 1812 the neophytes murdered the missionary in charge, Padre Andrés Quintana. They claimed that he had treated them with great cruelty. Five of those implicated in the murder received two hundred lashes each and were sentenced to work in chains from two to ten years. Only one survived the punishment. The maximum of its population was reached in 1798, when there were six hundred and forty-four Indians in the mission fold. The total number baptized from the date of its founding to 1834 was 2,466; the total number of deaths was 2,034. The average death rate was 10.93 per cent of the population. At the time of its secularization in 1834 there were only two hundred and fifty Indians belonging to the mission.

LA SOLEDAD.

The mission of our Lady of Solitude was founded September 29, 1791. The site selected had borne the name Soledad (solitude) ever since the first exploration of the country. The location was thirty miles northeast of San Carlos de Monterey. La Soledad, by which name it was generally known, was unfortunate in its early missionaries. One of them, Padre Gracia, was supposed to be insane and the other, Padre Rubi, was very immoral. Rubi was later on expelled from his college for licentiousness. At the close of the century the mission had become fairly prosperous, but in 1802 an epidemic broke out and five or six deaths occurred daily. The Indians in alarm fled from the mission. The largest population of the mission was seven hundred and twenty-five in 1805. At the time of secularization its population had decreased to three hundred. The total number of baptisms during its existence was 2,222; number of deaths 1,803.

SAN JOSE.

St. Joseph had been designated by the visitador General Galvez and Father Junipero Serra as the patron saint of the mission colonization of California. Thirteen missions had been founded and yet none had been dedicated to San José. Orders came from Mexico that one be established and named for him. Accordingly a detail of a corporal and five men, accompanied by Father Lasuen, president of the missions, proceeded to the site selected, which was about twelve miles northerly from the pueblo of San José. There, on June 11, 1797, the mission was founded. The mission was well located agriculturally and became one of the most prosperous in California. In 1820 it had a population of 1,754, the highest of any mission except San Luis Rey. The total number of baptisms from its founding to 1834 was 6,737; deaths 5,109. Secularization was effected in 1836-37. The total valuation of the mission property, not including lands or the church, was $155,000.

SAN JUAN BAPTISTA.

In May, 1797, Governor Borica ordered the comandante at Monterey to detail a corporal and five soldiers to proceed to a site that had been previously chosen for a mission which was about ten leagues northeast from Monterey. Here the soldiers erected of wood a church, priest's house, granary and guard house. June 24, 1797, President Lasuen, assisted by Fathers Catala and Martiari, founded the mission of San Juan Bautista (St. John the Baptist). At the close of the year, eighty-five converts had been baptized. The neighboring Indian tribes were hostile and some of them had to be killed before others learned to behave themselves. A new church, measuring 60x160 feet, was completed and dedicated in 1812. San Juan was the only mission whose population increased between 1820 and 1830. This was due to the fact that its numbers were recruited from the eastern tribes, its location being favorable for obtaining new recruits from the gentiles. The largest population it ever reached was 1,248 in 1823. In 1834 there were but 850 neophytes at the mission.

SAN MIGUEL.

Midway between the old missions of San Antonio and San Luis Obispo, on the 25th of July, 1797, was founded the mission of San Miguel Arcangel. The two old missions contributed horses, cattle and sheep to start the new one. The mission had a propitious beginning; fifteen children were baptized on the day the mission was founded. At the close of the century the number of converts reached three hundred and eighty-five, of whom fifty-three had died. The mission population numbered 1,076 in 1814; after that it steadily declined until, in 1834, there were only 599 attached to the establishment. Total number of baptisms was 2,588; deaths 2,038. The average death rate was 6.91 per cent of the population, the lowest rate in any of the missions. The mission was secularized in 1836.

SAN FERNANDO REY DE ESPAÑA.

In the closing years of the century explorations were made for new mission sites in California. These were to be located between missions already founded. Among those selected at that time was the site of the mission San Fernando on the Encino Rancho, then occupied by Francisco Reyes. Reyes surrendered whatever right he had to the land and the padres occupied his house for a dwelling while new buildings were in the course of erection.

September 8, 1797, with the usual ceremonies, the mission was founded by President Lasuen, assisted by Father Dumetz. According to instructions from Mexico it was dedicated to San Fernando Rey de España (Fernando III, King of Spain, 1217-1251). At the end of the year 1797, fifty-five converts had been gathered into the mission fold and at the end of the century three hundred and fifty-two had been baptized.

The adobe church began before the close of the century was completed and dedicated in December, 1806. It had a tiled roof. It was but slightly injured by the great earthquakes of December, 1812, which were so destructive to the mission buildings at San Juan Capistrano, Santa Barbara, La Purisima and Santa Ynez. This mission reached its greatest prosperity in 1819, when its neophyte population numbered 1,080. The largest number of cattle owned by it at one time was 12,800 in 1819.

Its decline was not so rapid as that of some of the other missions, but the death rate, especially among the children, was fully as high. Of the 1,367 Indian children baptized there during the existence of mission rule 965, or over seventy per cent, died in childhood. It was not strange that the fearful death rate both of children and adults at the missions sometimes frightened the neophytes into running away.

SAN LUIS REY DE FRANCIA.

Several explorations had been made for a mission site between San Diego and San Juan Capistrano. There was quite a large Indian population that had not been brought into the folds of either mission. In October, 1797, a new exploration of this territory was ordered and a site was finally selected, although the agricultural advantages were regarded as not satisfactory.

* Governor Borica, February 28, 1798, issued orders to the comandante at San Diego to furnish a detail of soldiers to aid in erecting the necessary buildings. June 13, 1798, President Lasuen, the successor of President Serra, assisted by Fathers Peyri and Santiago, with the usual services, founded the new mission. It was named San Luis Rey de Francia (St. Louis, King of France). Its location was near a river on which was bestowed the name of the mission. The mission flourished from its very beginning. Its controlling power was Padre Antonio Peyri. He remained in charge of it from its founding almost to its downfall, in all thirty-three years. He was a man of great executive abilities and under his administration it became one of the largest and most prosperous missions in California. It reached its maximum in 1826, when its neophyte population numbered 2,869, the largest number at one time connected with any mission in the territory.

The asistencia or auxiliary mission of San Antonio was established at Pala, seven leagues easterly from the parent mission. A chapel was erected here and regular services held. One of the padres connected with San Luis Rey was in charge of this station. Father Peyri left California in 1831, with the exiled Governor Victoria. He went to Mexico and from there to Spain and lastly to Rome, where he died. The mission was converted into an Indian pueblo in 1834, but the pueblo was not a success. Most of the neophytes drifted to Los Angeles and San Gabriel. During the Mexican conquest American troops were stationed there. It has recently been partially repaired and is now used for a Franciscan school under charge of Father J. J. O'Keefe.

SANTA YNEZ.

Santa Ynez was the last mission founded in Southern California. It was established September 17, 1804. Its location is about forty miles northwesterly from Santa Barbara, on the easterly side of the Santa Ynez mountains and eighteen miles southeasterly from La Purisima. Father Tapis, president of the missions from 1803 to 1812, preached the sermon and was assisted in the ceremonies by Fathers Cipies, Calzada and Gutierrez. Carrillo, the comandante at the presidio, was present, as were also a number of neophytes from Santa Barbara and La Purisima. Some of these were transferred to the new mission.

The earthquake of December, 1812, shook down a portion of the church and destroyed a number of the neophytes' houses. In 1815 the erection of a new church was begun. It was built of adobes, lined with brick, and was completed and dedicated July 4, 1817. The Indian revolt of 1824, described in the sketch of La Purisima, broke out first at this mission. The neophytes took possession of the church. The mission guard defended themselves and the padre. At the approach of the troops from Santa Barbara the Indians fled to La Purisima.

San Ynez attained its greatest population, 770, in 1816. In 1834 its population had decreased to 334. From its founding in 1804 to 1834, when the decrees of secularization were put in force, 757 Indian children were baptized and 519 died, leaving only 238, or about thirty per cent of those baptized to grow up.

SAN RAFAEL.

San Rafael was the first mission established north of the Bay of San Francisco. It was founded December 14, 1817. At first it was an asistencia or branch of San Francisco. An epidemic had broken out in the Mission Dolores and a number of the Indians were transferred to San Rafael to escape the plague. Later on it attained to the dignity of a mission. In 1828 its population was 1,140. After 1830 it began to decline and at the time of its secularization in 1834 there were not more than 500 connected with it. In the seventeen years of its existence under mission rule there were 1,873 baptisms and 608 deaths. The average death rate was 6.09 per cent of the population. The mission was secularized in 1834. All traces of the mission building have disappeared.

SAN FRANCISCO SOLANO.

The mission of San Francisco de Asis had fallen into a rapid decline. The epidemic that had carried off a number of the neophytes and had caused the transfer of a considerable number to San Rafael had greatly reduced its population. Besides, the sterility of the soil in the vicinity of the mission necessitated going a long distance for agricultural land and pasturage for the herds and flocks. On this account and also for the reason that a number of new converts might be obtained from the gentiles living in the district north of the bay, Governor Arguello and the mission authorities decided to establish a mission in that region. Explorations were made in June and July, 1823. On the 4th of July a site was selected, a cross blessed and raised, a volley of musketry fired and mass said at a place named New San Francisco, but afterwards designated as the Mission of San Francisco Solano. On the 25th of August work was begun on the mission building and on the 4th of April, 1824, a church, 24x105 feet, built of wood, was dedicated.

It had been intended to remove the neophytes from the old mission of San Francisco to the new; but the padres of the old mission opposed its depopulation and suppression. A compromise was effected by allowing all neophytes of the old mission who so elected to go to the new. Although well located, the Mission of Solano was not prosperous. Its largest population, 996, was reached in 1832. The total number of baptisms were 1,315; deaths, 651. The average death rate was 7.8 per cent of the population. The mission was secularized in 1835, at which time there were about 550 neophytes attached to it.

The architecture of the missions was Moorish—that is, if it belonged to any school. The padres in most cases were the architects and master builders. The main feature of the buildings was massiveness. Built of adobe or rough stone, their walls were of great thickness. Most of the church buildings were narrow, their width being out of proportion to their length. This was necessitated by the difficulty of procuring joists and rafters of sufficient length for wide buildings. The padres had no means or perhaps no knowledge of trussing a roof, and the width of the building had to be proportioned to the length of the timbers procurable. Some of the buildings were planned with an eye for the picturesque, others for utility only. The sites selected for the mission buildings in nearly every case commanded a fine view of the surrounding country. In their prime, their white walls looming up on the horizon could be seen at long distance and acted as beacons to guide the traveler to their hospitable shelter.

Col. J. J. Warner, who came to California in 1831, and saw the mission buildings before they had fallen into decay, thus describes their general plan: "As soon after the founding of a mission as circumstances would permit, a large pile of buildings in the form of a quadrangle, composed in part of burnt brick, but chiefly of sun-dried ones, was erected around a spacious court. A large and capacious church, which usually occupied one of the outer corners of the quadrangle, was a conspicuous part of the pile. In this massive building, covered with red tile, was the habitation of the friars, rooms for guests and for the major domos and their families. In other buildings of the quadrangle were hospital wards, storehouses and granaries, rooms for carding, spinning and weaving of woolen fabrics, shops for blacksmiths, joiners and carpenters, saddlers, shoemakers and soap boilers, and cellars for storing the product (wine and brandy) of the vineyards. Near the habitation of the friars another building of similar material was placed and used as quarters for a small number—about a corporal's guard—of soldiers under command of a non-commissioned officer, to hold the Indian neophytes in check as well as to protect the mission from the attacks of hostile Indians." The Indians, when the buildings of the establishment were complete, lived in adobe houses built in lines near the quadrangle. Some of the buildings of the square were occupied by the alcaldes or Indian bosses. When the Indians were gathered into the missions at first they lived in brush shanties constructed in the same manner as their forefathers had built them for generations. In some of the missions these huts were not replaced by adobe buildings for a generation or more. Vancouver, who visited the Mission of San Francisco in 1792, sixteen years after its founding, describes the Indian village with its brush-built huts. He says: "These miserable habitations, each of which was allotted for the residence of a whole family, were erected with some degree of uniformity about three or four feet asunder in straight rows, leaving lanes or passageways at right angles between them; but these were so abominably infested with every kind of filth and nastiness as to be rendered no less offensive than degrading to the human species."

Of the houses at Santa Clara, Vancouver says: "The habitations were not so regularly disposed nor did it (the village) contain so many as the village of San Francisco, yet the same horrid state of uncleanness and laziness seemed to pervade the whole." Better houses were then in the course of construction at Santa Clara. "Each house would contain two rooms and a garret with a garden in the rear." Vancouver visited San Carlos de Monterey in 1792, twenty-two years after its founding. He says: "Notwithstanding these people are taught and employed from time to time in many of the occupations most useful to civil society, they had not made themselves any more comfortable habitations than those of their forefathers; nor did they seem in any respect to have benefited by the instruction they had received."

Captain Beechey, of the English navy, who visited San Francisco and the missions around the bay in 1828, found the Indians at San Francisco still living in their filthy hovels and grinding acorns for food. "San José (mission)," he says, "on the other hand, was all neatness, cleanliness and comfort." At San Carlos he found that the filthy hovels described by Vancouver had nearly all disappeared and the Indians were comfortably housed. He adds: "Sickness in general prevailed to an incredible extent in all the missions."

CHAPTER VI.

PRESIDIOS OF CALIFORNIA.

SAN DIEGO.

THE presidio was an essential feature of the Spanish colonization of America. It was usually a fortified square of brick or stone, inside of which were the barracks of the soldiers, the officers' quarters, a church, store houses for provisions and military supplies. The gates at the entrance were closed at night, and it was usually provisioned for a siege. In the colonization of California there were four presidios established, namely: San Diego, Monterey, San Francisco and Santa Barbara. Each was the headquarters of a military district and besides a body of troops kept at the presidio it furnished guards for the missions in its respective district and also for the pueblos if there were any in the district. The first presidio was founded at San Diego. As stated in a previous chapter, the two ships of the expedition by sea for the settlement of California arrived at the port of San Diego in a deplorable condition from scurvy. The San Antonia, after a voyage of fifty-nine days, arrived on April 11; the San Carlos, although she had sailed a month earlier, did not arrive until April 29, consuming one hundred and ten days in the voyage. Don Miguel Constansó, the engineer who came on this vessel, says in his report: "The scurvy had infected all without exception; in such sort that on entering San Diego already two men had died of the said sickness; most of the seamen, and half of the troops, found themselves prostrate in their beds; only four mariners remained on their feet, and attended, aided by the troops, to trimming and furling the sails and other working of the ship." "The San Antonia," says Constansó, "had the half of its crew equally affected by the scurvy, of which illness two men had likewise died." This vessel, although it had arrived at the port on the 11th of April, had evidently not landed any of its sick. On the 1st of May, Don Pedro Fages, the commander of the troops, Constansó and Estorace, the second captain of the San Carlos, with twenty-five soldiers, set out to find a watering place where they could fill their barrels with fresh water. "Following the west shore of the port, after going a matter of three leagues, they arrived at the banks of a river hemmed in with a fringe of willows and cottonwoods. Its channel must have been twenty varas wide and it discharges into an estuary which at high tide could admit the launch and made it convenient for accomplishing the taking on of water." * * * "Having reconnoitered the watering place, the Spaniards betook themselves back on board the vessels and as these were found to be very far away from the estuary in which the river discharges, their captains, Vicente Vila and Don Juan Perez, resolved to approach it as closely as they could in order to give less work to the people handling the launches. These labors were accomplished with satiety of hardship; for from one day to the next the number of the sick kept increasing, along with the dying of the most aggravated cases and augmented the fatigue of the few who remained on their feet."

"Immediate to the beach on the side toward the east a scanty enclosure was constructed formed of a parapet of earth and fascines, which was garnished with two cannons. They disembarked some sails and awnings from the packets with which they made two tents capacious enough for a hospital. At one side the two officers, the missionary fathers and the surgeon put up their own tents; the sick were brought in launches to this improvised presidio and hospital." "But these diligencies," says Constansó, "were not enough to procure them health." * * * "The cold made itself felt with rigor at night in the barracks and the sun by day, alternations which made the sick suffer cruelly, two or three of them dying every day. And this whole expedition, which had been composed of more than ninety men, saw itself reduced to only eight soldiers and as many mariners in a state to attend to the safeguarding of the barks, the working of the launches, custody of the camp and service of the sick."

Rivera y Moncada, the commander of the first detachment of the land expedition, arrived at San Diego May 14. It was decided by the officers to remove the camp to a point near the river. This had not been done before on account of the small force able to work and the lack of beasts of burden. Rivera's men were all in good health and after a day's rest "all were removed to a new camp, which was transferred one league further north on the right side of the river upon a hill of middling height."

Here a presidio was built, the remains of which can still be seen. It was a parapet of earth similar to that thrown up at the first camp, which, according to Bancroft, was probably within the limits of New Town and the last one in Old Town or North San Diego.

While Portolá's expedition was away searching for the port of Monterey, the Indians made an attack on the camp at San Diego, killed a Spanish youth and wounded Padre Viscaïno, the blacksmith, and a Lower California neophyte. The soldiers remaining at San Diego surrounded the buildings with a stockade. Constansó says, on the return of the Spaniards of Portolá's expedition: "They found in good condition their humble buildings, surrounded with a palisade of trunks of trees, capable of a good defense in case of necessity."

"In 1782, the presidial force at San Diego, besides the commissioned officers, consisted of five corporals and forty-six soldiers. Six men were constantly on duty at each of the three missions of the district, San Diego, San Juan Capistrano and San Gabriel; while four served at the pueblo of Los Angeles, thus leaving a sergeant, two corporals and about twenty-five men to garrison the fort, care for the horses and a small herd of cattle, and to carry the mails, which latter duty was the hardest connected with the presidio service in time of peace. There were a carpenter and blacksmith constantly employed, besides a few servants, mostly natives. The population of the district in 1790, not including Indians, was 220."*

wall, but even then the fort was not a very formidable defense. Vancouver, the English navigator, who visited it in 1793, describes it as "irregularly built on very uneven ground, which makes it liable to some inconveniences without the obvious appearance of any object for selecting such a spot." It then mounted three small brass cannon.

Gradually a town grew up around the presidio. Robinson, who visited San Diego in 1829, thus describes it: "On the lawn beneath the hill on which the presidio is built stood about thirty houses of rude appearance, mostly occupied by retired veterans, not so well constructed in respect either to beauty or stability as the houses at Monterey, with the exception of that belonging to our Administrador, Don Juan Bandini, whose mansion, then in an unfinished state, bid fair, when completed, to surpass any other in the country."

Under Spain there was attempt at least to keep the presidio in repair, but under Mexican domination it fell into decay. Dana describes it as he saw it in 1836: "The first place we went to was the old ruinous presidio, which stands on rising ground near the village which it overlooks. It is built in the form of an open square, like all the other presidios, and was in a most ruinous state, with the exception of one side, in which the comandante lived with his family. There were only two guns, one of which was spiked and the other had no carriage. Twelve half clothed and half starved looking fellows composed the garrison; and they, it was said, had not a musket apiece. The small settlement lay directly below the fort composed of about forty dark brown looking huts or houses and three or four larger ones whitewashed, which belonged to the gente de razon."

THE PRESIDIO OF MONTEREY.

In a previous chapter has been narrated the story of Portolá's expedition in search of Monterey Bay, how the explorers, failing to recognize it, passed on to the northward and discovered the great Bay of San Francisco. On their return they set up a cross at what they supposed was the Bay of Monterey; and at the foot of the cross buried a letter giving information to any ship that might come up the coast in search of them that they had returned to San Diego. They had continually been on the lookout for the San José, which was to co-operate with them, but that vessel had been lost at sea with all on board. On their return to San Diego, in January, 1770, preparations were made for a return as soon as a vessel should arrive. It was not until the 16th of April that the San Antonio, the only vessel available, was ready to depart for the second objective point of settlement. On the 17th of April, Governor Portolá, Lieutenant Fages, Father Crespi and nineteen soldiers took up their line of march for Monterey. They followed the trail made in 1769 and reached the point where they had set up the cross April 24. They found it decorated with feathers, bows and arrows and a string of fish. Evidently the Indians regarded it as the white man's fetich and tried to propitiate it by offerings.

The San Antonio, bearing Father Serra, Pedro Prat, the surgeon, and Miguel Constansó, the civil engineer, and supplies for the mission and presidio, arrived the last day of May. Portolá was still uncertain whether this was really Monterey Bay. It was hard to discover in the open roadstead stretching out before them Viscaino's land-locked harbor, sheltered from all winds. After the arrival of the San Antonio the officers of the land and sea expedition made a reconnaissance of the bay and all concurred that at last they had reached the destined port. They located the oak under whose wide-spreading branches Padre Ascension, Viscaino's chaplain, had celebrated mass in 1602, and the springs of fresh water near by. Preparations were begun at once for the founding of mission and presidio. A shelter of boughs was constructed, an altar raised and the bells hung upon the branch of a tree. Father Serra sang mass and as they had no musical instrument, salvos of artillery and volleys of musketry furnished an accompaniment to the service. After the religious services the royal standard was raised and Governor Portolá took possession of the country in the name of King Carlos III., King of Spain. The ceremony closed with the pulling of grass and the casting of stones around, significant of entire possession of the earth and its products. After the service all feasted.

Two messengers were sent by Portolá with dispatches to the city of Mexico. A day's journey below San Diego they met Rivera and twenty soldiers coming with a herd of cattle and a flock of sheep to stock the mission pastures. Rivera sent back five of his soldiers with Portolá's carriers. The messengers reached Todos Santos near Cape San Lucas in forty-nine days from Monterey. From there the couriers were sent to San Blas by ship, arriving at the city of Mexico August 10. There was great rejoicing at the capital. Marquis Le Croix and Visitador Galvez received congratulations in the King's name for the extension of his domain.

Portolá superintended the building of some rude huts for the shelter of the soldiers, the officers and the padres. Around the square containing the huts a palisade of poles was constructed. July 9, Portolá having turned over the command of the troops to Lieutenant Fages, embarked on the San Antonia for San Blas; with him went the civil engineer, Constansó, from whose report I have frequently quoted. Neither of them ever returned to California.

The difficulty of reaching California by ship on account of the head winds that blow down the coast caused long delays in the arrival of vessels with supplies. This brought about a scarcity of provisions at the presidios and missions.

In 1772 the padres of San Gabriel were reduced to a milk diet and what little they could obtain from the Indians. At Monterey and San Antonio the padres and the soldiers were obliged to live on vegetables. In this emergency Lieutenant Fages and a squad of soldiers went on a bear hunt. They spent three months in the summer of 1772 killing bears in the Cañada de los Osos (Bear Cañon). The soldiers and missionaries had a plentiful supply of bear meat. There were not enough cattle in the country to admit of slaughtering any for food. The presidial walls which were substituted for the palisades were built of adobes and stone. The inclosure measured one hundred and ten yards on each side. The buildings were roofed with tiles. "On the north were the main entrance, the guard house, and the warehouses; on the west the houses of the governor comandante and other officers, some finer apartments in all; on the east nine houses for soldiers, and a blacksmith shop; and on the south, besides nine similar houses, was the presidio church, opposite the main gateway."*

The military force at the presidio consisted of cavalry, infantry and artillery, their numbers varying from one hundred to one hundred and twenty in all. These soldiers furnished guards for the missions of San Carlos, San Antonio, San Miguel, Soledad and San Luis Obispo. The total population of gente de razon in the district at the close of the century numbered four hundred and ninety. The rancho "del rey" or rancho of the king was located where Salinas City now stands. This rancho was managed by the soldiers of presidio and was intended to furnish the military with meat and a supply of horses for the cavalry. At the presidio a number of invalidated soldiers who had served out their time were settled; these were allowed to cultivate land and raise cattle on the unoccupied lands of the public domain. A town gradually grew up around the presidio square.

Vancouver, the English navigator, visited the presidio of Monterey in 1792 and describes it as it then appeared: "The buildings of the presidio form a parallelogram or long square comprehending an area of about three hundred yards long by two hundred and fifty wide, making one entire enclosure. The external wall is of the same magnitude and built with the same materials, and except that the officers' apartments are covered with red tile made in the neighborhood, the whole presents the same lonely, uninteresting appearance as that already described at San Francisco. Like that establishment, the several buildings for the use of the officers, soldiers, and for the protection of stores and provisions are erected along the walls on the inside of the inclosure, which admits of but one entrance for carriages or persons on horseback; this, as at San Francisco, is on the side of the square fronting the church which was rebuilding with stone like that at San Carlos."

*Bancroft's History of California, Vol. I.

"At each corner of the square is a small kind of block house raised a little above the top of the wall where swivels might be mounted for its protection. On the outside, before the entrance into the presidio, which fronts the shores of the bay, are placed seven cannon, four nine and three three-pounders, mounted. The guns are planted on the open plain ground without breastwork or other screen for those employed in working them or the least protection from the weather."

THE PRESIDIO OF SAN FRANCISCO.

In a previous chapter I have given an account of the discovery of San Francisco Bay by Portolá's expedition in 1769. The discovery of that great bay seems to have been regarded as an unimportant event by the governmental officials. While there was great rejoicing at the city of Mexico over the founding of a mission for the conversion of a few naked savages, the discovery of the bay was scarcely noticed, except to construe it into some kind of a miracle. Father Serra assumed that St. Francis had concealed Monterey from the explorers and led them to the discovery of the bay in order that he (St. Francis) might have a mission named for him. Indeed, the only use to which the discovery could be put, according to Serra's ideas, was a site for a mission on its shores, dedicated to the founder of the Franciscans. Several explorations were made with this in view. In 1772, Lieutenant Fages, Father Crespi and sixteen soldiers passed up the western side of the bay and in 1774 Captain Rivera, Father Palou and a squad of soldiers passed up the eastern shore, returning by way of Monte Diablo, Amador valley and Alameda creek to the Santa Clara valley.

In the latter part of the year 1774, viceroy Bucureli ordered the founding of a mission and presidio at San Francisco. Hitherto all explorations of the bay had been made by land expeditions. No one had ventured on its waters. In 1775 Lieutenant Juan de Ayala of the royal navy was sent in the old pioneer mission ship, the San Carlos, to make a survey of it. August 5, 1775, he passed through the Golden Gate. He moored his ship at an island called by him

Nuestra Señora de los Angeles, now Angel Island. He spent forty days in making explorations. His ship was the first vessel to sail upon the great Bay of San Francisco.

In 1774, Captain Juan Bautista de Anza, commander of the presidio of Tubac in Sonora, had made an exploration of a route from Sonora via the Colorado river, across the desert and through the San Gorgonia pass to San Gabriel mission. From Tubac to the Colorado river the route had been traveled before but from the Colorado westward the country was a terra incognita. He was guided over this by a lower California neophyte who had deserted from San Gabriel mission and alone had reached the rancherías on the Colorado.

After Anza's return to Sonora he was commissioned by the viceroy to recruit soldiers and settlers for San Francisco. October 23, 1775, Anza set out from Tubac with an expedition numbering two hundred and thirty-five persons, composed of soldiers and their families, colonists, musketeers and vaqueros. They brought with them large herds of horses, mules and cattle. The journey was accomplished without loss of life, but with a considerable amount of suffering. January 4, 1776, the immigrants arrived at San Gabriel mission, where they stopped to rest, but were soon compelled to move on, provisions at the mission becoming scarce. They arrived at Monterey March 10. Here they went into camp. Anza with an escort of soldiers proceeded to San Francisco to select a presidio site. Having found a site he returned to Monterey. Rivera, the commander of the territory, had manifested a spirit of jealousy toward Anza and had endeavored to thwart him in his attempts to found a settlement. Disgusted with the action of the commander, Anza, leaving his colonists to the number of two hundred at Monterey took his departure from California. Anza in his explorations for a presidio site had fixed upon what is now Fort Point.

After his departure Rivera experienced a change of heart and instead of trying to delay the founding he did everything to hasten it. The imperative orders of the viceroy received at about this time brought about the change. He ordered Lieutenant Moraga, to whom Anza had turned over the command of his soldiers and colonists, to proceed at once to San Francisco with twenty soldiers to found the fort. The San Carlos, which had just arrived at Monterey, was ordered to proceed to San Francisco to assist in the founding. Moraga with his soldiers arrived June 27, and encamped on the Laguna de los Dolores, where the mission was a short time afterwards founded. Moraga decided to locate the presidio at the site selected by Anza but awaited the arrival of the San Carlos before proceeding to build. August 18 the vessel arrived. It had been driven down the coast to the latitude of San Diego by contrary winds and then up the coast to latitude 42 degrees. On the arrival of the vessel work was begun at once on the fort. A square of ninety-two varas (two hundred and forty-seven feet) on each side was inclosed with palisades. Barracks, officers' quarters and a chapel were built inside the square. September 17, 1776, was set apart for the services of founding, that being the day of the "Sores of our seraphic father St. Francis." The royal standard was raised in front of the square and the usual ceremony of pulling grass and throwing stones was performed. Possession of the region round about was taken in the name of Carlos III., King of Spain. Over one hundred and fifty persons witnessed the ceremony. Vancouver, who visited the presidio in November, 1792, describes it as a "square area whose sides were about two hundred yards in length, enclosed by a mud wall and resembling a pound for cattle. Above this wall the thatched roofs of the low small houses just made their appearance." The wall was "about fourteen feet high and five feet in breadth and was first formed by upright and horizontal rafters of large timber, between which dried sods and moistened earth were pressed as close and hard as possible, after which the whole was cased with the earth made into a sort of mud plaster which gave it the appearance of durability."

In addition to the presidio there was another fort at Fort Point named Castillo de San Joaquin. It was completed and blessed December 8, 1794. "It was of horseshoe shape, about one hundred by one hundred and twenty feet." The structure rested mainly on sand; the brick-faced adobe walls crumbled at the shock whenever a salute was fired; the guns were badly mounted and for the most part worn out, only two of the thirteen twenty-four-pounders being serviceable or capable of sending a ball across the entrance of the fort.*

PRESIDIO OF SANTA BARBARA.

Cabrillo, in 1542, found a large Indian population inhabiting the main land of the Santa Barbara channel. Two hundred and twenty-seven years later, when Portolá made his exploration, apparently there had been no decrease in the number of inhabitants. No portion of the coast offered a better field for missionary labor and Father Serra was anxious to enter it. In accordance with Governor Felipe de Neve's report of 1777, it had been decided to found three missions and a presidio on the channel. Various causes had delayed the founding and it was not until April 17, 1782, that Governor de Neve arrived at the point where he had decided to locate the presidio of Santa Barbara. The troops that were to man the fort reached San Gabriel in the fall of 1781. It was thought best for them to remain there until the rainy season was over. March 26, 1782, the governor and Father Serra, accompanied by the largest body of troops that had ever before been collected in California, set out to found the mission of San Buenaventura and the presidio. The governor, as has been stated in a former chapter, was recalled to San Gabriel. The mission was founded and the governor having rejoined the cavalcade a few weeks later proceeded to find a location for the presidio.

"On reaching a point nine leagues from San Buenaventura, the governor called a halt and in company with Father Serra at once proceeded to select a site for the presidio. The choice resulted in the adoption of the square now formed by city blocks 139, 140, 155 and 156, and bounded in common by the following streets: Figueroa, Cañon Perdido, Garden and Anacapa. A large community of Indians were residing there but orders were given to leave them undisturbed. The soldiers were at once directed to hew timbers and gather brush to erect temporary barracks which, when completed, were also used as a chapel. A large wooden cross was made that it might be planted in the center of the square and possession of the country was taken in the name of the cross, the emblem of Christianity.

* Bancroft's "History of California," Vol. I.

April 21, 1782, the soldiers formed a square and with edifying solemnity raised the cross and secured it in the earth. Father Serra blessed and consecrated the district and preached a sermon. The royal standard of Spain was unfurled.*

An inclosure, sixty varas square, was made of palisades. The Indians were friendly, and through their chief yanoalit, who controlled thirteen rancherias, details of them were secured to assist the soldiers in the work of building. The natives were paid in food and clothing for their labor.

Irrigation works were constructed, consisting of a large reservoir made of stone and cement, with a zanja for conducting water to the presidio. The soldiers, who had families, cultivated small gardens which aided in their support. Lieutenant Ortega was in command of the presidio for two years after its founding. He was succeeded by Lieutenant Felipe de Goycochea. After the founding of the mission in 1786, a bitter feud broke out between the padres and the comandante of the presidio. Goycochea claimed the right to employ the Indians in the building of the presidio as he had done before the coming of the friars. This they denied. After an acrimonious controversy the dispute was finally compromised by dividing the Indians into two bands, a mission band and a presidio band.

Gradually the palisades were replaced by an adobe wall twelve feet high. It had a stone foundation and was strongly built. The plaza or inclosed square was three hundred and thirty feet on each side. On two sides of this inclosure were ranged the family houses of the soldiers, averaging in size 15x25 feet. On one side stood the officers' quarters and the church. On the remaining side were the main entrance four varas wide, the store rooms, soldiers' quarters and a guard room; and adjoining these outside the walls were the corrals for cattle and horses. A force of from fifty to sixty soldiers was kept at the post. There were bastions at two of the corners for cannon.

The presidio was completed about 1790, with the exception of the chapel, which was not finished until 1797. Many of the soldiers when they had served out their time desired to remain in the country. These were given permission to build houses outside the walls of the presidio and in course of time a village grew up around it.

At the close of the century the population of the gente de razon of the district numbered three hundred and seventy. The presidio when completed was the best in California. Vancouver, the English navigator, who visited it in November, 1793, says of it: "The buildings appeared to be regular and well constructed; the walls clean and white and the roofs of the houses were covered with a bright red tile. The presidio excels all the others in neatness, cleanliness and other smaller though essential comforts; it is placed on an elevated part of the plain and is raised some feet from the ground by a basement story which adds much to its pleasantness."

During the Spanish régime the settlement at the presidio grew in the leisurely way that all Spanish towns grew in California. There was but little immigration from Mexico and about the only source of increase was from invalid soldiers and the children of the soldiers growing up to manhood and womanhood. It was a dreary and monotonous existence that the soldiers led at the presidios. A few of them had their families with them. These when the country became more settled had their own houses adjoining the presidio and formed the nuclei of the towns that grew up around the different forts. There was but little fighting to do and the soldiers' service consisted mainly of a round of guard duty at the forts and missions. Occasionally there were conquistas into the Indian country to secure new material for converts from the gentiles. The soldiers were occasionally employed in hunting hondas or run-aways from the missions. These when brought back were thoroughly flogged and compelled to wear clogs attached to their legs. Once a month the soldier couriers brought up from Loreta a budget of mail made up of official bandos and a few letters. These contained about all the news that reached them from their old homes in Mexico. But few of the soldiers returned to Mexico when their term of enlistment expired. In course of time these and their descendants formed the bulk of California's population.

CHAPTER VII.

PUEBLOS.

THE pueblo plan of colonization so common in Hispano-American countries did not originate with the Spanish-American colonists. It was older even than Spain herself. In early European colonization, the pueblo plan, the common square in the center of the town, the house lots grouped round it, the arable fields and the common pasture lands beyond, appears in the Aryan village, in the ancient German mark and in the old Roman praesidium. The Puritans adopted this form in their first settlements in New England. Around the public square or common where stood the meeting house and the town house, they laid off their home lots and beyond these were their cultivated fields and their common pasture lands. This form of colonization was a combination of communal interests and individual ownership. Primarily, no doubt, it was adopted for protection against the hostile aborigines of the country, and secondly for social advantage. It reversed the order of our own western colonization. The town came first, it was the initial point from which the settlement radiated; while with our western pioneers the town was an afterthought, a center point for the convenience of trade.

When it had been decided to send colonists to colonize California the settlements naturally took the pueblo form. The difficulty of obtaining regular supplies for the presidios from Mexico, added to the great expense of shipping such a long distance, was the principal cause that influenced the government to establish pueblos de gente de razon. The presidios received their shipments of grain for breadstuff from San Blas by sailing vessels. The arrival of these was uncertain. Once when the vessels were unusually long in coming, the padres and the soldiers at the presidios and missions were reduced to living on milk, bear meat and what provisions they could obtain from the Indians. When Felipe de Neve was made governor of Alta or Nueva California in 1776 he was instructed by the viceroy to make observations on the agricultural possibilities of the country and the feasibility of founding pueblos where grain could be produced to supply the military establishments.

On his journey from San Diego to San Francisco in 1777 he carefully examined the country; and as a result of his observations recommended the founding of two pueblos; one on the Rio de Porciuncula in the south, and the other on the Rio de Guadalupe in the north. On the 29th of November, 1777, the Pueblo of San José de Guadalupe was founded. The colonists were nine of the presidio soldiers from San Francisco and Monterey, who had some knowledge of farming and five of Anza's pobladores who had come with his expedition the previous years to found the presidio of San Francisco, making with their families sixty-one persons in all. The pueblo was named for the patron saint of California, San José (St. Joseph), husband of Santa Maria, Queen of the Angeles.

The site selected for the town was about a mile and a quarter north of the center of the present city. The first houses were built of palisades and the interstices plastered with mud. These huts were roofed with earth and the floor was the hard beaten ground. Each head of a family was given a suerte or sowing lot of two hundred varas square, a house lot, "ten dollars a month and a soldier's rations." Each, also, received a yoke of oxen, two cows, a mule, two sheep and two goats, together with the necessary implements and seed, all of which were to be repaid in products of the soil delivered at the royal warehouse. The first communal work done by the pobladores (colonists) was to dam the river, and construct a ditch to irrigate their sowing fields. The dam was not a success and the first sowing of grain was lost. The site selected for the houses was low and subject to overflow.

During wet winters the inhabitants were compelled to take a circuitous route of three leagues to attend church service at the mission of Santa Clara. After enduring this state of affairs through seven winters they petitioned the governor for permission to remove the pueblo further south on higher ground. The governor did not have power to grant the request. The petition was referred to the comandante-general of the Intendencia in Mexico in 1785. He seems to have studied over the matter two years and having advised with the asesor-general "finally issued a decree, June 21, 1787, to Governor Fages, authorizing the settlers to remove to the "adjacent loma (hill) selected by them as more useful and advantageous without changing or altering, for this reason, the limits and boundaries of the territory or district assigned to said settlement and to the neighboring Mission of Santa Clara, as there is no just cause why the latter should attempt to appropriate to herself that land."

Having frequently suffered from floods, it would naturally be supposed that the inhabitants, permission being granted, moved right away. They did nothing of the kind. Ten years passed and they were still located on the old marshy site, still discussing the advantages of the new site on the other side of the river. Whether the padres of the Mission of Santa Clara opposed the moving does not appear in the records, but from the last clause of the comandante-general's decree in which he says "there is not just cause why the latter (the Mission of Santa Clara) should attempt to appropriate to herself the land," it would seem that the mission padres were endeavoring to secure the new site or at least prevent its occupancy. There was a dispute between the padres and the pobladores over the boundary line between the pueblo and mission that outlived the century. After having been referred to the titled officials, civil and ecclesiastical, a boundary line was finally established, July 24, 1801, that was satisfactory to both. "According to the best evidence I have discovered," says Hall in his History of San José, "the removal of the pueblo took place in 1797," just twenty years after the founding. In 1798 the juzgado or town hall was built. It was located on Market street near El Dorado street.

The area of a pueblo was four square leagues (Spanish) or about twenty-seven square miles. This was sometimes granted in a square and sometimes in a rectangular form. The pueblo lands were divided into classes: Solares, house lots; suertes (chance), sowing fields, so named because they were distributed by lot; propios, municipal lands or lands the rent of which went to defray municipal expenses; ejidas, vacant suburbs or commons; dehesas, pasture where the large herds of the pueblo grazed; realenges, royal lands also used for raising revenue; these were unappropriated lands.

From various causes the founding of the second pueblo had been delayed. In the latter part of 1779, active preparations were begun for carrying out the plan of founding a presidio and three missions on the Santa Barbara Channel and a pueblo on the Rio Porciuncula to be named "Reyna de Los Angeles." The comandante-general of the Four Interior Provinces of the West (which embraced the Californias, Sonora, New Mexico and Viscaya), Don Teodoro de Croix or "El Cavallero de Croix," "The Knight of the Cross," as he usually styled himself, gave instructions to Don Fernando de Rivera y Moncada to recruit soldiers and settlers for the proposed presidio and pueblo in Nueva California. He, Rivera, crossed the gulf and began recruiting in Sonora and Sinaloa. His instructions were to secure twenty-four settlers, who were heads of families. They must be robust and well behaved, so that they might set a good example to the natives. Their families must accompany them and unmarried female relatives must be encouraged to go, with the view to marrying them to bachelor soldiers.

According to the regulations drafted by Governor Felipe de Neve, June 1, 1779, for the government of the province of California and approved by the king, in a royal order of the 24th of October, 1781, settlers in California from the older provinces were each to be granted a house lot and a tract of land for cultivation. Each poblador in addition was to receive $116.50 a year for the first two years, "the rations to be understood as comprehended in this amount, and in lieu of rations for the next three years they will receive $60 yearly."

Section 3 of Title 14 of the Reglamento provided that "To each poblador and to the community of the pueblo there shall be given under condition of repayment in horses and mules fit to be given and received, and in the payment of the other large and small cattle at the just prices, which are to be fixed by tariff, and of the tools and implements at cost, as it is ordained, two mares, two cows, and one calf, two sheep and two goats, all breeding animals, and one yoke of oxen or steers, one plow point, one hoe, one spade, one axe, one sickle, one wood knife, one musket and one leather shield, two horses and one cargo mule. To the community there shall likewise be given the males corresponding to the total number of cattle of different kinds distributed amongst all the inhabitants, one forge and anvil, six crowbars, six iron spades or shovels and the necessary tools for carpenter and cast work." For the government's assistance to the pobladores in starting their colony the settlers were required to sell to the presidios the surplus products of their lands and herds at fair prices, which were to be fixed by the government.

The terms offered to the settlers were certainly liberal, and by our own hardy pioneers, who in the closing years of the last century were making their way over the Alleghany mountains into Ohio, Kentucky and Tennessee, they would have been considered munificent; but to the indolent and energyless mixed breeds of Sonora and Sinaloa they were no inducement. After spending nearly nine months in recruiting, Rivera was able to obtain only fourteen pobladores, but little over half the number required, and two of these deserted before reaching California. The soldiers that Rivera had recruited for California, forty-two in number, with their families, were ordered to proceed overland from Alamos, in Sonora, by way of Tucson and the Colorado river to San Gabriel Mission. These were commanded by Rivera in person.

Leaving Alamos in April, 1781, they arrived in the latter part of June at the junction of the Gila and Colorado rivers. After a short delay to rest, the main company was sent on to San Gabriel Mission. Rivera, with ten or twelve soldiers, remained to recruit his live stock before crossing the desert. Two missions had been established on the California side of the Colorado the previous year. Before the arrival of Rivera the Indians had been behaving badly. Rivera's large herd of cattle and horses destroyed the mesquite trees and intruded upon the Indians' melon patches. This, with their previous quarrel with the padres, provoked the savages to an uprising. They, on July 17, attacked the two missions, massacred the padres and the Spanish settlers attached to the missions and killed Rivera and his soldiers, forty-six persons in all. The Indians burned the mission buildings. These were never rebuilt nor was there any attempt made to convert the Yumas. The hostility of the Yumas practically closed the Colorado route to California for many years.

The pobladores who had been recruited for the founding of the new pueblo, with their families and a military escort, all under the command of Lieut. José Zuniga, crossed the gulf from Guaymas to Loreto, in Lower California, and by the 16th of May were ready for their long journey northward. In the meantime two of the recruits had deserted and one was left behind at Loreto. On the 18th of August the eleven who had remained faithful to their contract, with their families, arrived at San Gabriel. On account of smallpox among some of the children the company was placed in quarantine about a league from the mission.

On the 26th of August, 1781, from San Gabriel, Governor de Neve issued his instructions for the founding of Los Angeles, which gave some additional rules in regard to the distribution of lots not found in the royal reglamento previously mentioned.

On the 4th of September, 1781, the colonists, with a military escort headed by Governor Felipe de Neve, took up their line of march from the Mission San Gabriel to the site selected for their pueblo on the Rio de Porciuncula. There, with religious ceremonies, the Pueblo de Nuestra Señora La Reina de Los Angeles was formally founded. A mass was said by a priest from the Mission San Gabriel, assisted by the choristers and musicians of that mission. There were salvos of musketry and a procession with a cross, candlestick, etc. At the head of the procession the soldiers bore the standard of Spain and the women followed bearing a banner with the image of our Lady the Queen of the Angels. This procession made a circuit of the plaza, the priest blessing it and the building lots. At the close of the services Governor de Neve made an address full of good advice to the colonists. Then the governor, his military escort and the priests returned to San Gabriel and the colonists were left to work out their destiny.

Few of the great cities of the land have had such humble founders as Los Angeles. Of the eleven pobladores who built their huts of poles and tule thatch around the plaza vieja one hundred and twenty-two years ago, not one could read or write. Not one could boast of an un-mixed ancestry. They were mongrels in race, Caucasian, Indian and Negro mixed. Poor in purse, poor in blood, poor in all the sterner qualities of character that our own hardy pioneers of the west possessed, they left no impress on the city they founded; and the conquering race that possesses the land that they colonized has forgotten them. No street or landmark in the city bears the name of any one of them. No monument or tablet marks the spot where they planted the germ of their settlement. No Forefathers' day preserves the memory of their services and sacrifices. Their names, race and the number of persons in each family have been preserved in the archives of California. They are as follows:

1. José de Lara, a Spaniard (or reputed to be one, although it is doubtful whether he was of pure blood) had an Indian wife and three children.
2. José Antonio Navarro, a Mestizo, forty-two years old; wife a mulatress; three children.
3. Basilio Rosas, an Indian, sixty-eight years old, had a mulatto wife and two children.
4. Antonio Mesa, a negro, thirty-eight years old; had a mulatto wife and two children.
5. Antonio Felix Villavicencio, a Spaniard, thirty years old; had an Indian wife and one child.
6. José Vanegas, an Indian, twenty-eight years old; had an Indian wife and one child.
7. Alejandro Rosas, an Indian, nineteen years old, and had an Indian wife. (In the records, "wife, Coyote-Indian.")
8. Pablo Rodriguez, an Indian, twenty-five years old; had an Indian wife and one child.
9. Manuel Camero, a mulatto, thirty years old; had a mulatto wife.
10. Luis Quintero, a negro, fifty-five years old, and had a mulatto wife and five children.
11. José Morena, a mulatto, twenty-two years old, and had a mulatto wife.

Antonio Miranda, the twelfth person described in the padron (list) as a Chino, fifty years old and having one child, was left at Loreto when the expedition marched northward. It would have been impossible for him to have rejoined the colonists before the founding. Presumably his child remained with him, consequently there were but forty-four instead of "forty-six persons in all." Col. J. J. Warner, in his "Historical Sketch of Los Angeles," originated the fiction that one of the founders (Miranda, the Chino,) was born in China. Chino, while it does mean a Chinaman, is also applied in Spanish-American countries to persons or animals having curly hair. Miranda was probably of mixed Spanish and Negro blood, and curly haired. There is no record to show that Miranda ever came to Alta California.

When José de Galvez was fitting out the expedition for occupying San Diego and Monterey, he issued a proclamation naming St. Joseph as the patron saint of his California colonization scheme. Bearing this fact in mind, no doubt, Governor de Neve, when he founded San José, named St. Joseph its patron saint. Having named one of the two pueblos for San José it naturally followed that the other should be named for Santa Maria, the Queen of the Angels, wife of San José.

On the 1st of August, 1769, Portolá's expedition, on its journey northward in search of Monterey Bay, had halted in the San Gabriel valley near where the Mission Vieja was afterwards located, to reconnoiter the country and "above all," as Father Crespi observes, "for the purpose of celebrating the jubilee of Our Lady of the Angels of Porciuncula." Next day, August 2, after traveling about three leagues (nine miles), Father Crespi, in his diary, says: "We came to a rather wide canada having a great many cottonwood and alder trees. Through it ran a beautiful river toward the north-northeast and curving around the point of a cliff it takes a direction to the south. Toward the north-northeast we saw another river bed which must have been a great overflow, but we found it dry. This arm unites with the river and its great floods during the rainy season are clearly demonstrated by the many uprooted trees scattered along the banks." (This dry river is the Arroyo Seco.) "We stopped not very far from the river, to which we gave the name of Porciuncula." Porciuncula is the name of a hamlet in Italy near which was located the little church of Our Lady of the Angels, in which St. Francis of Assisi was praying when the jubilee was granted him. Father Crespi, speaking of the plain through which the river flows, says: "This is the best locality of all those we have yet seen for a mission, besides having all the resources required for a large town." Padre Crespi was evidently somewhat of a prophet.

The fact that this locality had for a number of years borne the name of "Our Lady of the Angels of Porciuncula" may have influenced Governor de Neve to locate his pueblo here. The full name of the town, El Pueblo de Nuestra Señora La Reyna de Los Angeles, was seldom used. It was too long for everyday use. In the earlier years of the town's history it seems to have had a variety of names. It appears in the records as El Pueblo de Nuestra Señora de Los Angeles, as El Pueblo de La Reyna de Los Angeles and as El Pueblo de Santa Maria de Los Angeles. Sometimes it was abbreviated to Santa Maria, but it was most commonly spoken of as El Pueblo, the town. At what time the name of Rio Porciuncula was changed to Rio Los Angeles is uncertain. The change no doubt was gradual.

The site selected for the pueblo of Los Angeles was picturesque and romantic. From where Alameda street now is to the eastern bank of the river the land was covered with a dense growth of willows, cottonwoods and alders; while here and there, rising above the swampy copse, towered a giant aliso (sycamore). Wild grapevines festooned the branches of the trees and wild roses bloomed in profusion. Behind the narrow shelf of mesa land where the pueblo was located rose the brown hills, and in the distance towered the lofty Sierra Madre mountains.

The last pueblo founded in California under Spanish domination was Villa de Branciforte, located on the opposite side of the river from the Mission of Santa Cruz. It was named after the Viceroy Branciforte. It was designed as a coast defense and a place to colonize discharged soldiers. The scheme was discussed for a considerable time before anything was done. Governor Borica recommended "that an adobe house be built for each settler so that the prevalent state of things in San José and Los Angeles, where the settlers still live in tule huts, being unable to build better dwellings without neglecting their fields, may be prevented, the houses to cost not over two hundred dollars."*

The first detachment of the colonists arrived May 12, 1797, on the Concepcion in a destitute condition. Lieutenant Moraga was sent to superintend the construction of houses for the colonists. He was instructed to build temporary huts for himself and the guard, then to build some larger buildings to accommodate fifteen or twenty families each. These were to be temporary. Only nine families came and they were of a vagabond class that had a constitutional antipathy to work. The settlers received the same amount of supplies and allowance of money as the colonists of San José and Los Angeles. Although the colonists were called Spaniards and assumed to be of a superior race to the first settlers of the other pueblos, they made less progress and were more unruly than the mixed and mongrel inhabitants of the older pueblos.

Although at the close of the century three decades had passed since the first settlement was made in California, the colonists had made but little progress. Three pueblos of gente de razon had been founded and a few ranchos granted to ex-soldiers. Exclusive of the soldiers, the white population in the year 1800 did not exceed six hundred. The people lived in the most primitive manner. There was no commerce and no manufacturing except a little at the missions. Their houses were adobe huts roofed with tule thatch. The floor was the beaten earth and the scant furniture home-made. There was a scarcity of cloth for clothing. Padre Salazar relates that when he was at San Gabriel Mission in 1795 a man who had a thousand horses and cattle in proportion came there to beg cloth for a shirt, for none could be had at the pueblo of Los Angeles nor at the presidio of Santa Barbara.

Hermanagildo Sal, the comandante of San Francisco, writing to a friend in 1799, says, "I send you, by the wife of the pensioner José Barbo, one piece of cotton goods and an ounce of sewing silk. There are no combs and I have no hope of receiving any for three years." Think of waiting three years for a comb!

Eighteen missions had been founded at the close of the century. Except at a few of the older missions, the buildings were temporary structures. The neophytes for the most part were living in wigwams constructed like those they had occupied in their wild state.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE PASSING OF SPAIN'S DOMINATION.

THE Spaniards were not a commercial people. Their great desire was to be let alone in their American possessions. Philip II. once promulgated a decree pronouncing death upon any foreigner who entered the Gulf of Mexico. It was easy to promulgate a decree or to pass restrictive laws against foreign trade, but quite another thing to enforce them.

After the first settlement of California seventeen years passed before a foreign vessel entered any of its ports. The first to arrive were the two vessels of the French explorer, La Perouse, who anchored in the harbor of Monterey, September 15, 1786. Being of the same faith, and France having been an ally of Spain in former times, he was well received. During his brief stay he made a study of the mission system and his observations on it are plainly given. He found a similarity in it to the slave plantations of Santo Domingo. November 14, 1792, the English navigator, Capt. George Vancouver, in the ship Discovery, entered the Bay of San Francisco. He was cordially received by the comandante of the port, Hermanagildo Sal, and the friars of the mission. On the 20th of the month, with several of his officers, he visited the Mission of Santa Clara, where he was kindly treated. He also visited the Mission of San Carlos de Monterey. He wrote an interesting account of his visit and his observations on the country. Vancouver was surprised at the backwardness of the country and the antiquated customs of the people. He says: "Instead of finding a country tolerably well inhabited, and far advanced in cultivation, if we except its natural pastures, flocks of sheep and herds of cattle, there is not an object to indicate the most remote connection with any European or other civilized nation." On a subsequent visit, Captain Vancouver met a chilly reception from the acting governor, Arrillaga. The Spaniards suspected him of spying out the weakness of their defenses. Through the English, the Spaniards became acquainted with the importance and value of the fur trade. The bays and lagoons of California abounded in sea otter. Their skins were worth in China all the way from $30 to $100 each. The trade was made a government monopoly. The skins were to be collected from the natives, soldiers and others by the missionaries, at prices ranging from $2.50 to $10 each, and turned over to the government officials appointed to receive them. All trade by private persons was prohibited. The government was sole trader. But the government failed to make the trade profitable. In the closing years of the century the American smugglers began to haunt the coast. The restrictions against trade with foreigners were proscriptive and the penalties for evasion severe, but men will trade under the most adverse circumstances. Spain was a long way off, and smuggling was not a very venial sin in the eyes of layman or churchman. Fast sailing vessels were fitted out in Boston for illicit trade on the California coast. Watching their opportunities, these vessels slipped into the bays and inlets along the coast. There was a rapid exchange of Yankee notions for sea otter skins, the most valued peltry of California, and the vessels were out to sea before the revenue officers could intercept them. If successful in escaping capture, the profits of a smuggling voyage were enormous, ranging from 500 to 1,000 per cent above cost on the goods exchanged; but the risks were great. The smuggler had no protection; he was an outlaw. He was the legitimate prey of the padres, the people and the revenue officers. The Yankee smuggler usually came out ahead. His vessel was heavily armed, and when speed or stratagem failed he was ready to fight his way out of a scrape.

Each year two ships were sent from San Blas with the memorias—mission and presidio supplies. These took back a small cargo of the products of the territory, wheat being the principal. This was all the legitimate commerce allowed California.

The fear of Russian aggression had been one of the causes that had forced Spain to attempt the colonization of California. Bering, in 1741, had discovered the strait that bears his name and had taken possession, for the Russian government, of the northwestern coast of America. Four years later, the first permanent Russian settlement, Sitka, had been made on one of the coast islands. Rumors of the Russian explorations and settlements had reached Madrid and in 1774 Captain Perez, in the San Antonia, was sent up the coast to find out what the Russians were doing.

Had Russian America contained arable land where grain and vegetables could have been grown, it is probable that the Russians and Spaniards in America would not have come in contact; for another nation, the United States, had taken possession of the intervening country, bordering the Columbia river.

The supplies of breadstuffs for the Sitka colonists had to be sent overland across Siberia or shipped around Cape Horn. Failure of supplies sometimes reduced the colonists to sore straits. In 1806, famine and diseases incident to starvation threatened the extinction of the Russian colony. Count Rezánoff, a high officer of the Russian government, had arrived at the Sitka settlement in September, 1805. The destitution prevailing there induced him to visit California with the hope of obtaining relief for the starving colonists. In the ship Juno (purchased from an American trader), with a scurvy afflicted crew, he made a perilous voyage down the stormy coast and on the 5th of April, 1806, anchored safely in the Bay of San Francisco. He had brought with him a cargo of goods for exchange but the restrictive commercial regulations of Spain prohibited trade with foreigners. Although the friars and the people needed the goods the governor could not allow the exchange. Count Rezánoff would be permitted to purchase grain for cash, but the Russian's exchequer was not plethoric and his ship was already loaded with goods. Love that laughs at locksmiths eventually unlocked the shackles that hampered commerce. Rezánoff fell in love with Dona Concepcion, the beautiful daughter of Don José Arguello, the comandante of San Francisco, and an old time friend of the governor, Arrillaga. The attraction was mutual. Through the influence of Dona Concepcion, the friars and Arguello, the governor was induced to sanction a plan by which cash was the supposed medium of exchange on both sides, but grain on the one side and goods on the other were the real currency.

The romance of Rezánoff and Dona Concepcion had a sad ending. On his journey through Siberia to St. Petersburg to obtain the consent of the emperor to his marriage he was killed by a fall from his horse. It was several years before the news of his death reached his affianced bride. Faithful to his memory, she never married, but dedicated her life to deeds of charity. After Rezánoff's visit the Russians came frequently to California, partly to trade, but more often to hunt otter. While on these fur hunting expeditions they examined the coast north of San Francisco with the design of planting an agricultural colony where they could raise grain to supply the settlements in the far north. In 1812 they founded a town and built a fort on the coast north of Bodega Bay, which they named Ross. The fort mounted ten guns. They maintained a fort at Bodega Bay and also a small settlement on Russian river. The Spaniards protested against this aggression and threatened to drive the Russians out of the territory, but nothing came of their protests and they were powerless to enforce their demands. The Russian ships came to California for supplies and were welcomed by the people and the friars if not by the government officials. The Russian colony at Ross was not a success. The ignorant soldiers and the Aluets who formed the bulk of its three or four hundred inhabitants, knew little or nothing about farming and were too stupid to learn. After the decline of fur hunting the settlement became unprofitable. In 1841 the buildings and the stock were sold by the Russian governor to Capt. John A. Sutter for $30,000. The settlement was abandoned and the fort and the town are in ruins.

On the 15th of September, 1810, the patriot priest, Miguel Hidalgo, struck the first blow for Mexican independence. The revolution which began in the province of Guanajuato was at first regarded by the authorities as a mere riot of ignorant Indians that would be speedily suppressed. But the insurrection spread rapidly. Long years of oppression and cruelty had instilled into the hearts of the people an undying hatred for their Spanish oppressors. Hidalgo soon found himself at the head of a motley army, poorly armed and undisciplined, but its numbers swept away opposition. Unfortunately through over-confidence reverses came and in March, 1811, the patriots met an overwhelming defeat at the bridge of Calderon. Hidalgo was betrayed, captured and shot. Though suppressed for a time, the cause of independence was not lost. For eleven years a fratricidal war was waged—cruel, bloody and devastating. Allende, Mina, Moreles, Alama, Rayon and other patriot leaders met death on the field of battle or were captured and shot as rebels, but "Freedom's battle" bequeathed from bleeding sire to son was won at last.

Of the political upheavals that shook Spain in the first decades of the century only the faintest rumblings reached far distant California. Notwithstanding the many changes of rulers that political revolutions and Napoleonic wars gave the mother country, the people of California remained loyal to the Spanish crown, although at times they must have been in doubt who wore the crown.

Arrillaga was governor of California when the war of Mexican independence began. Although born in Mexico he was of pure Spanish parentage and was thoroughly in sympathy with Spain in the contest. He did not live to see the end of the war. He died in 1814 and was succeeded by Pablo Vicente de Sola. Sola was Spanish born and was bitterly opposed to the revolution, even going so far as to threaten death to any one who should speak in favor of it. He had received his appointment from Viceroy Calleja, the butcher of Guanajuato, the cruelest and most bloodthirsty of the vice regal governors of new Spain. The friars were to a man loyal to Spain. The success of the republic meant the downfall of their domination. They hated republican ideas and regarded their dissemination as a crime. They were the ruling power in California. The governors and the people were subservient to their wishes.

The decade between 1810 and 1820 was marked by two important events, the year of the earthquakes and the year of the insurgents.

The year 1812 was the Ano de los Temblores. The seismic disturbance that for forty years or more had shaken California seemed to concentrate in power that year and expend its force on the mission churches. The massive church of San Juan Capistrano, the pride of mission architecture, was thrown down and forty persons killed. The walls of San Gabriel Mission were cracked and some of the saints shaken out of their niches. At San Buenaventura there were three heavy shocks which injured the church so that the tower and much of the facade had to be rebuilt. The whole mission site seemed to settle and the inhabitants, fearful that they might be engulfed by the sea, moved up the valley about two miles, where they remained three months. At Santa Barbara both church and the presidio were damaged and at Santa Inez the church was shaken down. The quakes continued for several months and the people were so terrified that they abandoned their houses and lived in the open air.

The other important epoch of the decade was El Año de los Insurgentes, the year of the insurgents. In November, 1818, Bouchard, a Frenchman in the service of Buenos Ayres and provided with letters of marque by San Martin, the president of that republic, to prey upon Spanish commerce, appeared in the port of Monterey with two ships carrying sixty-six guns and three hundred and fifty men. He attacked Monterey and after an obstinate resistance by the Californians, it was taken by the insurgents and burned. Bouchard next pillaged Ortega's rancho and burned the buildings. Then sailing down the coast he scared the Santa Barbaraños; then keeping on down he looked into San Pedro, but finding nothing there to tempt him he kept on to San Juan Capistrano. There he landed, robbed the mission of a few articles and drank the padres' wine. Then he sailed away and disappeared. He left six of his men in California, among them Joseph Chapman of Boston, the first American resident of California.

In the early part of the last century there was a limited commerce with Lima. That being a Spanish dependency, trade with it was not prohibited. Gilroy, who arrived in California in 1814, says in his reminiscences:*

"The only article of export then was tallow, of which one cargo was sent annually to Callao in a Spanish ship. This tallow sold for $1.50 per hundred weight in silver or $2.00 in trade or goods. Hides, except those used for tallow bags, were thrown away. Wheat, barley and beans had no market. Nearly everything consumed by the people was produced at home. There was no foreign trade."

As the revolution in Mexico progressed times grew harder in California. The mission memorias ceased to come. No tallow ships from Callao arrived. The soldiers' pay was years in arrears and their uniforms in rags. What little wealth there was in the country was in the hands of the padres. They were supreme. "The friars," says Gilroy, "had everything their own way. The governor and the military were expected to do whatever the friars requested. The missions contained all the wealth of the country." The friars supported the government and supplied the troops with food from the products of the neophytes' labor. The crude manufacturers of the missions supplied the people with cloth for clothing and some other necessities. The needs of the common people were easily satisfied. They were not used to luxuries nor were they accustomed to what we would now consider necessities. Gilroy, in the reminiscences heretofore referred to, states that at the time of his arrival (1814) "There was not a saw-mill, whip saw or spoked wheel in California. Such lumber as was used was cut with an axe. Chairs, tables and wood floors were not to be found except in the governor's house. Plates were rare unless that name could be applied to the tiles used instead. Money was a rarity. There were no stores and no merchandise to sell. There was no employment for a laborer. The neophytes did all the work and all the business of the country was in the hands of the friars."

CHAPTER IX.

FROM EMPIRE TO REPUBLIC.

THE condition of affairs in California steadily grew worse as the revolution in Mexico progressed. Sola had made strenuous efforts to arouse the Spanish authorities of New Spain to take some action towards benefiting the territory. After the affair with the insurgent Bouchard he had appealed to the viceroy for reinforcements. In answer to his urgent entreaties a force of one hundred men was sent from Mazatlan to garrison San Diego and an equal force from San Blas for Monterey. They reached California in August, 1819, and Sola was greatly rejoiced, but his joy was turned to deep disgust when he discovered the true character of the reinforcement and arms sent him. The only equipments of the soldiers were a few hundred old worn-out sabers that Sola declared were unfit for sickles. He ordered them returned to the comandante of San Blas, who had sent them. The troops were a worse lot than the arms sent. They had been taken out of the prisons or conscripted from the lowest class of the population of the cities. They were thieves, drunkards and vagabonds, who, as soon as landed, resorted to robberies, brawls and assassinations. Sola wrote to the viceroy that the outcasts called troops sent him from the jails of Tepic and San Blas by their vices caused continual disorders; their evil example had debauched the minds of the Indians and that the cost incurred in their collection and transportation had been worse than thrown away. He could not get rid of them, so he had to control them as best he could. Governor Sola labored faithfully to benefit the country over which he had been placed and to arouse the Spanish authorities in Mexico to do something for the advancement of California; but the government did nothing. Indeed it was in no condition to do anything. The revolution would not down. No sooner was one revolutionary leader suppressed and the rebellion apparently crushed than there was an uprising in some other part of the country under a new leader.

Ten years of intermittent warfare had been waged—one army of patriots after another had been defeated and the leaders shot; the struggle for independence was almost ended and the royalists were congratulating themselves on the triumph of the Spanish crown, when a sudden change came and the vice regal government that for three hundred years had swayed the destinies of New Spain went down forever. Agustin Iturbide, a colonel in the royal army, who in February, 1821, had been sent with a corps of five thousand men from the capital to the Sierras near Acapulco to suppress Guerrero, the last of the patriot chiefs, suddenly changed his allegiance, raised the banner of the revolution and declared for the independence of Mexico under the plan of Iguala, so named for the town where it was first proclaimed. The central ideas of the plan were "Union, civil and religious liberty."

There was a general uprising in all parts of the country and men rallied to the support of the Army of the Three Guarantees, religion, union, independence. Guerrero joined forces with Iturbide and September 21, 1821, at the head of sixteen thousand men, amid the rejoicing of the people, they entered the capital. The viceroy was compelled to recognize the independence of Mexico. A provisional government under a regency was appointed at first, but a few months later Iturbide was crowned emperor, taking the title of his most serene majesty, Agustin I., by divine providence and by the congress of the nation, first constitutional emperor of Mexico.

Sola had heard rumors of the turn affairs were taking in Mexico, but he had kept the reports a secret and still hoped and prayed for the success of the Spanish arms. At length a vessel appeared in the harbor of Monterey floating an unknown flag, and cast anchor beyond the reach of the guns of the castillo. The soldiers were called to arms. A boat from the ship put off for shore and landed an officer, who declared himself the bearer of dispatches to Don Pablo Vicente de Sola, the governor of the province. "I demand," said he, "to be conducted to his presence in the name of my sovereign, the liberator of Mexico, General Agustin de Iturbide." There was a murmur of applause from the soldiers, greatly to the surprise of their officers, who were all loyalists. Governor Sola was bitterly disappointed. Only a few days before he had harangued the soldiers in the square of the presidio and threatened "to shoot down any one high or low without the formality of a trial who dared to say a word in favor of the traitor Iturbide."

For half a century the banner of Spain had floated from the flag staff of the presidio of Monterey. Sadly Sola ordered it lowered and in its place was hoisted the imperial flag of the Mexican Empire. A few months pass, Iturbide is forced to abdicate the throne of empire and is banished from Mexico. The imperial standard is supplanted by the tricolor of the republic. Thus the Californians, in little more than one year, have passed under three different forms of government, that of a kingdom, an empire and a republic, and Sola from the most loyal of Spanish governors in the kingdom of Spain has been transformed in a Mexican republican.

The friars, if possible, were more bitterly disappointed than the governor. They saw in the success of the republic the doom of their establishments. Republican ideas were repulsive to them. Liberty meant license to men to think for themselves. The shackles of creed and the fetters of priestcraft would be loosened by the growth of liberal ideas. It was not strange, viewing the question from their standpoint, that they refused to take the oath of allegiance to the republic. Nearly all of them were Spanish born. Spain had aided them to plant their missions, had fostered their establishments and had made them supreme in the territory. Their allegiance was due to the Spanish crown. They would not transfer it to a republic and they did not; to the last they were loyal to Spain in heart, even if they did acquiesce in the observance of the rule of the republic.

Sola had long desired to be relieved of the governorship. He was growing old and was in poor health. The condition of the country worried him. He had frequently asked to be relieved and allowed to retire from military duty. His requests were unheeded; the vice regal government of New Spain had weightier matters to attend to than requests or the complaints of the governor of a distant and unimportant province. The inauguration of the empire brought him the desired relief.

Under the empire Alta California was allowed a diputado or delegate in the imperial congress. Sola was elected delegate and took his departure for Mexico in the autumn of 1822. Luis Antonio Arguello, president of the provincial diputacion, an institution that had come into existence after the inauguration of the empire, became governor by virtue of his position as president. He was the first hijo del pais or native of the country to hold the office of governor. He was born at San Francisco in 1784, while his father, an ensign at the presidio, was in command there. His opportunities for obtaining an education were extremely meager, but he made the best use of what he had. He entered the army at sixteen and was, at the time he became temporary governor, comandante at San Francisco.

The inauguration of a new form of government had brought no relief to California. The two Spanish ships that had annually brought los memorias del rey (the remembrances of the king) had long since ceased to come with their supplies of money and goods for the soldiers. The California ports were closed to foreign commerce. There was no sale for the products of the country. So the missions had to throw open their warehouses and relieve the necessities of the government.

The change in the form of government had made no change in the dislike of foreigners, that was a characteristic of the Spaniard. During the Spanish era very few foreigners had been allowed to remain in California. Run-away sailors and shipwrecked mariners, notwithstanding they might wish to remain in the country and become Catholics, were shipped to Mexico and returned to their own country. John Gilroy, whose real name was said to be John Cameron, was the first permanent English speaking resident of California. When a boy of eighteen he was left by the captain of a Hudson Bay company's ship at Monterey in 1814. He was sick with the scurvy and not expected to live. Nursing and a vegetable diet brought him out all right, but he could not get away. He did not like the country and every day for several years he went down to the beach and scanned the ocean for a foreign sail. When one did come he had gotten over his home-sickness, had learned the language, fallen in love, turned Catholic and married.

In 1822 William E. P. Hartnell, an Englishman, connected with a Lima business house, visited California and entered into a contract with Padre Payeras, the prefect of the missions, for the purchase of hides and tallow. Hartnell a few years later married a California lady and became a permanent resident of the territory. Other foreigners who came about the same time as Hartnell and who became prominent in California were William A. Richardson, an Englishman; Capt. John R. Cooper of Boston and William A. Gale, also of Boston. Gale had first visited California in 1810 as a fur trader. He returned in 1822 on the ship Sachem, the pioneer Boston hide drogher. The hide drogher was in a certain sense the pioneer emigrant ship of California. It brought to the coast a number of Americans who became permanent residents of the territory. California, on account of its long distance from the world's marts of trade, had but few products for exchange that would bear the cost of shipment. Its chief commodities for barter during the Mexican era were hides and tallow. The vast range of country adapted to cattle raising made that its most profitable industry. Cattle increased rapidly and required but little care or attention from their owners. As the native Californians were averse to hard labor cattle raising became almost the sole industry of the country.

After the inauguration of a republican form of government in Mexico some of the most burdensome restrictions on foreign commerce were removed. The Mexican Congress of 1824 enacted a colonization law, which was quite liberal. Under it foreigners could obtain land from the public domain. The Roman Catholic religion was the state religion and a foreigner, before he could become a permanent resident of the country, acquire property or marry, was required to be baptized and embrace the doctrines of that church. After the Mexican Congress repealed the restrictive laws against foreign commerce a profitable trade grew up between the New England ship owners and the Californians.

Vessels called hide droghers were fitted out in Boston with assorted cargoes suitable for the California trade. Making the voyage by way of Cape Horn they reached California. Stopping at the various ports along the coast they exchanged their stocks of goods and Yankee notions for hides and tallow. It took from two to three years to make a voyage to California and return to Boston, but the profits on the goods sold and on the hides received in exchange were so large that these ventures paid handsomely. The arrival of a hide drogher with its department store cargo was heralded up and down the coast. It broke the monotony of existence, gave the people something new to talk about and stirred them up as nothing else could do unless possibly a revolution.

"On the arrival of a new vessel from the United States," says Robinson in his "Life in California," "every man, woman, boy and girl took a proportionate share of interest as to the qualities of her cargo. If the first inquired for rice, sugar or tobacco, the latter asked for prints, silks and satins; and if the boy wanted a Wilson's jack knife, the girl hoped that there might be some satin ribbons for her. Thus the whole population hailed with eagerness an arrival. Even the Indian in his unsophisticated style asked for Panas Colorados and Abalaris—red handkerchiefs and beads.

"After the arrival of our trading vessel (at San Pedro) our friends came in the morning flocking on board from all quarters; and soon a busy scene commenced afloat and ashore. Boats were passing to the beach, and men, women and children partaking in the general excitement. On shore all was confusion, cattle and carts laden with hides and tallow, gente de razon and Indians busily employed in the delivery of their produce and receiving in return its value in goods. Groups of individuals seated around little bonfires upon the ground, and horsemen racing over the plains in every direction. Thus the day passed, some arriving, some departing, till long after sunset, the low white road, leading across the plains to the town (Los Angeles), appeared a living panorama."

The commerce of California during the Mexican era was principally carried on by the hide droghers. The few stores at the pueblos and presidios obtained their supplies from them and retailed their goods to customers in the intervals between the arrivals of the department store droghers.

The year 1824 was marked by a serious outbreak among the Indians of several missions. Although in the older missionary establishments many of the neophytes had spent half a century under the Christianizing influence of the padres and in these, too, a younger generation had grown from childhood to manhood under mission tutelage, yet their Christian training had not eliminated all the aboriginal savagery from their natures. The California Indians were divided into numerous small tribes, each speaking a different dialect. They had never learned, like the eastern Indians did, the advantages of uniting against a common enemy. When these numerous small tribes were gathered into the missions they were kept as far as it was possible separate and it is said the padres encouraged their feuds and tribal animosities to prevent their uniting against the missionaries. Their long residence in the missions had destroyed their tribal distinctions and merged them into one body. It had taught them, too, the value of combination.

How long the Indians had been plotting no one knew. The conspiracy began among the neophytes of Santa Ynez and La Purisima, but it spread to the missions of San Luis Obispo, Santa Barbara, San Buenaventura, San Fernando and San Gabriel. Their plan was to massacre the padres and the mission guard and having obtained arms to kill all the gente de razon and thus free themselves from mission thralldom and regain their old time freedom. The plotting had been carried on with great secrecy. Rumors had passed from mission to mission arranging the details of the uprising without the whites suspecting anything. Sunday, February 22, 1824, was the day set for beginning the slaughter. At the hour of celebrating mass, when the soldiers and the padres were within the church, the bloody work was to begin. The plot might have succeeded had not the Indians at Santa Ynez began their work prematurely. One account (Hittell's History of California) says that on Saturday afternoon before the appointed Sunday they determined to begin the work by the murder of Padre Francisco Xavier Uná, who was sleeping in a chamber next the mission church. He was warned by a faithful page. Springing from his couch and rushing to a window he saw the Indians approaching. Seizing a musket from several that were in the room he shot the first Indian that reached the threshold dead. He seized a second musket and laid another Indian low. The soldiers now rallied to his assistance and the Indians were driven back; they set fire to the mission church, but a small body of troops under Sergeant Carrillo, sent from Santa Barbara to reinforce the mission guard, coming up at this time, the Indians fled to Purisima. The fire was extinguished before the church was consumed. At Purisima the Indians were more successful. The mission was defended by Corporal Tapia and five soldiers. The Indians demanded that Tapia surrender, but the corporal refused. The fight began and continued all night. The Indians set fire to the building, but all they could burn was the rafters. Tapia, by a strategic movement, succeeded in collecting all the soldiers and the women and children inside the walls of one of the largest buildings from which the roof had been burnt. From this the Indians could not dislodge him. The fight was kept up till morning, when one of the Indians, who had been a mission alcade, made a proposition to the corporal to surrender. Tapia refused to consider it, but Father Blas Ordaz interfered and insisted on a compromise. After much contention Tapia found himself overruled. The Indians agreed to spare the lives of all on condition that the whites laid down their arms. The soldiers laid down their arms and surrendered two small cannon belonging to the church. The soldiers, the women and the children were then allowed to march to Santa Ynez. While the fight was going on the Indians killed four white men, two of them, Dolores Sepulveda and Ramon Satelo, were on their way to Los Angeles and came to the mission not suspecting any danger. Seven Indians were killed in the fight and a number wounded.

The Indians at Santa Barbara began hostilities according to their prearranged plot. They made an attack upon the mission. Captain de la Guerra, who was in command at the presidio, marched to the mission and a fight of several hours ensued. The Indians sheltered themselves behind the pillars of the corridor and fought with guns and arrows. After losing several of their number they fled to the hills. Four soldiers were wounded. The report of the uprising reached Monterey and measures were taken at once to subdue the rebellious neophytes. A force of one hundred men was sent under Lieut. José Estrada to co-operate with Captain de la Guerra against the rebels. On the 16th of March the soldiers surrounded the Indians who had taken possession of the mission church at Purisima and opened fire upon them. The Indians replied with their captured cannon, muskets and arrows. Estrada's artillery battered down the walls of the church. The Indians, unused to arms, did little execution. Driven out of the wrecked building, they attempted to make their escape by flight, but were intercepted by the cavalry which had been deployed for that purpose. Finding themselves hemmed in on all sides the neophytes surrendered. They had lost sixteen killed and a large number of wounded. Seven of the prisoners were shot for complicity in the murder of Sepulveda and the three other travelers. The four leaders in the revolt, Mariano Pacomio, Benito and Bernabe, were sentenced to ten years hard labor at the presidio and eight others to lesser terms. There were four hundred Indians engaged in the battle.

The Indians of the Santa Barbara missions and escapes from Santa Ynez and Purisima made their way over the mountains to the Tulares. A force of eighty men under command of a lieutenant was sent against these. The troops had two engagements with the rebels, whom they found at Buenavista Lake and San Emigdio. Finding his force insufficient to subdue them the lieutenant retreated to Santa Barbara. Another force of one hundred and thirty men under Captain Portilla and Lieutenant Valle was sent after the rebels. Father Ripoll had induced the governor to offer a general pardon. The padre claimed that the Indians had not harmed the friars nor committed sacrilege in the church and from his narrow view these were about the only venial sins they could commit. The troops found the fugitive neophytes encamped at San Emigdio. They now professed repentance for their misdeeds and were willing to return to mission life if they could escape punishment. Padres Ripoll and Sarria, who had accompanied the expedition, entered into negotiations with the Indians; pardon was promised them for their offenses. They then surrendered and marched back with the soldiers to their respective missions. This was the last attempt of the Indians to escape from mission rule.

CHAPTER X.

FIRST DECADE OF MEXICAN RULE.

JOSE MARIA ECHEANDIA, a lieutenant colonel of the Mexican army, was appointed governor of the two Californias, February 1, 1825. With his staff officers and a few soldiers he landed at Loreto June 22. After a delay of a few months at Loreto he marched overland to San Diego, where he arrived about the middle of October. He summoned Arguello to meet him there, which he did and turned over the government, October 31, 1825. Echeandia established his capital at San Diego, that town being about the center of his jurisdiction. This did not suit the people of Monterey, who became prejudiced against the new governor. Shortly after his inauguration he began an investigation of the attitude of the mission friars towards the republic of Mexico. He called padres Sanches, Zalvidea, Peyri and Martin, representatives of the four southern missions, to San Diego and demanded of them whether they would take the oath of allegiance to the supreme government. They expressed their willingness and were accordingly sworn to support the constitution of 1824. Many of the friars of the northern missions remained contumacious. Among the most stubborn of these was Padre Vicente Francisco de Sarria, former president of the missions. He had resigned the presidency to escape taking the oath of allegiance and still continued his opposition. He was put under arrest and an order issued for his expulsion by the supreme government, but the execution of the order was delayed for fear that if he were banished others of the disloyal padres would abandon their missions and secretly leave the country. The government was not ready yet to take possession of the missions. The friars could keep the neophytes in subjection and make them work. The business of the country was in the hands of the friars and any radical change would have been disastrous.

The national government in 1827 had issued a decree for the expulsion of Spaniards from Mexican territory. There were certain classes of those born in Spain who were exempt from banishment, but the friars were not among the exempts. The decree of expulsion reached California in 1828; but it was not enforced for the reason that all of the mission padres except three were Spaniards. To have sent these out of the country would have demoralized the missions. The Spanish friars were expelled from Mexico; but those in California, although some of them had boldly proclaimed their willingness to die for their king and their religion and demanded their passports to leave the country, were allowed to remain in the country. Their passports were not given them for reasons above stated. Padres Ripoll and Altimira made their escape without passports. They secretly took passage on an American brig lying at Santa Barbara. Orders were issued to seize the vessel should she put into any other harbor on the coast, but the captain, who no doubt had been liberally paid, took no chance of capture and the padres eventually reached Spain in safety. There was a suspicion that the two friars had taken with them a large amount of money from the mission funds, but nothing was proved. It was certain that they carried away something more than the bag and staff, the only property allowed them by the rules of their order.

The most bitter opponent of the new government was Father Luis Antonio Martinez of San Luis Obispo. Before the clandestine departure of Ripoll and Altimira there were rumors that he meditated a secret departure from the country. The mysterious shipment of $6,000 in gold belonging to the mission on a vessel called the Santa Apolonia gave credence to the report of his intended flight. He had been given a passport but still remained in the territory. His outspoken disloyalty and his well known success in evading the revenue laws and smuggling goods into the country had made him particularly obnoxious to the authorities. Governor Echeandia determined to make an example of him. He was arrested in February, 1830, and confined in a room at Santa Barbara. In his trial before a council of war an attempt was made to connect him with complicity in the Solis revolution, but the evidence against him was weak. By a vote of five to one it was decided to send him out of the country. He was put on board an English vessel bound for Callao and there transferred to a vessel bound for Europe; he finally arrived safely at Madrid.

Under the empire a diputacion or provincial legislature had been established in California. Arguello in 1825 had suppressed this while he was governor. Echeandia, shortly after his arrival, ordered an election for a new diputacion. The diputacion made the general laws of the territory. It consisted of seven members called vocals. These were chosen by an electoral junta, the members of which were elected by the people. The diputacion chose a diputado or delegate to the Mexican Congress. As it was a long distance for some of the members to travel to the territorial capital a suplente or substitute was chosen for each member, so as to assure a quorum. The diputacion called by Echeandia met at Monterey, June 14, 1828. The sessions, of which there were two each week, were held in the governor's palacio. This diputacion passed a rather peculiar revenue law. It taxed domestic aguardiente (grape brandy) $5 a barrel and wine half that amount in the jurisdictions of Monterey and San Francisco; but in the jurisdictions of Santa Barbara and San Diego the rates were doubled, brandy was taxed $10 a barrel and wine $5. San Diego, Los Angeles and Santa Barbara were wine producing districts, while Monterey and San Francisco were not. As there was a larger consumption of the product in the wine producing districts than in the others the law was enacted for revenue and not for prevention of drinking.

Another peculiar freak of legislation perpetrated by this diputacion was the attempt to change the name of the territory. The supreme government was memorialized to change the name of Alta California to that of Montezuma and also that of the Pueblo de Nuestra Señora de los Angeles to that of Villa Victoria de la Reyna de los Angeles and make it the capital of the territory. A coat of arms was adopted for the territory. It consisted of an oval with the figure of an oak tree on one side, an olive tree on the other and a plumed Indian in the center with his bow and quiver, just in the act of stepping across the mythical straits of Anian. The memorial was sent to Mexico, but the supreme government paid no attention to it.

The political upheavals, revolutions and counter revolutions that followed the inauguration of a republican form of government in Mexico demoralized the people and produced a prolific crop of criminals. The jails were always full and it became a serious question what to do with them. It was proposed to make California a penal colony, similar to England's Botany Bay. Orders were issued to send criminals to California as a means of reforming their morals. The Californians protested against the sending of these undesirable immigrants, but in vain. In February, 1830, the brig Maria Ester brought eighty convicts from Acapulco to San Diego. They were not allowed to land there and were taken to Santa Barbara. What to do with them was a serious question with the Santa Barbara authorities. The jail would not hold a tenth part of the shipment and to turn them loose in the sparsely settled country was dangerous to the peace of the community. Finally, about thirty or forty of the worst of the bad lot were shipped over to the island of Santa Cruz. They were given a supply of cattle, some fishhooks and a few tools and turned loose on the island to shift for themselves. They staid on the island until they had slaughtered and eaten the cattle, then they built a raft and drifted back to Santa Barbara, where they quartered themselves on the padres of the mission. Fifty more were sent from Mexico a few months later. These shipments of prison exiles were distributed around among the settlements. Some served out their time and returned to their native land, a few escaped over the border, others remained in the territory after their time was up and became fairly good citizens.

The colonization law passed by the Mexican Congress August 18, 1824, was the first break in the proscriptive regulations that had prevailed in Spanish-American countries since their settlement. Any foreigner of good character who should locate in the country and become a Roman Catholic could obtain a grant of public land, not exceeding eleven leagues; but no foreigner was allowed to obtain a grant within twenty leagues of the boundary of a foreign country nor within ten leagues of the sea coast. The law of April 14, 1828, allowed foreigners to become naturalized citizens. The applicant was required to have resided at least two years in the country, to be or to become a Roman Catholic, to renounce allegiance to his former country and to swear to support the constitution and laws of the Mexican republic. Quite a number of foreigners who had been residing a number of years in California took advantage of this law and became Mexican citizens by naturalization. The colonization law of November 18, 1828, prescribed a series of rules and regulations for the making of grants of land. Colonists were required to settle on and cultivate the land granted within a specified time or forfeit their grants. Any one residing outside of the republic could not retain possession of his land. The minimum size of a grant as defined by this law was two hundred varas square of irrigable land, eight hundred varas square of arable land (depending on the seasons) and twelve hundred varas square grazing land. The size of a house lot was one hundred varas square.

The Californians had grown accustomed to foreigners coming to the country by sea, but they were not prepared to have them come overland. The mountains and deserts that intervened between the United States and California were supposed to be an insurmountable barrier to foreign immigration by land. It was no doubt with feelings of dismay, mingled with anger, that Governor Echeandia received the advance guard of maldito extranjeros, who came across the continent. Echeandia hated foreigners and particularly Americans. The pioneer of overland travel from the United States to California was Capt. Jedediah S. Smith. Smith was born in Connecticut and when quite young came with his father to Ohio and located in Ashtabula county, where he grew to manhood amid the rude surroundings of pioneer life in the west. By some means he obtained a fairly good education. We have no record of when he began the life of a trapper. We first hear of him as an employe of General Ashley in 1822. He had command of a band of trappers on the waters of the Snake river in 1824. Afterwards he became a partner of Ashley under the firm name of Ashley & Smith and subsequently one of the members of the Rocky Mountain Fur Company. The latter company had about 1825 established a post and fort near Great Salt Lake. From this, August 22, 1826, Captain Smith with a band of fifteen hunters and trappers started on his first expedition to California. His object was to find some new country that had not been occupied by a fur company. Traveling in a south-westerly direction he discovered a river which he named Adams (after President John Quincy Adams) now known as the Rio Virgin. This stream he followed down to its junction with the Colorado. Traveling down the latter river he arrived at the Mojave villages, where he rested fifteen days. Here he found two wandering neophytes, who guided his party across the desert to the San Gabriel mission, where he and his men arrived safely early in December, 1826.

The arrival of a party of armed Americans from across the mountains and deserts alarmed the padres and couriers were hastily dispatched to Governor Echeandia at San Diego. The Americans were placed under arrest and compelled to give up their arms. Smith was taken to San Diego to give an account of himself. He claimed that he had been compelled to enter the territory on account of the loss of horses and a scarcity of provisions. He was finally released from prison upon the endorsement of several American ship captains and supercargoes who were then at San Diego. He was allowed to return to San Gabriel, where he purchased horses and supplies. He moved his camp to San Bernardino, where he remained until February. The authorities had grown uneasy at his continued presence in the country and orders were sent to arrest him, but before this could be done he left for the Tulare country by way of Cajon Pass. He trapped on the tributaries of the San Joaquin. By the 1st of May he and his party had reached a fork of the Sacramento (near where the town of Folsom now stands). Here he established a summer camp and the river ever since has been known as the American fork from that circumstance.

Here again the presence of the Americans worried the Mexican authorities. Smith wrote a conciliatory letter to Padre Duran, president of the missions, informing him that he had "made several efforts to pass over the mountains, but the snow being so deep I could not succeed in getting over. I returned to this place, it being the only point to kill meat, to wait a few weeks until the snow melts so that I can go on." "On May 20, 1827," Smith writes, "with two men, seven horses and two mules, I started from the valley. In eight days we crossed Mount Joseph, losing two horses and one mule. After a march of twenty days eastward from Mount Joseph (the Sierra Nevadas) I reached the southwesterly corner of the Great Salt Lake. The country separating it from the mountains is arid and without game. Often we had no water for two days at a time. When we reached Salt Lake we had left only one horse and one mule, so exhausted that they could hardly carry our slight baggage. We had been forced to eat the horses that had succumbed."

Smith's route over the Sierras to Salt Lake was substantially the same as that followed by the overland emigration of later years. He discovered the Humboldt, which he named the Mary river, a name it bore until changed by Fremont in 1845. He was the first white man to cross the Sierra Nevadas. Smith left his party of trappers except the two who accompanied him in the Sacramento valley. He returned next year with reinforcements and was ordered out of the country by the governor. He traveled up the coast towards Oregon. On the Umpqua river he was attacked by the Indians. All his party except himself and two others were massacred. He lost all of his horses and furs. He reached Fort Vancouver, his clothing torn to ragged and almost starved to death. In 1831 he started with a train of wagons to Santa Fe on a trading expedition. While alone searching for water near the Cimarron river he was set upon by a party of Indians and killed. Thus perished by the hands of cowardly savages in the wilds of New Mexico a man who, through almost incredible dangers and sufferings, had explored an unknown region as vast in extent as that which gave fame and immortality to the African explorer, Stanley; and who marked out trails over mountains and across deserts that Fremont following years afterwards won the title of "Pathfinder of the Great West." Smith led the advance guard of the fur trappers to California. Notwithstanding the fact that they were unwelcome visitors these adventurers continued to come at intervals up to 1845. They trapped on the tributaries of the San Joaquin, Sacramento and the rivers in the northern part of the territory. A few of them remained in the country and became permanent residents, but most of them sooner or later met death by the savages.

Capt. Jedediah S. Smith, marked out two of the great immigrant trails by which the overland travel, after the discovery of gold, entered California, one by way of the Humboldt river over the Sierra Nevadas, the other southerly from Salt Lake, Utah Lake, the Rio Virgin, across the Colorado desert, through the Cajon Pass to Los Angeles. A third immigrant route was blazed by the Pattie party. This route led from Santa Fe, across New Mexico, down the Gila to the Colorado and from thence across the desert through the San Gorgonio Pass to Los Angeles.

This party consisted of Sylvester Pattie, James Ohio Pattie, his son, Nathaniel M. Pryor, Richard Laughlin, Jesse Furguson, Isaac Slover, William Pope and James Puter. The Patties left Kentucky in 1824 and followed trapping in New Mexico and Arizona until 1827; the elder Pattie for a time managing the copper mines of Santa Rita. In May, 1827, Pattie the elder, in command of a party of thirty trappers and hunters, set out to trap the tributaries of the Colorado. Losses by Indian hostilities, by dissensions and desertions reduced the party to eight persons. December 1st, 1827, while these were encamped on the Colorado near the mouth of the Gila, the Yuma Indians stole all their horses. They constructed rafts and floated down the Colorado, expecting to find Spanish settlements on its banks, where they hoped to procure horses to take them back to Santa Fe. They floated down the river until they encountered the flood tide from the gulf. Finding it impossible to go ahead on account of the tide or back on account of the river current, they landed, cached their furs and traps and with two days' supply of beaver meat struck out westerly across the desert. After traveling for twenty-four days and suffering almost incredible hardships they reached the old Mission of Santa Catalina near the head of the Gulf of California. Here they were detained until news of their arrival could be sent to Governor Echeandia at San Diego. A guard of sixteen soldiers was sent for them and they were conducted to San Diego, where they arrived February 27, 1828. Their arms were taken from them and they were put in prison. The elder Pattie died during their imprisonment. In September all the party except young Pattie, who was retained as a hostage, were released and permitted to go after their buried furs. They found their furs had been ruined by the overflow of the river. Two of the party, Slover and Pope, made their way back to Santa Fe; the others returned, bringing with them their beaver traps. They were again imprisoned by Governor Echeandia, but were finally released.

Three of the party, Nathaniel M. Pryor, Richard Laughlin and Jesse Ferguson, became permanent residents of California. Young Pattie returned to the United States by way of Mexico. After his return, with the assistance of the Rev. Timothy Flint, he wrote an account of his adventures, which was published in Cincinnati in 1833, under the title of "Pattie's Narrative." Young Pattie was inclined to exaggeration. In his narrative he claims that with vaccine matter brought by his father from the Santa Rita mines he vaccinated twenty-two thousand people in California. In Los Angeles alone, he vaccinated twenty-five hundred, which was more than double the population of the town in 1828. He took a contract from the president of the missions to vaccinate all the neophytes in the territory. When his job was finished the president offered him in pay five hundred cattle and five hundred mules with land to pasture his stock on condition he would become a Roman Catholic and a citizen of Mexico. Pattie scorned the offer and roundly upbraided the padre for taking advantage of him. He had previously given Governor Echeandia a tongue lashing and had threatened to shoot him on sight. From his narrative he seems to have put in most of his time in California blustering and threatening to shoot somebody.

Another famous trapper of this period was "Peg Leg" Smith. His real name was Thomas L. Smith. It is said that in a fight with the Indians his leg below the knee was shattered by a bullet. He coolly amputated his leg at the knee with no other instrument than his hunting knife. He wore a wooden leg and from this came his nickname. He first came to California in 1829. He was ordered out of the country. He and his party took their departure, but with them went three or four hundred California horses. He died in a San Francisco hospital in 1866.

Ewing Young, a famous captain of trappers, made several visits to California from 1830 to 1837. In 1831 he led a party of thirty hunters and trappers, among those of his party who remained in California was Col. J. J. Warner, who became prominent in the territory and state. In 1837 Ewing Young with a party of sixteen men came down from Oregon, where he finally located, to purchase cattle for the new settlements on the Willamette river. They bought seven hundred cattle at $3 per head from the government and drove them overland to Oregon, reaching there after a toilsome journey of four months with six hundred. Young died in Oregon in 1841.

From the downfall of Spanish domination in 1822, to the close of that decade there had been but few political disturbances in California. The only one of any consequence was Solis' and Herrera's attempt to revolutionize the territory and seize the government. José Maria Herrera had come to California as a commissioner of the commissary department, but after a short term of service had been removed from office for fraud. Joaquin Solis was a convict who was serving a ten years sentence of banishment from Mexico. The ex-official and the exile with others of damaged character combined to overturn the government.

On the night of November 12, 1829, Solis, with a band of soldiers that he had induced to join his standard, seized the principal government officials at Monterey and put them in prison. At Solis' solicitation Herrera drew up a pronunciamiento. It followed the usual line of such documents. It began by deploring the evils that had come upon the territory through Echeandia's misgovernment and closed with promises of reformation if the revolutionists should obtain control of the government. To obtain the sinews of war the rebels seized $3,000 of the public funds. This was distributed among the soldiers and proved a great attraction to the rebel cause. Solis with twenty men went to San Francisco and the soldiers there joined his standard. Next he marched against Santa Barbara with an army of one hundred and fifty men. Echeandia on hearing of the revolt had marched northward with all the soldiers he could enlist. The two armies met at Santa Ynez. Solis opened fire on the governor's army. The fire was returned. Solis' men began to break away and soon the army and its valiant leader were in rapid flight. Pacheco's cavalry captured the leaders of the revolt. Herrera, Solis and thirteen others were shipped to Mexico under arrest to be tried for their crimes. The Mexican authorities, always lenient to California revolutionists, probably from a fellow feeling, turned them all loose and Herrera was sent back to fill his former office.

Near the close of his term Governor Echeandia formulated a plan for converting the mission into pueblos. To ascertain the fitness of the neophytes for citizenship he made an investigation to find out how many could read and write. He found so very few that he ordered schools opened at the missions. A pretense was made of establishing schools, but very little was accomplished. The padres were opposed to educating the natives for the same reason that the southern slave-holders were opposed to educating the negro, namely, that an ignorant people were more easily kept in subjection. Echeandia's plan of secularization was quite elaborate and dealt fairly with the neophytes. It received the sanction of the diputacion when that body met in July, 1830, but before anything could be done towards enforcing it another governor was appointed. Echeandia was thoroughly hated by the mission friars and their adherents. Robinson in his "Life in California" calls him a man of vice and makes a number of damaging assertions about his character and conduct, which are not in accordance with the facts. It was during Echeandia's term as governor that the motto of Mexico, Dios y Libertad (God and Liberty), was adopted. It became immensely popular and was used on all public documents and often in private correspondence.

A romantic episode that has furnished a theme for fiction writers occurred in the last year of Echeandia's rule. It was the elopement of Henry D. Fitch with Doña Josefa, daughter of Joaquin Carrillo of San Diego. Fitch was a native of New Bedford, Mass. He came to California in 1826 as master of the Maria Ester. He fell in love with Doña Josefa. There were legal obstructions to their marriage. Fitch was a foreigner and a Protestant. The latter objection was easily removed by Fitch becoming a Catholic. The Dominican friar who was to perform the marriage service, fearful that he might incur the wrath of the authorities, civil and clerical, refused to perform the ceremony, but suggested that there were other countries where the laws were less strict and offered to go beyond the limits of California and marry them. It is said that at this point Doña Josefa said: "Why don't you carry me off, Don Enrique?" The suggestion was quickly acted upon. The next night the lady, mounted on a steed with her cousin, Pio Pico, as an escort, was secretly taken to a point on the bay shore where a boat was waiting for her. The boat put off to the Vulture, where Captain Fitch received her on board and the vessel sailed for Valparaiso, where the couple were married. A year later Captain Fitch returned to California with his wife and infant son. At Monterey Fitch was arrested on an order of Padre Sanchez of San Gabriel and put in prison. His wife was also placed under arrest at the house of Captain Cooper. Fitch was taken to San Gabriel for trial, "his offenses being most heinous." At her intercession, Governor Echeandia released Mrs. Fitch and allowed her to go to San Gabriel, where her husband was imprisoned in one of the rooms of the mission. This act of clemency greatly enraged the friar and his fiscal, Palomares, and they seriously considered the question of arresting the governor. The trial dragged along for nearly a month. Many witnesses were examined and many learned points of clerical law discussed. Vicar Sanchez finally gave his decision that the marriage at Valparaiso, though not legitimate, was not null and void, but valid. The couple were condemned to do penance by "presenting themselves in church with lighted candles in their hands to hear high mass for three feast days and recite together for thirty days one-third of the rosary of the holy virgin."* In addition to these joint penances the vicar inflicted an additional penalty on Fitch in these words: "Yet considering the great scandal which Don Enrique has caused in this province I condemn him to give as penance and reparation a bell of at least fifty pounds in weight for the church at Los Angeles, which barely has a borrowed one." Fitch and his wife no doubt performed the joint penance imposed upon them, but the church at Los Angeles had to get along with its borrowed bell. Don Enrique never gave it one of fifty pounds or any other weight.

CHAPTER XI.

REVOLUTIONS—THE HIJAR COLONISTS.

MANUEL VICTORIA was appointed governor in March, 1830, but did not reach California until the last month of the year. Victoria very soon became unpopular. He undertook to overturn the civil authority and substitute military rule. He recommended the abolition of the ayuntamientos and refused to call together the territorial diputacion. He exiled Don Abel Stearns and José Antonio Carrillo; and at different times, on trumped-up charges, had half a hundred of the leading citizens of Los Angeles incarcerated in the pueblo jail. Alcalde Vicente Sanchez was the petty despot of the pueblo, who carried out the tyrannical decrees of his master, Victoria. Among others who were imprisoned in the cuartel was José Maria Avila. Avila was proud, haughty and overbearing. He had incurred the hatred of both Victoria and Sanchez. Sanchez, under orders from Victoria, placed Avila in prison, and to humiliate him put him in irons. Avila brooded over the indignities inflicted upon him and vowed to be revenged.

Victoria's persecutions became so unbearable that Pio Pico, Juan Bandini and José Antonio Carrillo raised the standard of revolt at San Diego and issued a pronouncement, in which they set forth the reasons why they felt themselves obliged to rise against the tyrant, Victoria. Pablo de Portilla, comandante of the presidio of San Diego, and his officers, with a force of fifty soldiers, joined the revolutionists and marched to Los Angeles. Sanchez's prisoners were released and he was chained up in the pueblo jail. Here Portilla's force was recruited to two hundred men. Avila and a number of the other released prisoners joined the revolutionists, and all marched forth to meet Victoria, who was moving southward with an armed force to suppress the insurrection. The two forces met on the plains of Caluenga, west of the pueblo, at a place known as the Lomitas de la Canada de Breita. The sight of his persecutor so infuriated Avila that alone he rushed upon him to run him through with his lance. Captain Pacheco, of Victoria's staff, parried the lance thrust. Avila shot him dead with one of his pistols and again attacked the governor and succeeded in wounding him, when he himself received a pistol ball that unhorsed him. After a desperate struggle (in which he seized Victoria by the foot and dragged him from his horse) he was shot by one of Victoria's soldiers. Portilla's army fell back in a panic to Los Angeles and Victoria's men carried the wounded governor to the Mission San Gabriel, where his wounds were dressed by Joseph Chapman, who, to his many other accomplishments, added that of amateur surgeon. Some citizens who had taken no part in the fight brought the bodies of Avila and Pacheco to the town. "They were taken to the same house, the same hands rendered them the last sad rites, and they were laid side by side. Side by side knelt their widows and mingled their tears, while sympathizing countrymen chanted the solemn prayers of the church for the repose of the souls of these untimely dead. Side by side beneath the orange and the olive in the little churchyard upon the plaza sleep the slayer and the slain."*

Next day, Victoria, supposing himself mortally wounded, abdicated and turned over the governorship of the territory to Echeandia. He resigned the office December 9, 1831, having been governor a little over ten months. When Victoria was able to travel he was sent to San Diego, from where he was deported to Mexico, San Diego borrowing $125 from the ayuntamiento of Los Angeles to pay the expense of shipping him out of the country. Several years afterwards the money had not been repaid, and the town council began proceedings to recover it, but there is no record in the archives to show that it was ever paid. And thus it was that California got rid of a bad governor and Los Angeles incurred a bad debt.

January 10, 1832, the territorial legislature met at Los Angeles to choose a "gefe politico," or governor, for the territory. Echeandia was invited to preside but replied from San Juan Capistrano that he was busy getting Victoria out of the country. The diputacion, after waiting some time and receiving no satisfaction from Echeandia whether he wanted the office or not, declared Pio Pico, by virtue of his office of senior vocal, "gefe politico."

No sooner had Pico been sworn into office than Echeandia discovered that he wanted the office and wanted it badly. He protested against the action of the diputacion and intrigued against Pico. Another revolution was threatened. Los Angeles favored Echeandia, although all the other towns in the territory had accepted Pico. (Pico at that time was a resident of San Diego.) A mass meeting was called on February 12, 1832, at Los Angeles, to discuss the question whether it should be Pico or Echeandia. I give the report of the meeting in the quaint language of the pueblo archives:

"The town, acting in accord with the Most Illustrious Ayuntamiento, answered in a loud voice, saying they would not admit Citizen Pio Pico as 'gefe politico,' but desired that Lieut.-Col. Citizen José Maria Echeandia be retained in office until the supreme government appoint. Then the president of the meeting, seeing the determination of the people, asked the motive or reason of refusing Citizen Pio Pico, who was of unblemished character. To this the people responded that while it was true that Citizen Pio Pico was to some extent qualified, yet they preferred Lieut.-Col. Citizen José M. Echeandia. The president of the meeting then asked the people whether they had been bribed, or was it merely insubordination that they opposed the resolution of the Most Excellent Diputación? Whereupon the people answered that they had not been bribed, nor were they insubordinate, but that they opposed the proposed 'gefe politico' because he had not been named by the supreme government."

At a public meeting February 19 the matter was again brought up. Again the people cried out "they would not recognize or obey any other gefe politico than Echeandia." The Most Illustrious Ayuntamiento opposed Pio Pico for two reasons: "First, because his name appeared first on the plan to oust Gefe Politico Citizen Manuel Victoria," and "Second, because he, Pico, had not sufficient capacity to fulfil the duties of the office." Then José Perez and José Antonio Carrillo withdrew from the meeting, saying they would not recognize Echeandia as "gefe politico." Pico, after holding the office for twenty days, resigned for the sake of peace. And this was the length of Pico's first term as governor.

Echeandia, by obstinacy and intrigue, had obtained the coveted office, "gefe politico," but he did not long enjoy it in peace. News came from Monterey that Capt. Agustin V. Zamorano had declared himself governor and was gathering a force to invade the south and enforce his authority. Echeandia began at once marshaling his forces to oppose him. Ybarra, Zamorano's military chief, with a force of one hundred men, by a forced march, reached Paso de Bartolo, on the San Gabriel river, where, fifteen years later, Stockton fought the Mexican troops under Flores. Here Ybarra found Captain Borroso posted with a piece of artillery and fourteen men. He did not dare to attack him. Echeandia and Borroso gathered a force of a thousand neophytes at Paso de Bartolo, where they drilled them in military evolutions. Ybarra's troops had fallen back to Santa Barbara, where he was joined by Zamorano with reinforcements. Ybarra's force was largely made up of ex-convicts and other undesirable characters, who took what they needed, asking no questions of the owners. The Angelenos, fearing those marauders, gave their adhesion to Zamorano's plan and recognized him as military chief of the territory. Captain Borroso, Echeandia's faithful adherent, disgusted with the fickleness of the Angelenos, at the head of a thousand mounted Indians, threatened to invade the recalcitrant pueblo, but at the intercession of the frightened inhabitants this modern Coriolanus turned aside and regaled his neophyte retainers on the fat bullocks of the Mission San Gabriel, much to the disgust of the padres. The neophyte warriors were disbanded and sent to their respective missions.

A peace was patched up between Zamorano and Echeandia. Alta California was divided into two territories. Echeandia was given jurisdiction over all south of San Gabriel and Zamorano all north of San Fernando. This division apparently left a neutral district, or "no man's land," between. Whether Los Angeles was in this neutral territory the records do not show. If it was, it is probable that neither of the governors wanted the job of governing the rebellious pueblo.

In January, 1833, Governor Figueroa arrived in California. Echeandia and Zamorano each surrendered his half of the divided territory to the newly appointed governor, and California was united and at peace. Figueroa proved to be the right man for the times. He conciliated the factions and brought order out of chaos. The two most important events in Figueroa's term of office were the arrival of the Hijar Colony in California and the secularization of the missions. These events were most potent factors in the evolution of the territory.

In 1833 the first California colonization scheme was inaugurated in Mexico. At the head of this was José Maria Hijar, a Mexican gentleman of wealth and influence. He was assisted in its promulgation by José M. Padres, an adventurer, who had been banished from California by Governor Victoria. Padres, like some of our modern real estate boomers, pictured the country as an earthly paradise—an improved and enlarged Garden of Eden. Among other inducements held out to the colonists, it is said, was the promise of a division among them of the mission property and a distribution of the neophytes for servants.

Headquarters were established at the city of Mexico and two hundred and fifty colonists enlisted. Each family received a bonus of $10, and all were to receive free transportation to California and rations while on the journey. Each head of a family was promised a farm from the public domain, live stock and farming implements; these advances to be paid for on the installment plan. The original plan was to found a colony somewhere north of San Francisco bay, but this was not carried out. Two vessels were dispatched with the colonists—the Morelos and the Natalia. The latter was compelled to put into San Diego on account of sickness on board. She reached that port September 1, 1834. A part of the colonists on board her were sent to San Pedro and from there they were taken to Los Angeles and San Gabriel. The Morelos reached Monterey September 25. Hijar had been appointed governor of California by President Farias, but after the sailing of the expedition, Santa Ana, who had succeeded Farias, dispatched a courier overland with a countermanding order. By one of the famous rides of history, Amador, the courier, made the journey from the city of Mexico to Monterey in forty days and delivered his message to Governor Figueroa. When Hijar arrived he found to his dismay that he was only a private citizen of the territory instead of its governor. The colonization scheme was abandoned and the immigrants distributed themselves throughout the territory. Generally they were a good class of citizens, and many of them became prominent in California affairs.

That storm center of political disturbances, Los Angeles, produced but one small revolution during Figueroa's term as governor. A party of fifty or sixty Sonorans, some of whom were Hijar colonists who were living either in the town or its immediate neighborhood, assembled at Los Nietos on the night of March 7, 1835. They formulated a pronunciamiento against Don José Figueroa, in which they first vigorously arraigned him for sins of omission and commission and then laid down their plan of government of the territory. Armed with this formidable document and a few muskets and lances, these patriots, headed by Juan Gallado, a cobbler, and Felipe Castillo, a cigarmaker, in the gray light of the morning, rode into the pueblo, took possession of the town hall and the big cannon and the ammunition that had been stored there when the Indians of San Luis Rey had threatened hostilities. The slumbering inhabitants were aroused from their dreams of peace by the drum beat of war. The terrified citizens rallied to the juzgado, the ayuntamiento met, the cobbler statesman, Gallado, presented his plan; it was discussed and rejected. The revolutionists, after holding possession of the pueblo throughout the day, tired, hungry and disappointed in not receiving their pay for saving the country, surrendered to the legal authorities the real leaders of the revolution and disbanded. The leaders proved to be Torres, a clerk, and Apalategui, a doctor, both supposed to be emissaries of Hijar. They were imprisoned at San Gabriel. When news of the revolt reached Figueroa he had Hijar and Padres arrested for complicity in the outbreak. Hijar, with half a dozen of his adherents, was shipped back to Mexico. And thus the man who the year before had landed in California with a commission as governor and authority to take possession of all the property belonging to the missions returned to his native land an exile. His grand colonization scheme and his "Compania Cosmopolitana" that was to revolutionize California commerce were both disastrous failures.

Governor José Figueroa died at Monterey on the 29th of September, 1835. He is generally regarded as the best of the Mexican governors sent to California. He was of Aztec extraction and took a great deal of pride in his Indian blood.

CHAPTER XII.

THE DECLINE AND FALL OF THE MISSIONS.

THE Franciscan Missions of Alta California have of late been a prolific theme for a certain class of writers and especially have they dwelt upon the secularization of these establishments. Their productions have added little or nothing to our previous knowledge of these institutions. Carried away by sentiment these writers draw pictures of mission life that are unreal, that are purely imaginary, and aroused to indignation at the injustice they fancy was done to their ideal institutions they deal out denunciations against the authorities that brought about secularization as unjust as they are undeserved. Such expressions as "the robber hand of secularization," and "the brutal and thievish disestablishment of the missions," emanate from writers who seem to be ignorant of the purpose for which the missions were founded, and who ignore, or who do not know, the causes which brought about their secularization.

It is an historical fact known to all acquainted with California history that these establishments were not intended by the Crown of Spain to become permanent institutions. The purpose for which the Spanish government fostered and protected them was to Christianize the Indians and make of them self-supporting citizens. Very early in its history Governor Borica, Fages and other intelligent Spanish officers in California discovered the weakness of the mission system. Governor Borica, writing in 1796, said: "According to the laws the natives are to be free from tutelage at the end of ten years, the missions then becoming doctrinaires, but those of New California, at the rate they are advancing, will not reach the goal in ten centuries; the reason God knows, and men, too, know something about it."

The tenure by which the mission friars held their lands is admirably set forth in William Carey Jones' "Report on Land Titles in California," made in 1850. He says, "It had been supposed that the lands they (the missions) occupied were grants held as the property of the church or of the mission establishments as corporations. Such, however, was not the case; all the missions in Upper California were established under the direction and mainly at the expense of the government, and the missionaries there had never any other right than to the occupation and use of the lands for the purpose of the missions and at the pleasure of the government. This is shown by the history and principles of their foundation, by the laws in relation to them, by the constant practice of the government toward them and, in fact, by the rules of the Franciscan order, which forbid its members to possess property."

With the downfall of Spanish domination in Mexico came the beginning of the end of missionary rule in California. The majority of the mission padres were Spanish born. In the war of Mexican independence their sympathies were with their mother country, Spain. After Mexico attained her independence, some of them refused to acknowledge allegiance to the republic. The Mexican authorities feared and distrusted them. In this, in part, they found a pretext for the disestablishment of the missions and the confiscation of the mission estates. There was another cause or reason for secularization more potent than the loyalty of the padres to Spain. Few forms of land monopoly have ever exceeded that in vogue under the mission system of California. From San Diego to San Francisco bay the twenty missions established under Spanish rule monopolized the greater part of the fertile land between the coast range and the sea. The limits of one mission were said to cover the intervening space to the limits of the next. There was but little left for other settlers. A settler could not obtain a grant of land if the padres of the nearest mission objected.

The twenty-four ranchos owned by the Mission San Gabriel contained about a million and a half acres and extended from the sea to the San Bernardino mountains. The greatest neophyte population of San Gabriel was in 1817, when it reached 1,701. Its yearly average for the first three decades of the present century did not exceed 1,500. It took a thousand acres of fertile land under the mission system to support an Indian, even the smallest papoose of the mission flock. It is not strange that the people clamored for a subdivision of the mission estates; and secularization became a public necessity. The most enthusiastic admirer of the missions to-day, had he lived in California seventy years ago, would no doubt have been among the loudest in his wail against the mission system.

The abuse heaped upon the Mexican authorities for their secularization of these institutions is as unjust as it is unmerited. The act of the Mexican Congress of August 17, 1833, was not the initiative movement towards their disestablishment. Indeed in their foundation their secularization, their subdivision into pueblos, was provided for and the local authorities were never without lawful authority over them. In the very beginning of missionary work in Alta California the process of secularizing the mission establishments was mapped out in the following "Instructions given by Viceroy Bucarili August 17, 1773, to the comandante of the new establishments of San Diego and Monterey.

Article 15, when it shall happen that a mission is to be formed into a pueblo or village the comandante will proceed to reduce it to the civil and economical government, which, according to the laws, is observed by other villages of this kingdom; their giving it a name and declaring for its patron the saint under whose memory and protection the mission was founded."

The purpose for which the mission was founded was to aid in the settlement of the country, and to convert the natives to Christianity. "These objects accomplished the missionary's labor was considered fulfilled and the establishment subject to dissolution. This view of their purpose and destiny fully appears in the tenor of the decree of the Spanish Cortes of September 13, 1813. It was passed in consequence of a complaint by the Bishop of Guiana of the evils that affected that province on account of the Indian settlements in charge of missions not being delivered to the ecclesiastical ordinary, although thirty, forty and fifty years had passed since the reduction and conversion of the Indians."*

The Cortes decreed 1st, that all the new reducciones y doctrinairs (settlements of newly converted Indians) not yet formed into parishes of the province beyond the sea which were in charge of missionary monks and had been ten years subjected should be delivered immediately to the respective ecclesiastical ordinaries (bishops) without resort to any excuse or pretext conformably to the laws and cédulas in that respect. Section 2nd, provided that the secular clergy should attend to the spiritual wants of these curacies. Section 3rd, the missionary monks relieved from the converted settlements shall proceed to the conversion of other heathen."

The decree of the Mexican Congress, passed November 20, 1833, for the secularization of the missions of Upper and Lower California, was very similar in its provisions to the decree of the Spanish Cortes of September, 1813. The Mexican government simply followed the example of Spain and in the conversion of the missions into pueblos was attempting to enforce a principle inherent in the foundation of the missionary establishments. That secularization resulted disastrously to the Indians was not the fault of the Mexican government so much as it was the defect in the industrial and intellectual training of the neophytes. Except in the case of those who were trained for choir services in the churches there was no attempt made to teach the Indians to read or write. The padres generally entertained a poor opinion of the neophytes' intellectual ability. The reglamento governing the secularization of the missions, published by Governor Echeandia in 1830, but not enforced, and that formulated by the diputacion under Governor Figueroa in 1834, approved by the Mexican Congress and finally enforced in 1834-5-6, were humane measures. These regulations provided for the colonization of the neophytes into pueblos or villages. A portion of the personal property and a part of the lands held by the missions were to be distributed among the Indians as follows:

"Article 5—To each head of a family and all who are more than twenty years old, although without families, will be given from the lands of the mission, whether temporal (lands dependent on the seasons) or watered, a lot of ground not to contain more than four hundred varas (yards) in length, and as many in breadth not less than one hundred. Sufficient land for watering the cattle will be given in common. The outlets or roads shall be marked out by each village, and at the proper time the corporation lands shall be designated." This colonization of the neophytes into pueblos would have thrown large bodies of the land held by the missions open to settlement by white settlers. The personal property of missionary establishments was to have been divided among their neophyte retainers thus: "Article 6. Among the said individuals will be distributed, ratably and justly, according to the discretion of the political chief, the half of the movable property, taking as a basis the last inventory which the missionaries have presented of all descriptions of cattle. Article 7. One-half or less of the implements and seeds indispensable for agriculture shall be allotted to them."

The political government of the Indian pueblos was to be organized in accordance with existing laws of the territory governing other towns. The neophyte could not sell, mortgage or dispose of the land granted him; nor could he sell his cattle. The regulations provided that "Religious missionaries shall be relieved from the administration of temporalities and shall only exercise the duties of their ministry so far as they relate to spiritual matters." The nunneries or the houses where the Indian girls were kept under the charge of a duena until they were of marriageable age were to be abolished and the children restored to their parents. Rule 7 provided that "What is called the 'priesthood' shall immediately cease, female children whom they have in charge being handed over to their fathers, explaining to them the care they should take of them, and pointing out their obligations as parents. The same shall be done with the male children."

Commissioners were to be appointed to take charge of the mission property and superintend its subdivision among the neophytes. The conversion of ten of the missionary establishments into pueblos was to begin in August, 1835. That of the others was to follow as soon as possible. San Gabriel, San Fernando and San Juan Capistrano were among the ten that were to be secularized first. For years secularization had threatened the missions, but hitherto something had occurred at the critical time to avert it. The missionaries had used their influence against it, had urged that the neophytes were unfitted for self-support, had argued that the emancipation of the natives from mission rule would result in disaster to them. Through all the agitation of the question in previous years the padres had labored on in the preservation and upbuilding of their establishments; but with the issuing of the secularization decree by the Mexican Congress, August 17, 1833, the organization of the Hajar Colony in Mexico and the instructions of acting president Farias to Hajar to occupy all the property of the missions and subdivide it among the colonists on their arrival in California, convinced the missionaries that the blow could no longer be averted. The revocation of Hajar's appointment as governor and the controversy which followed between him and Governor Figueroa and the diputacion for a time delayed the enforcement of the decree.

In the meantime, with the energy born of despair, eager at any cost to outwit those who sought to profit by their ruin, the mission fathers hastened to destroy that which through more than half a century thousands of human beings had spent their lives to accumulate. The wealth of the missions lay in their herds of cattle. The only marketable products of these were the hides and tallow. Heretofore a certain number of cattle had been slaughtered each week to feed the neophytes and sometimes when the ranges were in danger of becoming overstocked cattle were killed for their hides and tallow, and the meat left to the coyotes and the carrion crows. The mission fathers knew that if they allowed the possession of their herds to pass to other hands neither they nor the neophytes would obtain any reward for years of labor. The blow was liable to fall at any time. Haste was required. The mission butchers could not slaughter the animals fast enough. Contracts were made with the rancheros to kill on shares. The work of destruction began at the missions. The country became a mighty shambles. The matansas were no longer used. An animal was lassoed on the plain, thrown, its throat cut and while yet writhing in death agony, its hide was stripped and pegged upon the ground to dry. There were no vessels to contain the tallow and this was run into pits in the ground to be taken out when there was more time to spare and less cattle to be killed. The work of destruction went on as long as there were cattle to kill. So great was the stench from rotting carcasses of the cattle on the plains that a pestilence was threatened. The ayuntamiento of Los Angeles, November 15, 1833, passed an ordinance compelling all persons slaughtering cattle for the hides and tallow to cremate the carcasses. Some of the rancheros laid the foundations of their future wealth by appropriating herds of young cattle from the mission ranges.

Hugo Reid, in the letters previously referred to in this volume, says of this period at San Gabriel, "These facts (the decree of secularization and the distribution of the mission property) being known to Padre Tomas (Estenaga), he, in all probability, by order of his superior, commenced a work of destruction. The back buildings were unroofed and the timber converted into fire wood. Cattle were killed on the halves by people who took a lion's share. Utensils were disposed of and goods and other articles distributed in profusion among the neophytes. The vineyards were ordered to be cut down, which, however, the Indians refused to do." After the mission was placed in charge of an administrator, Padre Tomas remained as minister of the church at a stipend of $1,500 per annum, derived from the pious fund.

Hugo Reid says of him, "As a wrong impression of his character may be produced from the preceding remarks, in justice to his memory, be it stated that he was a truly good man, a sincere Christian and a despiser of hypocrisy. He had a kind, unsophisticated heart, so that he believed every word told him. There has never been a purer priest in California. Reduced in circumstances, annoyed on many occasions by the petulance of administrators, he fulfilled his duties according to his conscience, with benevolence and good humor. The nuns, who, when the secular movement came into operation, had been set free, were again gathered together under his supervision and maintained at his expense, as were also a number of old men and women."

The experiment of colonizing the Indians in pueblos was a failure and they were gathered back into the mission, or as many of them as could be got back, and placed in charge of administrators. "The Indians," says Reid, "were made happy at this time in being permitted to enjoy once more the luxury of a tule dwelling, from which the greater part had been debarred for so long; they could now breathe freely again." (The close adobe buildings in which they had been housed in mission days were no doubt one of the causes of the great mortality among them.)

"Administrator followed administrator until the mission could support no more, when the system was broken up." * * * "The Indians during this period were continually running off. Scantily clothed and still more scantily supplied with food, it was not to be wondered at. Nearly all the Gabrielinos went north, while those of San Diego, San Luis and San Juan overrun this country, filling the Angeles and surrounding ranchos with more servants than were required. Labor, in consequence, was very cheap. The different missions, however, had alcaldes continually on the move, hunting them up and carrying them back, but to no purpose; it was labor in vain."

"Even under the dominion of the church in mission days," Reid says, "the neophytes were addicted both to drinking and gaming, with an inclination to steal;" but after their emancipation they went from bad to worse. Those attached to the ranchos and those located in the town were virtually slaves. They had bosses or owners and when they ran away were captured and returned to their master. The account book for 1840 of the sindico of Los Angeles contains this item, "For the delivery of two Indians to their boss $12."

In all the large towns there was an Indian village known as the puerblito or little town. These were the sink holes of crime and the favorite resorts of dissolute characters, both white and red. The Indian village at Los Angeles between what is now Aliso and First street became such an intolerable nuisance that on petition of the citizens it was removed across the river to the "Spring of the Abilas," but its removal did not improve its morals. Vicente Guerrero, the sindico, discussing the Indian question before the ayuntamiento said, "The Indians are so utterly depraved that no matter where they may settle down their conduct would be the same, since they look upon death even with indifference, provided they can indulge in their pleasures and vices." This was their condition in less than a decade after they were freed from mission control.

What did six decades of mission rule accomplish for the Indian? In all the older missions between their founding and their secularization three generations of adults had come under the influence of mission life and training—first, the adult converts made soon after the founding; second, their children born at the missions, and third, the children of these who had grown to manhood before the fall of the missions. How great an improvement had the neophytes of the third generation made over those of the first? They had to a great extent lost their original language and had acquired a speaking knowledge of Spanish. They had abandoned or forgotten their primitive religious belief, but their new religion exercised but little influence on their lives. After their emancipation they went from bad to worse. Some of the more daring escaped to the mountains and joining the wild tribes there became the leaders in frequent predatory excursions on the horses and cattle of the settlers in the valleys. They were hunted down and shot like wild beasts.

What became of the mission estates? As the cattle were killed off the different ranchos of the mission domains, settlers petitioned the ayuntamiento for grants. If upon investigation it was found that the land asked for was vacant the petition was referred to the governor for his approval. In this way the vast mission domains passed into private hands. The country improved more in wealth and population between 1836 and 1846 than in the previous fifty years. Secularization was destruction to the mission and death to the Indian, but it was beneficial to the country at large. The decline of the missions and the passing of the neophyte had begun long before the decrees of secularization were enforced. Nearly all the missions passed their zenith in population during the second decade of the century. Even had the missionary establishments not been secularized they would eventually have been depopulated. At no time during the mission rule were the number of births equal to the number of deaths. When recruits could no longer be obtained from the Gentiles or wild Indians the decline became more rapid. The mission annals show that from 1769 to 1834, when secularization was enforced—an interval of sixty-five years—79,000 converts were baptized and 62,000 deaths recorded. The death rate among the neophytes was about twice that of the negro in this country and four times that of the white race. The extinction of the neophyte or mission Indian was due to the enforcement of that inexorable law or decree of nature, the Survival of the Fittest. Where a stronger race comes in contact with a weaker, there can be but one termination of the contest—the extermination of the weaker.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE FREE AND SOVEREIGN STATE OF ALTA CALIFORNIA.

GOVERNOR FIGUEROA on his deathbed turned over the civil command of the territory to José Castro, who thereby became "gefe politico ad interim." The military command was given to Lieut.-Col. Nicolas Gutierrez with the rank of comandante general. The separation of the two commands was in accordance with the national law of May 6, 1822.

Castro was a member of the diputacion, but was not senior vocal or president. José Antonio Carrillo, who held that position, was diputado or delegate to congress and was at that time in the city of Mexico. It was he who secured the decree from the Mexican Congress May 23, 1835, making Los Angeles the capital of California, and elevating it to the rank of a city. The second vocal, José Antonio Estudillo, was sick at his home in San Diego. José Castro ranked third. He was the only one of the diputacion at the capital and at the previous meeting of the diputacion he had acted as presiding officer. Gutierrez, who was at San Gabriel when appointed to the military command, hastened to Monterey, but did not reach there until after the death of Figueroa. Castro, on assuming command, sent a notification of his appointment to the civil authorities of the different jurisdictions. All responded favorably except San Diego and Los Angeles. San Diego claimed the office for Estudillo, second vocal, and Los Angeles declared against Castro because he was only third vocal and demanded that the diputacion should meet at the legal capital (Los Angeles) of the territory. This was the beginning of the capital war that lasted ten years and increased in bitterness as it increased in age. The diputacion met at Monterey. It decided in favor of Castro and against removing the capital to Los Angeles.

Castro executed the civil functions of gefe politico four months and then, in accordance with orders from the supreme government, he turned over his part of the governorship to Comandante General Gutierrez and again the two commands were united in one person. Gutierrez filled the office of "gobernador interno" from January 2, 1836, to the arrival of his successor, Mariano Chico. Chico had been appointed governor by President Barragan, December 16, 1835, but did not arrive in California until April, 1836. Thus California had four governors within nine months. They changed so rapidly there was not time to foment a revolution. Chico began his administration by a series of petty tyrannies. Just before his arrival in California a vigilance committee at Los Angeles shot to death Gervacio Alispaz and his paramour, Maria del Rosaria Villa, for the murder of the woman's husband, Domingo Feliz. Alispaz was a countryman of Chico. Chico had the leaders arrested and came down to Los Angeles with the avowed purpose of executing Prudon, Arzaga and Aranjó, the president, secretary and military commander, respectively, of the Defenders of Public Security, as the vigilantes called themselves. He announced his intention of arresting and punishing every man who had taken part in the banishment of Governor Victoria. He summoned Don Abel Stearns to Monterey and threatened to have him shot for some imaginary offense. He fulminated a fierce pronunciamiento against foreigners, that incurred their wrath, and made himself so odious that he was hated by all, native or foreigner. He was a centralist and opposed to popular rights. Exasperated beyond endurance by his scandalous conduct and unseemly exhibitions of temper the people of Monterey rose en masse against him, and so terrified him that he took passage on board a brig that was lying in the harbor and sailed for Mexico with the threat that he would return with an armed force to punish the rebellious Californians, but he never came back again.

With the enforced departure of Chico, the civil command of the territory devolved upon Nicolas Gutierrez, who still held the military command. He was of Spanish birth and a centralist or anti-federalist in politics. Although a mild mannered man he seemed to be impressed with the idea that he must carry out the arbitrary measures of his predecessor. Centralism was his nemesis. Like Chico, he was opposed to popular rights and at one time gave orders to disperse the diputacion by force. He was not long in making himself unpopular by attempting to enforce the centralist decrees of the Mexican Congress.

He quarreled with Juan Bautista Alvarado, the ablest of the native Californians. Alvarado and José Castro raised the standard of revolt. They gathered together a small army of rancheros and an auxiliary force of twenty-five American hunters and trappers under Graham, a backwoodsman from Tennessee. By a strategic movement they captured the castillo or fort which commanded the presidio, where Gutierrez and the Mexican army officials were stationed. The patriots demanded the surrender of the presidio and the arms. The governor refused. The revolutionists had been able to find but a single cannon ball in the castillo, but this was sufficient to do the business. A well-directed shot tore through the roof of the governor's house, covering him and his staff with the debris of broken tiles; that and the desertion of most of his soldiers to the patriots brought him to terms. On the 5th of November, 1836, he surrendered the presidio and resigned his authority as governor. He and about seventy of his adherents were sent aboard a vessel lying in the harbor and shipped out of the country.

With the Mexican governor and his officers out of the country, the next move of Castro and Alvarado was to call a meeting of the diputacion or territorial congress. A plan for the independence of California was adopted. This, which was known afterwards as the Monterey plan, consisted of six sections, the most important of which were as follows: "First, Alta California hereby declares itself independent from Mexico until the Federal System of 1824 is restored. Second, the same California is hereby declared a free and sovereign state; establishing a congress to enact the special laws of the country and the other necessary supreme powers. Third, the Roman Apostolic Catholic religion shall prevail; no other creed shall be allowed, but the government shall not molest anyone on account of his private opinions." The diputacion issued a declaration of independence that arraigned the mother country, Mexico, and her officials very much in the style that our own Declaration gives it to King George III, and England.

Castro issued a pronunciamiento, ending with Viva La Federacion! Viva La Libertad! Viva el Estado Libre y Soberano de Alta California! Thus amid vivas and proclamations, with the beating of drums and the booming of cannon, El Estado Libre de Alta California (The Free State of Alta California) was launched on the political sea. But it was rough sailing for the little craft. Her ship of state struck a rock and for a time shipwreck was threatened.

For years there had been a growing jealousy between Northern and Southern California. Los Angeles, as has been stated before, had by a decree of the Mexican congress been made the capital of the territory. Monterey had persistently refused to give up the governor and the archives. In the movement to make Alta California a free and independent state, the Angeleños recognized an attempt on the part of the people of the north to deprive them of the capital. Although as bitterly opposed to Mexican governors, and as active in fomenting revolutions against them as the people of Monterey, the Angeleños chose to profess loyalty to the mother country. They opposed the plan of government adopted by the congress at Monterey and promulgated a plan of their own, in which they declared California was not free; that the "Roman Catholic Apostolic religion shall prevail in this jurisdiction, and any person publicly professing any other shall be prosecuted by law as heretofore." A mass meeting was called to take measures "to prevent the spreading of the Monterey revolution, so that the progress of the nation may not be paralyzed," and to appoint a person to take military command of the department.

San Diego and San Luis Rey took the part of Los Angeles in the quarrel, Sonoma and San José joined Monterey, while Santa Barbara, always conservative, was undecided, but finally issued a plan of her own. Alvarado and Castro determined to suppress the revolutionary Angeleños. They collected a force of one hundred men, made up of natives, with Graham's contingent of twenty-five American riflemen. With this army they prepared to move against the recalcitrant sureños.

The ayuntamiento of Los Angeles began preparations to resist the invaders. An army of two hundred and seventy men was enrolled, a part of which was made up of neophytes. To secure the sinews of war José Sepulveda, second alcalde, was sent to the Mission San Fernando to secure what money there was in the hands of the major domo. He returned with two packages, which, when counted, were found to contain $2,000.

Scouts patrolled the Santa Barbara road as far as San Buenaventura to give warning of the approach of the enemy, and pickets guarded the Pass of Cahuenga and the Rodeo de Las Aguas to prevent northern spies from entering and southern traitors from getting out of the pueblo. The southern army was stationed at San Fernando under the command of Alferéz (Lieut.) Rocha. Alvarado and Castro, pushing down the coast, reached Santa Barbara, where they were kindly received and their force recruited to one hundred and twenty men with two pieces of artillery. José Sepulveda at San Fernando sent to Los Angeles for the cannon at the town house and $200 of the mission money to pay his men.

On the 16th of January, 1837, Alvarado from San Buenaventura dispatched a communication to the ayuntamiento of Los Angeles and the citizens, telling them what military resources he had, which he would use against them if it became necessary, but he was willing to confer upon a plan of settlement. Sepulveda and Antonio M. Osio were appointed commissioners and sent to confer with the governor, armed with several propositions, the substance of which was that California shall not be free and the Catholic religion must prevail with the privilege to prosecute any other religion, "according to law as heretofore." The commissioners met Alvarado on "neutral ground," between San Fernando and San Buenaventura. A long discussion followed without either coming to the point. Alvarado, by a coup d'état, brought it to an end. In the language of the commissioners' report to the ayuntamiento: "While we were a certain distance from our own forces with only four unarmed men and were on the point of coming to an agreement with Juan B. Alvarado, we saw the Monterey division advancing upon us and we were forced to deliver up the instructions of this illustrious body through fear of being attacked." They delivered up not only the instructions, but the Mission San Fernando. The southern army was compelled to surrender it and fall back on the pueblo, Rocha swearing worse than "our army in Flanders" because he was not allowed to fight. The southern soldiers had a wholesome dread of Graham's riflemen. These fellows, armed with long Kentucky rifles, shot to kill, and a battle once begun somebody would have died for his country and it would not have been Alvarado's riflemen.

The day after the surrender of the mission, January 21, 1837, the ayuntamiento held a session and the members were as obdurate and belligerent as ever. They resolved that it was only in the interests of humanity that the mission had been surrendered and their army forced to retire. "This ayuntamiento, considering the commissioners were forced to comply, annuls all action of the commissioners and does not recognize this territory as a free and sovereign state nor Juan B. Alvarado as its governor, and declares itself in favor of the Supreme Government of Mexico." A few days later Alvarado entered the city without opposition, the Angelenian soldiers retiring to San Gabriel and from there scattering to their homes.

On the 26th of January an extraordinary session of the most illustrious ayuntamiento was held. Alvarado was present and made a lengthy speech, in which he said, "The native sons were subjected to ridicule by the Mexican mandarins sent here, and knowing our rights we ought to shake off the ominous yoke of bondage." Then he produced and read the six articles of the Monterey plan, the council also produced a plan and a treaty of amity was effected. Alvarado was recognized as governor pro tem. and peace reigned. The belligerent sureños vied with each other in expressing their admiration for the new order of things. Pio Pico wished to express the pleasure it gave him to see a "hijo del pais" in office. And Antonio Osio, the most belligerent of the sureños, declared "that sooner than again submit to a Mexican dictator as governor, he would flee to the forest and be devoured by wild beasts." The ayuntamiento was asked to provide a building for the government, "this being the capital of the state." The hatchet apparently was buried. Peace reigned in El Estado Libre. At the meeting of the town council, on the 30th of January, Alvarado made another speech, but it was neither conciliatory nor complimentary. He arraigned the "traitors who were working against the peace of the country" and urged the members to take measures "to liberate the city from the hidden hands that will tangle them in their own ruin." The pay of his troops who were ordered here for the welfare of California is due "and it is an honorable and preferred debt, therefore the ayuntamiento will deliver to the government the San Fernando money," said he. With a wry face, very much such as a boy wears when he is told that he has been spanked for his own good, the alcalde turned over the balance of the mission money to Juan Bautista, and the governor took his departure for Monterey, leaving, however, Col. José Castro with part of his army stationed at Mission San Gabriel, ostensibly "to support the city's authority," but in reality to keep a close watch on the city authorities.

Los Angeles was subjugated, peace reigned and El Estado Libre de Alta California took her place among the nations of the earth. But peace's reign was brief. At the meeting of the ayuntamiento May 27, 1838, Juan Bandini and Santiago E. Arguello of San Diego, appeared with a pronunciamiento and a plan, San Diego's plan of government. Monterey, Santa Barbara and Los Angeles had each formulated a plan of government for the territory, and now it was San Diego's turn. Agustin V. Zamorano, who had been exiled with Governor Gutierrez, had crossed the frontier and was made comandante-general and territorial political chief ad interim by the San Diego revolutionists. The plan restored California to obedience to the supreme government; all acts of the diputacion and the Monterey plan were annulled and the northern rebels were to be arraigned and tried for their part in the revolution; and so on through twenty articles.

On the plea of an Indian outbreak near San Diego, in which the redmen, it was said, "were to make an end of the white race," the big cannon and a number of men were secured at Los Angeles to assist in suppressing the Indians, but in reality to reinforce the army of the San Diego revolutionists. With a force of one hundred and twenty-five men under Zamorano and Portilla, "the army of the supreme government" moved against Castro at Los Angeles. Castro retreated to Santa Barbara and Portilla's army took position at San Fernando.

The civil and military officials of Los Angeles took the oath to support the Mexican constitution of 1836 and, in their opinion, this absolved them from all allegiance to Juan Bautista and his Monterey plan. Alvarado hurried reinforcements to Castro at Santa Barbara, and Portilla called loudly for "men, arms and horses," to march against the northern rebels. But neither military chieftain advanced, and the summer wore away without a battle. There were rumors that Mexico was preparing to send an army of one thousand men to subjugate the rebellious Californians. In October came the news that José Antonio Carrillo, the Machiavelli of California politics, had persuaded President Bustamante to appoint Carlos Carrillo, José's brother, governor of Alta California.

Then consternation seized the arribeños (uppers) of the north and the abajeños (lowers) of Los Angeles went wild with joy. It was not that they loved Carlos Carrillo, for he was a Santa Barbara man and had opposed them in the late unpleasantness, but they saw in his appointment an opportunity to get revenge on Juan Bautista for the way he had humiliated them. They sent congratulatory messages to Carrillo and invited him to make Los Angeles the seat of his government. Carrillo was flattered by their attentions and consented. The 6th of December, 1837, was set for his inauguration, and great preparations were made for the event. The big cannon was brought over from San Gabriel to fire salutes and the city was ordered illuminated on the nights of the 6th, 7th and 8th of December. Cards of invitation were issued and the people from the city and country were invited to attend the inauguration ceremonies, "dressed as decent as possible," so read the invitations.

The widow Josefa Alvarado's house, the finest in the city, was secured for the governor's palacio (palace). The largest hall in the city was secured for the services and decorated as well as it was possible. The city treasury, being in its usual state of collapse, a subscription for defraying the expenses was opened and horses, hides and tallow, the current coin of the pueblo, were liberally contributed.

On the appointed day, "the most illustrious ayuntamiento and the citizens of the neighborhood (so the old archives read) met his excellency, the governor, Don Carlos Carrillo, who made his appearance with a magnificent accompaniment." The secretary, Narciso Botello, "read in a loud, clear and intelligible voice, the oath, and the governor repeated it after him." At the moment the oath was completed, the artillery thundered forth a salute and the bells rang out a merry peal. The governor made a speech, when all adjourned to the church, where a mass was said and a solemn Te Deum sung; after which all repaired to the house of his excellency, where the southern patriots drank his health in bumpers of wine and shouted themselves hoarse in vivas to the new government. An inauguration ball was held—"the beauty and the chivalry of the south were gathered there." Outside the tallow dips flared and flickered from the porticos of the house, bonfires blazed in the streets and cannon boomed salvos from the old plaza. Los Angeles was the capital at last and had a gov-error all to herself, for Santa Barbara refused to recognize Carrillo, although he belonged within its jurisdiction.

The Angeleños determined to subjugate the Barbareños. An army of two hundred men, under Castenada, was sent to capture the city. After a few futile demonstrations, Castenada's forces fell back to San Buenaventura.

Then Alvarado determined to subjugate the Angeleños. He and Castro, gathering together an army of two hundred men, by forced marches reached San Buenaventura, and by a strategic movement captured all of Castenada's horses and drove his army into the mission church. For two days the battle raged and, "cannon to the right of them," and "cannon in front of them volleyed and thundered." One man was killed on the northern side and the blood of several mustangs watered the soil of their native land—died for their country. The southerners slipped out of the church at night and fled up the valley on foot. Castro's caballeros captured about seventy prisoners. Pio Pico, with reinforcements, met the remnant of Castenada's army at the Santa Clara river, and together all fell back to Los Angeles. Then there was wailing in the old pueblo, where so lately there had been rejoicing. Gov. Carlos Carrillo gathered together what men he could get to go with him and retreated to San Diego. Alvarado's army took possession of the southern capital and some of the leading conspirators were sent as prisoners to the castillo at Sonoma.

Carrillo, at San Diego, received a small reinforcement from Mexico, under a Captain Tobar. Tobar was made general and given command of the southern army. Carrillo, having recovered from his fright, sent an order to the northern rebels to surrender within fifteen days under penalty of being shot as traitors if they refused. In the meantime Los Angeles was held by the enemy. The second alcalde (the first, Louis Aranas, was a prisoner) called a meeting to devise some means "to have his excellency, Don Carlos Carrillo, return to this capital, as his presence is very much desired by the citizens to protect their lives and property." A committee was appointed to locate Don Carlos.

Instead of surrendering, Castro and Alvarado, with a force of two hundred men, advanced against Carrillo. The two armies met at Campo de Las Flores. General Tobar had fortified a cattle corral with rawhides, carretas and cottonwood poles. A few shots from Alvarado's artillery scattered Tobar's rawhide fortifications. Carrillo surrendered. Tobar and a few of the leaders escaped to Mexico. Alvarado ordered the misguided Angeleñan soldiers to go home and behave themselves. He brought the captive governor back with him and left him with his (Carrillo's) wife at Santa Barbara, who became surety for the deposed ruler. Not content with his unfortunate attempts to rule, he again claimed the governorship on the plea that he had been appointed by the supreme government. But the Angeleños had had enough of him. Disgusted with his incompetency, Juan Gallardo, at the session of May 14, 1838, presented a petition praying that this ayuntamiento do not recognize Carlos Carrillo as governor, and setting forth the reasons why we, the petitioners, "should declare ourselves subject to the northern governor" and why they opposed Carrillo.

"First. In having compromised the people from San Buenaventura south into a declaration of war, the incalculable calamities of which will never be forgotten, not even by the most ignorant.

"Second. Not satisfied with the unfortunate event of San Buenaventura, he repeated the same at Campo de Las Flores, which, only through a divine dispensation, California is not to-day in mourning." Seventy citizens signed the petition, but the city attorney, who had done time in Vallejo's castillo, decided the petition illegal because it was written on common paper when paper with the proper seal could be obtained.

Next day Gallardo returned with his petition on legal paper. The ayuntamiento decided to sound the "public alarm" and call the people together to give them "public speech." The public alarm was sounded. The people assembled at the city hall; speeches were made on both sides; and when the vote was taken twenty-two were in favor of the northern governor, five in favor of whatever the ayuntamiento decides, and Serbulo Vareles alone voted for Don Carlos Carrillo. So the council decided to recognize Don Juan Bautista Alvarado as governor and level the supreme government to settle the contest between him and Carrillo.

Notwithstanding this apparent burying of the hatchet, there were rumors of plots and intrigues in Los Angeles and San Diego against Alvarado. At length, aggravated beyond endurance, the governor sent word to the sureños that if they did not behave themselves he would shoot ten of the leading men of the south. As he had about that number locked up in the castillo at Sonoma, his was no idle threat. One by one Alvarado's prisoners of state were released from Vallejo's bastille at Sonoma and returned to Los Angeles, sadder if not wiser men. At the session of the ayuntamiento October 20, 1838, the president announced that Senior Regidor José Palomares had returned from Sonoma, where he had been compelled to go by reason of "political differences," and that he should be allowed his seat in the council. The request was granted unanimously.

At the next meeting Narciso Botello, its former secretary, after five and a half months' imprisonment at Sonoma, put in an appearance and claimed his office and his pay. Although others had filled the office in the interim the illustrious ayuntamiento, "ignoring for what offense he was incarcerated, could not suspend his salary." But his salary was suspended. The treasury was empty. The last horse and the last hide had been paid out to defray the expense of the inauguration festivities of Carlos, the Pretender, and the civil war that followed. Indeed there was a treasury deficit of whole caballadas of horses, and bales of hides. Narciso's back pay was a preferred claim that outlasted El Estado Libre.

The sureños of Los Angeles and San Diego, finding that in Alvarado they had a man of courage and determination to deal with, ceased from troubling him and submitted to the inevitable. At the meeting of the ayuntamiento, October 5, 1839, a notification was received, stating that the supreme government of Mexico had appointed Juan Bautista Alvarado governor of the department. There was no grumbling or dissent. On the contrary, the records say, "This illustrious body acknowledges receipt of the communication and congratulated his excellency. It will announce the same to the citizens to-morrow (Sunday), will raise the national colors, salute the same with the required number of volleys, and will invite the people to illuminate their houses for a better display in rejoicing at such a happy appointment." With his appointment by the supreme government the "free and sovereign state of Alta California" became a dream of the past—a dead nation. Indeed, months before Alvarado had abandoned his idea of founding an independent state and had taken the oath of allegiance to the constitution of 1836. The loyal sureños received no thanks from the supreme government for all their professions of loyalty, whilst the rebellious arribeños of the north obtained all the rewards—the governor, the capital and the offices. The supreme government gave the deposed governor, Carlos Carrillo, a grant of the island of Santa Rosa, in the Santa Barbara Channel, but whether it was given him as a salve to his wounded dignity or as an Elba or St. Helena, where, in the event of his stirring up another revolution, he might be banished a la Napoleon, the records do not inform us.

DECLINE AND FALL OF MEXICAN DOMINATION.

WHILE the revolution begun by Alvarado and Castro had not established California's independence, it had effectually rid the territory of Mexican dictators. A native son was governor of the department of the Californians (by the constitution of 1836 Upper and Lower California had been united into a department); another native son was comandante of its military forces. The membership of the departmental junta, which had taken the place of the diputacion, was largely made up of sons of the soil, and natives filled the minor offices. In their zeal to rid themselves of Mexican office-holders they had invoked the assistance of another element that was ultimately to be their undoing.

During the revolutionary era just passed the foreign population had largely increased. Not only had the foreigners come by sea, but they had come by land. Capt. Jedediah S. Smith, a New England-born trapper and hunter, was the first man to enter California by the overland route. A number of trappers and hunters came in the early '30s from New Mexico by way of the old Spanish trail. This immigration was largely American, and was made up of a bold, adventurous class of men, some of them not the most desirable immigrants. Of this latter class were some of Graham's followers.

By invoking Graham's aid to put him in power, Alvarado had fastened upon his shoulders an old Man of the Sea. It was easy enough to enlist the services of Graham's riflemen, but altogether another matter to get rid of them. Now that he was firmly established in power, Alvarado would, no doubt, have been glad to be rid entirely of his recent allies, but Graham and his adherents were not backward in giving him to understand that he owed his position to them, and they were inclined to put themselves on an equality with him. This did not comport with his ideas of the dignity of his office. To be hailed by some rough buckskin-clad trapper with "Ho! Bautista; come here, I want to speak with you," was an affront to his pride that the governor of the two Californias could not quietly pass over, and, besides, like all of his countrymen, he disliked foreigners.

There were rumors of another revolution, and it was not difficult to persuade Alvarado that the foreigners were plotting to revolutionize California. Mexico had recently lost Texas, and the same class of "malditos extranjeros" (wicked strangers) were invading California, and would ultimately possess themselves of the country. Accordingly, secret orders were sent throughout the department to arrest and imprison all foreigners. Over one hundred men of different nationalities were arrested, principally Americans and English. Of these forty-seven were shipped to San Blas, and from there marched overland to Tepic, where they were imprisoned for several months. Through the efforts of the British consul, Barron, they were released. Castro, who had accompanied the prisoners to Mexico to prefer charges against them, was placed under arrest and afterwards tried by court-martial, but was acquitted. He had been acting under orders from his superiors. After an absence of over a year twenty of the exiles landed at Monterey on their return from Mexico. Robinson, who saw them land, says: "They returned neatly dressed, armed with rifles and swords, and looking in much better condition than when they were sent away, or probably than they had ever looked in their lives before." The Mexican government had been compelled to pay them damages for their arrest and imprisonment and to return them to California. Graham, the reputed leader of the foreigners, was the owner of a distillery near Santa Cruz, and had gathered a number of hard characters around him. It would have been no loss had he never returned.

The only other event of importance during Alvarado's term as governor was the capture of Monterey by Commodore Ap Catesby Jones, of the United States navy. This event happened after Alvarado's successor, Micheltorena, had landed in California, but before the government had been formally turned over to him.

The following extract from the diary of a pioneer, who was an eye-witness of the affair, gives a good description of the capture:

"MONTEREY, Oct. 19, 1842.—At 2 p. m. the United States man-of-war United States, Commodore Ap Catesby Jones, came to anchor close alongside and in-shore of all the ships in port. About 3 p. m. Capt. Armstrong came ashore, accompanied by an interpreter, and went direct to the governor's house, where he had a private conversation with him, which proved to be a demand for the surrender of the entire coast of California, upper and lower, to the United States government. When he was about to go on board he gave three or four copies of a proclamation to the inhabitants of the two Californias, assuring them of the protection of their lives, persons and property. In his notice to the governor (Alvarado) he gave him only until the following morning at 9 a. m. to decide. If he received no answer, then he would fire upon the town."

"I remained on shore that night and went down to the governor's with Mr. Larkin and Mr. Eagle. The governor had had some idea of running away and leaving Monterey to its fate, but was told by Mr. Spence that he should not go, and finally he resolved to await the result. At 12 at night some persons were sent on board the United States who had been appointed by the governor to meet the commodore and arrange the terms of the surrender. Next morning at half-past ten o'clock about one hundred sailors and fifty marines disembarked. The sailors marched up from the shore and took possession of the fort. The American colors were hoisted. The United States fired a salute of thirteen guns; it was returned by the fort, which fired twenty-six guns. The marines in the meantime had marched up to the government house. The officers and soldiers of the California government were discharged and their guns and other arms taken possession of and carried to the fort. The stars and stripes now wave over us. Long may they wave here in California!"

"Oct. 21, 4 p. m.—Flags were again changed, the vessels were released, and all was quiet again. The commodore had received later news by some Mexican newspapers."

Commodore Jones had been stationed at Calao with a squadron of four vessels. An English fleet was also there, and a French fleet was cruising in the Pacific. Both these were supposed to have designs on California. Jones learned that the English admiral had received orders to sail next day. Surmising that his destination might be California, he slipped out of the harbor the night before and crowded all sail to reach California before the English admiral. The loss of Texas, and the constant influx of immigrants and adventurers from the United States into California, had embittered the Mexican government more and more against foreigners. Manuel Micheltorena, who had served under Santa Anna in the Texas war, was appointed January 19, 1842, comandante-general inspector and gobernador propietario of the Californias.

Santa Anna was president of the Mexican republic. His experience with Americans in Texas during the Texan war of independence, in 1836-37, had determined him to use every effort to prevent California from sharing the fate of Texas.

Micheltorena, the newly-appointed governor, was instructed to take with him sufficient force to check the ingress of Americans. He recruited a force of three hundred and fifty men, principally convicts enlisted from the prisons of Mexico. His army of thieves and ragamuffins landed at San Diego in August, 1842.

Robinson, who was at San Diego when one of the vessels conveying Micheltorena's cholos (convicts) landed, thus describes them: "Five days afterward the brig Chato arrived with ninety soldiers and their families. I saw them land, and to me they presented a state of wretchedness and misery unequalled. Not one individual among them possessed a jacket or pantaloons, but, naked, and like the savage Indians, they concealed their nudity with dirty, miserable blankets. The females were not much better off, for the scantiness of their mean apparel was too apparent for modest observers. They appeared like convicts, and, indeed, the greater portion of them had been charged with crime, either of murder or theft."

Micheltorena drilled his Falstaffian army at San Diego for several weeks and then began his march northward; Los Angeles made great preparations to receive the new governor. Seven years had passed since she had been decreed the capital of the territory, and in all these years she had been denied her rights by Monterey. A favorable impression on the new governor might induce him to make the ciudad his capital. The national fiesta of September 16 was postponed until the arrival of the governor. The best house in the town was secured for him and his staff. A grand ball was projected and the city illuminated the night of his arrival. A camp was established down by the river and the cholos, who in the meantime had been given white linen uniforms, were put through the drill and the manual of arms. They were incorrigible thieves, and stole for the very pleasure of stealing. They robbed the hen roosts, the orchards, the vineyards and the vegetable gardens of the citizens. To the Angeleños the glory of their city as the capital of the territory faded in the presence of their empty chicken coops and plundered orchards. They longed to speed the departure of their now unwelcome guests. After a stay of a month in the city Micheltorena and his army took up their line of march northward. He reached a point about twenty miles north of San Fernando, when, on the night of the 24th of October, a messenger aroused him from his slumbers with the news that the capital had been captured by the Americans. Micheltorena seized the occasion to make political capital for himself with the home government. He spent the remainder of the night in fulminating proclamations against the invaders fiercer than the thunderbolts of Jove, copies of which were dispatched post haste to Mexico. He even wished himself a thunderbolt "that he might fly over intervening space and annihilate the invaders." Then, with his own courage and doubtless that of his brave cholos aroused to the highest pitch, instead of rushing on the invaders, he and his army fled back to San Fernando, where, afraid to advance or retreat, he halted until news reached him that Commodore Jones had restored Monterey to the Californians. Then his valor reached the boiling point. He boldly marched to Los Angeles, established his headquarters in the city and awaited the coming of Commodore Jones and his officers from Monterey.

On the 19th of January, 1843, Commodore Jones and his staff came to Los Angeles to meet the governor. At the famous conference in the Palacio de Don Abel, Micheltorena presented his articles of convention. Among other ridiculous demands were the following: "Article VI. Thomas Ap C. Jones will deliver fifteen hundred complete infantry uniforms to replace those of nearly one-half of the Mexican force, which have been ruined in the violent march and the continued rains while they were on their way to recover the port thus invaded." "Article VII. Jones to pay $15,000 into the national treasury for expenses incurred from the general alarm; also a complete set of musical instruments in place of those ruined on this occasion."* Judging from Robinson's description of the dress of Micheltorena's cholos it is doubtful whether there was an entire uniform among them.

"The commodore's first impulse," writes a member of his staff, "was to return the papers without comment and to refuse further communication with a man who could have the effrontery to trump up such charges as those for which indemnification was claimed." The commodore on reflection put aside his personal feelings, and met the governor at the grand ball in Sanchez hall, held in honor of the occasion. The ball was a brilliant affair, "the dancing ceased only with the rising of the sun next morning." The commodore returned the articles without his signature. The governor did not again refer to his demands. Next morning, January 21, 1843, Jones and his officers took their departure from the city "amidst the beating of drums, the firing of cannon and the ringing of bells, saluted by the general and his wife from the door of their quarters. On the 31st of December Micheltoarena had taken the oath of office in Sanchez' hall, which stood on the east side of the plaza. Salutes were fired, the bells were rung and the city was illuminated for three evenings. For the second time a governor had been inaugurated in Los Angeles.

Micheltoarena and his cholo army remained in Los Angeles about eight months. The Angelenos had all the capital they cared for. They were perfectly willing to have the governor and his army take up their residence in Monterey. The cholos had devoured the country like an army of chapules (locusts) and were willing to move on. Monterey would no doubt have gladly transferred what right she had to the capital if at the same time she could have transferred to her old rival, Los Angeles, Micheltoarena's cholos. Their pilfering was largely enforced by their necessities. They received little or no pay, and they often had to steal or starve. The leading native Californians still entertained their old dislike to "Mexican dictators" and the retinue of three hundred chicken thieves accompanying the last dictator intensified their hatred.

Micheltoarena, while not a model governor, had many good qualities and was generally liked by the better class of foreign residents. He made an earnest effort to establish a system of public education in the territory. Schools were established in all the principal towns, and territorial aid from the public funds to the amount of $500 each was given them. The school at Los Angeles had over one hundred pupils in attendance. His worst fault was a disposition to meddle in local affairs. He was unreliable and not careful to keep his agreements. He might have succeeded in giving California a stable government had it not been for the antipathy to his soldiers and the old feud between the "hijos del país" and the Mexican dictators.

These proved his undoing. The native sons under Alvarado and Castro rose in rebellion. In November, 1844, a revolution was inaugurated at Santa Clara. The governor marched with an army of one hundred and fifty men against the rebel forces, numbering about two hundred. They met at a place called the Laguna de Alvires. A treaty was signed in which Micheltoarena agreed to ship his cholos back to Mexico.

This treaty the governor deliberately broke. He then intrigued with Capt. John A. Sutter of New Helvetia and Isaac Graham to obtain assistance to crush the rebels. January 9, 1845, Micheltoarena and Sutter formed a junction of their forces at Salinas—their united commands numbering about five hundred men. They marched against the rebels to crush them. But the rebels did not wait to be crushed. Alvarado and Castro, with about ninety men, started for Los Angeles, and those left behind scattered to their homes. Alvarado and his men reached Los Angeles on the night of January 20, 1845. The garrison stationed at the curate's house was surprised and captured. One man was killed and several wounded. Lieutenant Medina, of Micheltoarena's army, was the commander of the pueblo troops. Alvarado's army encamped on the plaza and he and Castro set to work to revolutionize the old pueblo. The leading Angelenos had no great love for Juan Bautista, and did not readily fall into his schemes. They had not forgotten their enforced detention in Vallejo's bastille during the Civil war. An extraordinary session of the ayuntamiento was called January 21. Alvarado and Castro were present and made eloquent appeals. The records say: "The ayuntamiento listened, and after a short interval of silence and meditation decided to notify the senior member of the department assembly of Don Alvarado and Castros' wishes."

They were more successful with the Pico brothers. Pío Pico was senior vocal, and in case Micheltoarena was disposed he, by virtue of his office, would become governor. Through the influence of the Picos the revolution gained ground. The most potent influence in spreading the revolt was the fear of Micheltoarena's army of chicken thieves. Should the town be captured by them it certainly would be looted. The department assembly was called together. A peace commission was sent to meet Micheltoarena, who was leisurely marching southward, and intercede with him to give up his proposed invasion of the south. He refused. Then the assembly pronounced him a traitor, deposed him by vote and appointed Pio Pico governor. Recruiting went on rapidly. Hundreds of saddle horses were contributed, "old rusty guns were repaired, hacked swords sharpened, rude lances manufactured" and cartridges made for the cannon. Some fifty foreigners of the south joined Alvarado's army; not that they had much interest in the revolution, but to protect their property against the rapacious invaders—the cholos—and Sutter's Indians,* who were as much dreaded as the cholos. On the 19th of February, Micheltoarena reached the Encinos, and the Angelenian army marched out through Cahuenga Pass to meet him. On the 20th the two armies met on the southern edge of the San Fernando valley, about fifteen miles from Los Angeles. Each army numbered about four hundred men. Micheltoarena had three pieces of artillery and Castro two. They opened on each other at long range and seem to have fought the battle throughout at very long range. A mustang or a mule (authorities differ) was killed.

Wilson, Workman and McKinley of Castro's army decided to induce the Americans on the other side, many of whom were their personal friends, to abandon Micheltoarena. Passing up a ravine, they succeeded in attracting the attention of some of them by means of a white flag. Gantt, Hensley and Bidwell joined them in the ravine. The situation was discussed and the Americans of Micheltoarena's army agreed to desert him if Pico would protect them in their land grants. Wilson, in his account of the battle, says:† "I knew, and so did Pico, that these land questions were the point with those young Americans. Before I started on my journey or embassy, Pico was sent for; on his arrival among us I, in a few words, explained to him what the party had advanced. 'Gentlemen,' said he, 'are any of you citizens of Mexico?' They answered 'No.' 'Then your title deeds given you by Micheltoarena are not worth the paper they are written on, and he knew it well when he gave them to you; but if you will abandon his cause I will give you my word of honor as a gentleman, and Don Benito Wilson and Don Juan Workman to carry out what I promise, that I will protect each one of you in the land that you now hold, and when you become citizens of Mexico I will issue you the proper titles.' They said that was all they asked, and promised not to fire a gun against us. They also asked not to be required to fight on our side, which was agreed to.

"Micheltoarena discovered (how, I do not know) that his Americans had abandoned him. About an hour afterwards he raised his camp and flanked us by going further into the valley towards San Fernando, then marching as though he intended to come around the bend of the river to the city. The Californians and we foreigners at once broke up our camp and came back through the Cahuenga Pass, marched through the gap into the Feliz ranch, on the Los Angeles River, till we came into close proximity to Micheltoarena's camp. It was now night, as it was dark when we broke up our camp. Here we waited for daylight, and some of our men commenced manuevering for a fight with the enemy. A few cannon shots were fired, when a white flag was discovered flying from Micheltoarena's front. The whole matter then went into the hands of negotiators appointed by both parties and the terms of surrender were agreed upon, one of which was that Micheltoarena and his obnoxious officers and men were to march back up the river to the Cahuenga Pass, then down on the plain to the west of Los Angeles, the most direct line to San Pedro, and embark at that point on a vessel then anchored there to carry them back to Mexico." Sutter was taken prisoner, and his Indians, after being corralled for a time, were sent back to the Sacramento.

The roar of the battle of Cahuenga, or the Alamo, as it is sometimes called, could be distinctly heard in Los Angeles, and the people remaining in the city were greatly alarmed. William Heath Davis, in his Sixty Years in California, thus describes the alarm in the town: "Directly to the north of the town was a high hill" (now known as Mt. Lookout). "As soon as firing was heard all the people remaining in the town, men, women and children, ran to the top of this hill. As the wind was blowing from the north, the firing was distinctly heard, five leagues away, on the battle-field throughout the day. All business places in town were closed. The scene on the hill was a remarkable one, women and children, with crosses in their hands, kneeling and praying to the saints for the safety of their fathers, brothers, sons, husbands, lovers, cousins, that they might not be killed in the battle; indifferent to their personal appearance, tears streaming from their eyes, and their hair blown about by the wind, which had increased to quite a breeze. Don Abel Stearns, myself and others tried to calm and pacify them, assuring them that there was probably no danger; somewhat against our convictions, it is true, judging from what we heard of the firing and from our knowledge of Micheltorena's disciplined force, his battery, and the riflemen he had with him. During the day the scene on the hill continued. The night that followed was a gloomy one, caused by the lamentations of the women and children."

*Sutter had under his command a company of Indians. He had drilled these in the use of firearms. The employing of these savages by Micheltoarena was bitterly resented by the Californians.

Davis, who was supercargo on the Don Quixote, the vessel on which Micheltorena and his soldiers were shipped to Mexico, claims that the general "had ordered his command not to injure the Californians in the force opposed to him, but to fire over their heads, as he had no desire to kill them."

Another Mexican-born governor had been deposed and deported, gone to join his fellows, Victoria, Chico and Gutierrez. In accordance with the treaty of Cauhenga and by virtue of his rank as senior member of the departmental assembly, Pio Pico became governor. The hijos del pais were once more in the ascendancy. José Castro was made comandante-general. Alvarado was given charge of the custom house at Monterey, and José Antonio Carrillo was appointed commander of the military district of the south. Los Angeles was made the capital, although the archives and the treasury remained in Monterey. The revolution apparently had been a success. In the proceedings of the Los Angeles ayuntamiento, March 1, 1845, appears this record: "The agreements entered into at Cauhenga between Gen. Emanuel Micheltorena and Lieut.-Col. José Castro were then read, and as they contain a happy termination of affairs in favor of the government, this illustrious Body listened with satisfaction and so answered the communication."

The people joined with the ayuntamiento in expressing their "satisfaction" that a "happy termination" had been reached of the political disturbances which had distracted the country. But the end was not yet. Pico did his best to conciliate the conflicting elements, but the old sectional jealousies that had divided the people of the territory would crop out. José Antonio Carrillo, the Machiaveli of the south, hated Castro and Alvarado and was jealous of Pico's good fortune. He was the superior of any of them in ability, but made himself unpopular by his intrigues and his sarcastic speech. When Castro and Alvarado came south to raise the standard of revolt they tried to win him over. He did assist them. He was willing enough to plot against Micheltorena, but after the overthrow of the Mexican he was equally ready to plot against Pico and Castro. In the summer of 1845 he was implicated in a plot to depose Pico, who, by the way, was his brother-in-law. Pico placed him and two of his fellow conspirators, Serbulo and Hilario Varela, under arrest. Carrillo and Hilario Varela were shipped to Mazatlan to be tried for their misdeed. Serbulo Varela made his escape from prison. The two exiles returned early in 1846 unpunished and ready for new plots.

Pico was appointed gobernador propietario, or constitutional governor of California, September 3, 1845, by President Herrera. The supreme government of Mexico never seemed to take offense or harbor resentment against the Californians for deposing and sending home a governor. As the officials of the supreme government usually obtained office by revolution, they no doubt had a fellow feeling for the revolting Californians. When Micheltorena returned to Mexico he was coldly received and a commissioner was sent to Pico with dispatches virtually approving all that had been done.

Castro, too, gave Pico a great deal of uneasiness. He ignored the governor and managed the military affairs of the territory to suit himself. His headquarters were at Monterey and doubtless he had the sympathy if not the encouragement of the people of the north in his course. But the cause of the greatest uneasiness was the increasing immigration from the United States. A stream of emigrants from the western states, increasing each year, poured down the Sierra Nevadas and spread over the rich valleys of California. The Californians recognized that through the advent of these "foreign adventurers," as they called them, the "manifest destiny" of California was to be absorbed by the United States. Alvarado had appealed to Mexico for men and arms and had been answered by the arrival of Micheltorena and his cholos. Pico appealed and for a time the Californians were cheered by the prospect of aid.

In the summer of 1845 a force of six hundred veteran soldiers, under command of Colonel Iniestra, reached Acapulco, where ships were lying to take them to California, but a revolution broke out in Mexico and the troops destined for the defense of California were used to overthrow President Herrera and to seat Paredes. California was left to work out her own destiny unaided or drift with the tide—and she drifted.

In the early months of 1846 there was a rapid succession of important events in her history, each in passing bearing her near and nearer to a manifest destiny—the downfall of Mexican domination in California. These will be presented fully in the chapter on the Acquisition of California by the United States. But before taking up these we will turn aside to review life in California in the olden time under Spanish and Mexican rule.

CHAPTER XV.

MUNICIPAL GOVERNMENT—HOMES AND HOME-LIFE OF THE CALIFORNIANS.

UNDER Spain the government of California was semi-military and semi-clerical. The governors were military officers and had command of the troops in the territory, and looked after affairs at the pueblos; the friars were supreme at the missions. The municipal government of the pueblos was vested in ayuntamientos. The decree of the Spanish Cortés passed May 23, 1812, regulated the membership of the ayuntamiento according to the population of the town—"there shall be one alcalde (mayor), two regidores (councilmen), and one procurador-syndico (treasurer) in all towns which do not have more than two hundred inhabitants; one alcalde, four regidores and one syndico in those the population of which exceeds two hundred, but does not exceed five hundred." When the population of a town exceeded one thousand it was allowed two alcaldes, eight regidores and two syndicos. Over the members of the ayuntamiento in the early years of Spanish rule was a quasi-military officer called a comisionado, a sort of petty dictator or military despot, who, when occasion required or inclination moved him, embodied within himself all three departments of government, judiciary, legislative and executive. After Mexico became a republic the office of comisionado was abolished. The alcalde acted as president of the ayuntamiento, as mayor and as judge of the court of first instance. The second alcalde took his place when that officer was ill or absent. The syndico was a general utility man. He acted as city or town attorney, tax collector and treasurer. The secretary was an important officer; he kept the records, acted as clerk of the alcalde's court and was the only municipal officer who received pay, except the syndico, who received a commission on his collections.

In 1837 the Mexican Congress passed a decree abolishing ayuntamientos in capitals of departments having a population of less than four thousand and in interior towns of less than eight thousand. In 1839 Governor Alvarado reported to the Departmental Assembly that no town in California had the requisite population. The ayuntamientos all closed January 1, 1840. They were re-established in 1844. During their abolition the towns were governed by prefects and justices of the peace, and the special laws or ordinances were enacted by the departmental assembly.

The jurisdiction of the ayuntamiento often extended over a large area of country beyond the town limits. That of Los Angeles, after the secularization of the missions, extended over a country as large as the state of Massachusetts. The authority of the ayuntamiento was as extensive as its jurisdiction. It granted town lots and recommended to the governor grants of land from the public domain. In addition to passing ordinances its members sometimes acted as executive officers to enforce them. It exercised the powers of a board of health, a board of education, a police commission and a street department. During the civil war between Northern and Southern California, in 1837-38, the ayuntamiento of Los Angeles raised and equipped an army and assumed the right to govern the southern half of the territory.

The ayuntamiento was spoken of as Muy Ilustre (Most Illustrious), in the same sense that we speak of the honorable city council, but it was a much more dignified body than a city council. The members were required to attend their public functions "attired in black apparel, so as to add solemnity to the meetings." They served without pay, but if a member was absent from a meeting without a good excuse he was liable to a fine. As there was no pay in the office and its duties were numerous and onerous, there was not a large crop of aspirants for councilmen in those days, and the office usually sought the man. It might be added that when it caught the right man it was loath to let go of him.

The misfortunes that beset Francisco Pantoja aptly illustrate the difficulty of resigning in the days when office sought the man, not man the office. Pantoja was elected fourth regidor of the ayuntamiento of Los Angeles in 1837. In those days wild horses were very numerous. When the pasture in the foothills was exhausted they came down into the valleys and ate up the feed needed for the cattle. On this account, and because most of these wild horses were worthless, the rancheros slaughtered them. A corral was built with wings extending out on the right and left from the main entrance. When the corral was completed a day was set for a wild horse drive. The bands were rounded up and driven into the corral. The pick of the caballados were lassoed and taken out to be broken to the saddle and the refuse of the drive killed. The Vejars had obtained permission from the ayuntamiento to build a corral between the Ceritos and the Salinas for the purpose of corralling wild horses. Pantoja, being something of a sport, petitioned his fellow regidores for a twenty days' leave of absence to join in the wild horse chase. A wild horse chase was wild sport and dangerous, too. Somebody was sure to get hurt, and Pantoja in this one was one of the unfortunates. When his twenty days' leave of absence was up he did not return to his duties of regidor, but instead sent his resignation on plea of illness. His resignation was not accepted and the president of the ayuntamiento appointed a committee to investigate his physical condition. There were no physicians in Los Angeles in those days, so the committee took along Santiago McKinley, a canny Scotch merchant, who was reputed to have some knowledge of surgery. The committee and the improvised surgeon held an ante-mortem inquest on what remained of Pantoja. The committee reported to the council that he was a physical wreck; that he could not mount a horse nor ride one when mounted. A native Californian who had reached such a state of physical dilapidation that he could not mount a horse might well be excused from official duties. To excuse him might establish a dangerous precedent. The ayuntamiento heard the report, pondered over it and then sent it and the resignation to the governor. The governor took them under advisement. In the meantime a revolution broke out and before peace was restored and the governor had time to pass upon the case Pantoja's term had expired by limitation.

That modern fad of reform legislation, the referendum, was in full force and effect in California three-quarters of a century ago. When some question of great importance to the community was before the ayuntamiento and the regidores were divided in opinion, the alarma publica or public alarm was sounded by the beating of the long roll on the drum and all the citizens were summoned to the hall of sessions. Any one hearing the alarm and not heeding it was fined $3. When the citizens were convened the president of the ayuntamiento, speaking in a loud voice, stated the question and the people were given "public speech." The question was debated by all who wished to speak. When all had had their say it was decided by a show of hands.

The ayuntamientos regulated the social functions of the pueblos as well as the civic. Ordinance 5, ayuntamiento proceedings of Los Angeles, reads: "All individuals serenading promiscuously around the street of the city at night without first having obtained permission from the alcalde will be fined $1.50 for the first offense, $3 for the second offense, and for the third punished according to law." Ordinance 4, adopted by the ayuntamiento of Los Angeles, January 28, 1838, reads: "Every person not having any apparent occupation in this city or its jurisdiction is hereby ordered to look for work within three days, counting from the day this ordinance is published; if not complied with, he will be fined $2 for the first offense, $4 for the second offense, and will be given compulsory work for the third." From the reading of the ordinance it would seem if the tramp kept looking for work, but was careful not to find it, there could be no offense and consequently no fines or compulsory work.

Some of the enactments of the old regidores would fade the azure out of the blue laws of Connecticut in severity. In the plan of government adopted by the sureños in the rebellion of 1837 appears this article: "Article 3. The Roman Catholic Apostolic religion shall prevail throughout this jurisdiction; and any person professing publicly any other religion shall be prosecuted."

and respond in a loud voice, and if any persons should fail to do so without good cause they will be put in the stocks for three hours."

The architecture of the Spanish and Mexican eras of California was homely almost to ugliness. There was no external ornamentation to the dwellings and no internal conveniences. There was but little attempt at variety and the houses were mostly of one style, square walled, tile covered, or flat roofed with pitch, and usually but one story high. Some of the mission churches were massive, grand and ornamental, while others were devoid of beauty and travesties on the rules of architecture. Every man was his own architect and master builder. He had no choice of material, or, rather, with his ease-loving disposition, he chose to use that which was most convenient, and that was adobe clay, made into sun-dried brick. The Indian was the brickmaker, and he toiled for his taskmasters, like the Hebrew of old for the Egyptian, making bricks without straw and without pay. There were no labor strikes in the building trades then. The Indian was the builder, and he did not know how to strike for higher wages, because he received no wages, high or low. The adobe bricks were moulded into form and set up to dry. Through the long summer days they baked in the hot sun, first on one side, then on the other; and when dried through they were laid in the wall with mud mortar. Then the walls had to dry and dry perhaps through another summer before the house was habitable. Time was the essence of building contracts then.

There was but little wood used in house construction then. It was only the aristocrats who could indulge in the luxury of wooden floors. Most of the houses had floors of the beaten earth. Such floors were cheap and durable. Gilroy says, when he came to Monterey in 1814, only the governor's house had a wooden floor. A door of rawhide shut out intruders and wooden-barred windows admitted sunshine and air.

The legendry of the hearthstone and the fireside which fills so large a place in the home life and literature of the Anglo-Saxon had no part in the domestic system of the old-time Californian. He had no hearthstone and no fireside, nor could that pleasing fiction of Santa Claus coming down the chimney with toys on Christmas eve that so delights the children of to-day have been understood by the youthful Californian of long ago. There were no chimneys in California. The only means of warming the houses by artificial heat was a pan (or brasero) of coals set on the floor. The people lived out of doors in the open air and invigorating sunshine; and they were healthy and long-lived. Their houses were places to sleep in or shelters from rain.

The furniture was meager and mostly home-made. A few benches or rawhide-bottomed chairs to sit on; a rough table; a chest or two to keep the family finery in; a few cheap prints of saints on the walls—these formed the furnishings and the decorations of the living rooms of the common people. The bed was the pride and the ambition of the housewife. Even in humble dwellings, sometimes, a snowy counterpane and lace-trimmed pillows decorated a couch whose base was a dried bullock's hide stretched on a rough frame of wood. A shrine dedicated to the patron saint of the household was a very essential part of a well-regulated home.

Fashions in dress did not change with the seasons. A man could wear his grandfather's hat and his coat, too, and not be out of the fashion. Robinson, writing of California in 1829, says: "The people were still adhering to the costumes of the past century." It was not until after 1834, when the Hijar colonists brought the latest fashions from the City of Mexico, that the style of dress for men and women began to change. The next change took place after the American conquest. Only two changes in half a century, a garment had to be very durable to become unfashionable.

The few wealthy people in the territory dressed well, even extravagantly. Robinson describes the dress of Tomas Yorba, a wealthy ranchero of the Upper Santa Ana, as he saw him in 1829: "Upon his head he wore a black silk handkerchief, the four corners of which hung down his neck behind. An embroidered shirt; a cravat of white jaconet, tastefully tied; a blue damask vest; short clothes of crimson velvet; a bright green cloth jacket, with large silver buttons, and shoes of embroidered deer-skin composed his dress. I was afterwards informed by Don Manuel (Dominguez) that on some occasions, such as some particular feast day or festival, his entire display often exceeded in value a thousand dollars."

"The dress worn by the middle class of females is a chemise, with short embroidered sleeves, richly trimmed with lace; a muslin petticoat, flounced with scarlet and secured at the waist by a silk band of the same color; shoes of velvet or blue satin; a cotton reboso or scarf; pearl necklace and earrings; with hair falling in broad plaits down the back."^{*} After 1834 the men generally adopted calzoneras instead of the knee breeches or short clothes of the last century.

"The calzoneras were pantaloons with the exterior seam open throughout its length. On the upper edge was a strip of cloth, red, blue or black, in which were buttonholes. On the other edge were eyelet holes for buttons. In some cases the calzonera was sewn from hip to the middle of the thigh; in others, buttoned. From the middle of the thigh downward the leg was covered by the bota or leggins, used by every one, whatever his dress." The short jacket, with silver or bronze buttons, and the silken sash that served as a connecting link between the calzoneras and the jacket, and also supplied the place of what the Californians did not wear, suspenders, this constituted a picturesque costume, that continued in vogue until the conquest, and with many of the natives for years after. "After 1834 the fashionable women of California exchanged their narrow for more flowing garments and abandoned the braided hair for the coil and the large combs till then in use for smaller combs."[†]

For outer wraps the serapa for men and the rebosa for women were universally worn. The texture of these marked the social standing of the wearer. It ranged from cheap cotton and coarse serge to the costliest silk and the finest French broadcloth. The costume of the neophyte changed but once in centuries, and that was when he divested himself of his coat of mud and smear of paint and put on the mission shirt and breech clout. Shoes he did not wear and in time his feet became as hard as the hoofs of an animal. The dress of the mission women consisted of a chemise and a skirt; the dress of the children was a shirt and sometimes even this was dispensed.

Filial obedience and respect for parental authority were early impressed upon the minds of the children. The commandment, "Honor thy father and mother," was observed with an oriental devotion. A child was never too old or too large to be exempt from punishment. Stephen C. Foster used to relate an amusing story of a case of parental disciplining he once saw at Los Angeles. An old lady, a grandmother, was belaboring, with a barrel stave, her son, a man thirty years of age. The son had done something of which the mother did not approve. She sent for him to come over to the maternal home to receive his punishment. He came. She took him out to the metaphorical woodshed, which, in this case, was the portico of her house, where she stood him up and proceeded to administer corporal punishment. With the resounding thwacks of the stave, she would exclaim, "I'll teach you to behave yourself." "I'll mend your manners, sir." "Now you'll be good, won't you?" The big man took his punishment without a thought of resisting or rebelling. In fact, he seemed to enjoy it. It brought back feelingly and forcibly a memory of his boyhood days.

In the earlier years of the republic, before revolutionary ideas had perverted the usages of the Californians, great respect was shown to those in authority, and the authorities were strict in requiring deference from their constituents. In the Los Angeles archives of 1828 are the records of an impeachment trial of Don Antonio Maria Lugo, held to depose him from the office of judge of the plains. The principal duty of such a judge was to decide cases of disputed ownership of horses and cattle. Lugo seems to have had an exalted idea of the dignity of his office. Among the complaints presented at the trial was one from young Pedro Sanchez, in which he testified that Lugo had tried to ride his horse over him in the street because he, Sanchez, would not take off his hat to the juez del campo and remain standing uncovered while the judge rode past. Another complainant at the same trial related how at a rodeo Lugo adjudged a neighbor's boy guilty of contempt of court because the boy gave him an impertinent answer, and then he proceeded to give the boy an unmerciful whipping. So heinous was the offense in the estimation of the judge that the complainant said, "had not Lugo fallen over a chair he would have been beating the boy yet."

Under Mexican domination in California there was no tax levied on land and improvements. The municipal funds of the pueblos were obtained from revenue on wine and brandy; from the licenses of saloons and other business houses; from the tariff on imports; from permits to give balls or dances; from the fines of transgressors, and from the tax on bull rings and cock pits. Then men's pleasures and vices paid the cost of governing. In the early '40s the city of Los Angeles claimed a population of two thousand, yet the municipal revenues rarely exceeded $1,000 a year. With this small amount the authorities ran a city government and kept out of debt. It did not cost much to run a city government then. There was no army of high-salaried officials with a horde of political heelers quartered on the municipality and fed from the public crib at the expense of the taxpayer. Politicians may have been no more honest then than now, but where there was nothing to steal there was no stealing. The alcaldes and regidores put no temptation in the way of the politicians, and thus they kept them reasonably honest, or at least they kept them from plundering the taxpayers by the simple expedient of having no taxpayers.

The functions of the various departments of the municipal governments were economically administered. Street cleaning and lighting were performed at individual expense instead of public. There was an ordinance in force in Los Angeles and Santa Barbara and probably in other municipalities that required each owner of a house every Saturday to sweep and clean in front of his premises to the middle of the street. His neighbor on the opposite side met him half way, and the street was swept without expense to the pueblo. There was another ordinance that required each owner of a house of more than two rooms on a main street to hang a lighted lantern in front of his door from twilight to eight o'clock in winter and to nine in summer. There were fines for neglect of these duties.

There was no fire department in the pueblos. The adobe houses with their clay walls, earthen floors, tiled roofs and rawhide doors were as nearly fireproof as any human habitation could be made. The cooking was done in detached kitchens and in beehive-shaped ovens without flues. The houses were without chimneys, so the danger from fire was reduced to a minimum. A general conflagration was something unknown in the old pueblo days of California.

There was no paid police department. Every able-bodied young man was subject to military duty. A volunteer guard or patrol was kept on duty at the cuartels or guard houses. The guards policed the pueblos, but they were not paid. Each young man had to take his turn at guard duty.

CHAPTER XVI.

TERRITORIAL EXPANSION BY CONQUEST.

THE Mexican war marked the beginning by the United States of territorial expansion by conquest. "It was," says General Grant, "an instance of a republic following the bad example of European monarchies in not considering justice in their desire to acquire additional territory." The "additional territory" was needed for the creation of slave states. The southern politicians of the extreme pro-slavery school saw in the rapid settlement of the northwestern states the downfall of their domination and the doom of their beloved institution, slavery. Their peculiar institution could not expand northward and on the south it had reached the Mexican boundary. The only way of acquiring new territory for the extension of slavery on the south was to take it by force from the weak Republic of Mexico. The annexation of Texas brought with it a disputed boundary line. The claim to a strip of country between the Rio Nueces and the Rio Grande furnished a convenient pretext to force Mexico to hostilities. Texas as an independent state had never exercised jurisdiction over the disputed territory. As a state of the Union after annexation she could not rightfully lay claim to what she never possessed, but the army of occupation took possession of it as United States property, and the war was on. In the end we acquired a large slice of Mexican territory, but the irony of fate decreed that not an acre of its soil should be tilled by slave labor.

The causes that led to the acquisition of California antedated the annexation of Texas and the invasion of Mexico. After the adoption of liberal colonization laws by the Mexican government in 1824, there set in a steady drift of Americans to California. At first they came by sea, but after the opening of the overland route in 1841 they came in great numbers by land. It was a settled conviction in the minds of these adventurous nomads that the manifest destiny of California was to become a part of the United States, and they were only too willing to aid destiny when an opportunity offered. The opportunity came and it found them ready for it.

Capt. John C. Fremont, an engineer and explorer in the services of the United States, appeared at Monterey in January, 1846, and applied to General Castro, the military comandante, for permission to buy supplies for his party of sixty-two men who were encamped in the San Joaquin valley, in what is now Kern county. Permission was given him. There seems to have been a tacit agreement between Castro and Fremont that the exploring party should not enter the settlements, but early in March the whole force was encamped in the Salinas valley. Castro regarded the marching of a body of armed men through the country as an act of hostility, and ordered them out of the country. Instead of leaving, Fremont entrenched himself on an eminence known as Gabilan Peak (about thirty miles from Monterey), raised the stars and stripes over his barricade, and defied Castro. Castro maneuvered his troops on the plain below, but did not attack Fremont. After two days' waiting Fremont abandoned his position and began his march northward. On May 9, when near the Oregon line, he was overtaken by Lieutenant Gillespie, of the United States navy, with a dispatch from the president. Gillespie had left the United States in November, 1845, and, disguised, had crossed Mexico from Vera Cruz to Mazatlan, and from there had reached Monterey. The exact nature of the dispatches to Fremont is not known, but presumably they related to the impending war between Mexico and the United States, and the necessity for a prompt seizure of the country to prevent it from falling into the hands of England. Fremont returned to the Sacramento, where he encamped.

On the 14th of June, 1846, a body of American settlers from the Napa and Sacramento valleys, thirty-three in number, of which Ide, Semple, Grigsby and Merritt seem to have been the leaders, after a night's march, took possession of the old castillo or fort at Sonoma, with its rusty muskets and unused cannon, and made Gen. M. G. Vallejo, Lieut.-Col. Prudon, Capt. Salvador Vallejo and Jacob P. Leese, a brother-in-law of the Vallejos, prisoners. There seems to have been no privates at the castillo, all officers. Exactly what was the object of the American settlers in taking General Vallejo prisoner is not evident. General Vallejo was one of the few eminent Californians who favored the annexation of California to the United States. He is said to have made a speech favoring such a movement in the junta at Monterey a few months before. Castro regarded him with suspicion. The prisoners were sent under an armed escort to Fremont's camp. William B. Ide was elected captain of the revolutionists who remained at Sonoma, to "hold the fort." He issued a pronunciamiento in which he declared California a free and independent government, under the name of the California Republic. A nation must have a flag of its own, so one was improvised. It was made of a piece of cotton cloth, or manta, a yard wide and five feet long. Strips of red flannel torn from the shirt of one of the men were stitched on the bottom of the flag for stripes. With a blacking brush, or, as another authority says, the end of a chewed stick for a brush, and red paint, William L. Todd painted the figure of a grizzly bear passant on the field of the flag. The natives called Todd's bear "cochino," a pig; it resembled that animal more than a bear. A five-pointed star in the left upper corner, painted with the same coloring matter, and the words "California republic" printed on it in ink, completed the famous bear flag.

The California republic was ushered into existence June 14, 1846, attained the acme of its power July 4, when Ide and his fellow patriots burnt a quantity of powder in salutes, and fired off oratorical pyrotechnics in honor of the new republic. It utterly collapsed on the 9th of July, after an existence of twenty-five days, when news reached Sonoma that Commodore Sloat had raised the stars and stripes at Monterey and taken possession of California in the name of the United States. Lieutenant Revere arrived at Sonoma on the 9th and he it was who lowered the bear flag from the Mexican flagstaff, where it had floated through the brief existence of the California republic, and raised in its place the banner of the United States.

Commodore Sloat, who had anchored in Monterey Bay July 2, 1846, was for a time undecided whether to take possession of the country. He had no official information that war had been declared between the United States and Mexico; but, acting on the supposition that Captain Fremont had received definite instructions, on the 7th of July he raised the flag and took possession of the custom-house and government buildings at Monterey. Captain Montgomery, on the 9th, raised it at San Francisco, and on the same day the bear flag gave place to the stars and stripes at Sonoma.

General Castro was holding Santa Clara and San José when he received Commodore Sloat's proclamation informing him that the commodore had taken possession of Monterey. Castro, after reading the proclamation, which was written in Spanish, formed his men in line, and addressing them, said: "Monterey is taken by the Americans. What can I do with a handful of men against the United States? I am going to Mexico. All of you who wish to follow me, 'About face!' All that wish to remain can go to their homes."* A very small part of his force followed him.

Commodore Sloat was superseded by Commodore Stockton, who set about organizing an expedition to subjugate the part of the territory which still remained loyal to Mexico. Fremont's exploring party, recruited to a battalion of one hundred and twenty men, had marched to Monterey, and from there was sent by vessel to San Diego to procure horses and prepare to act as cavalry.

While these stirring events were transpiring in the north, what was the condition in the south where the capital, Los Angeles, and the bulk of the population of the territory were located? Pico had entered upon the duties of the governorship with a desire to bring peace and harmony to the distracted country. He appointed Juan Bandini, one of the ablest statesmen of the south, his secretary. After Bandini resigned he chose J. M. Covarrubias, and later José M. Moreno filled the office.

The principal offices of the territory had been divided equally between the politicians of the north and the south. While Los Angeles became the capital, and the departmental assembly met there, the military headquarters, the archives and the treasury remained at Monterey. But, notwithstanding this division of the spoils of office, the old feud between the arribeños and the abajefios would not down, and soon the old-time quarrel was on with all its bitterness. Castro, as military comandante, ignored the governor, and Alvarado was regarded by the sureños as an emissary of Castro's. The departmental assembly met at Los Angeles, in March, 1846. Pico presided, and in his opening message set forth the unfortunate condition of affairs in the department. Education was neglected; justice was not administered; the missions were so burdened by debt that but few of them could be rented; the army was disorganized and the treasury empty.

Not even the danger of war with the Americans could make the warring factions forget their fratricidal strife. Castro's proclamation against Fremont was construed by the sureños into a scheme to inveigle the governor to the north so that the comandante-general could depose him and seize the office for himself. Castro's preparations to resist by force the encroachments of the Americans were believed by Pico and the Angelenians to be fitting out of an army to attack Los Angeles and overthrow the government.

On the 16th of June, Pico left Los Angeles for Monterey with a military force of a hundred men. The object of the expedition was to oppose, and, if possible, to depose Castro. He left the capital under the care of the ayuntamiento. On the 20th of June Alcalde Galiardo reported to the ayuntamiento that he had positive information "that Don Castro had left Monterey and would arrive here in three days with a military force for the purpose of capturing this city." (Castro had left Monterey with a force of seventy men, but he had gone north to San José.) The sub-prefect, Don Abel Stearns, was authorized to enlist troops to preserve order. On the 23d of June three companies were organized, an artillery company under Miguel Pryor, a company of riflemen under Benito Wilson, and a cavalry company under Gorge Palomares. Pico called for reinforcements, but just as he was preparing to march against Monterey the news reached him of the capture of Sonoma by the Americans, and next day, June 24th, the news reached Los Angeles just as the council had decided on a plan of defense against Castro, who was five hundred miles away. Pico, on the impulse of the moment, issued a proclamation, in which he arraigned the United States for perfidy and treachery, and the gang of "North American adventurers," who captured Sonoma "with the blackest treason the spirit of evil can invent." His arraignment of the "North American nation" was so severe that some of his American friends in Los Angeles took umbrage to his pronunciamento. He afterwards tried to recall it, but it was too late; it had been published.

Castro, finding the "foreign adventurers" too numerous and too aggressive in the northern part of the territory, determined, with what men he could induce to go with him, to retreat to the south; but before so doing he sent a mediator to Pico to negotiate a treaty of peace and amity between the factions. On the 12th of July the two armies met at Santa Margarita, near San Luis Obispo. Castro brought the news that Commodore Sloat had hoisted the United States flag at Monterey and taken possession of the country for his government. The meeting of the governor and the comandante-general was not very cordial, but in the presence of the impending danger to the territory they concealed their mutual dislike and decided to do their best to defend the country they both loved.

Sorrowfully they began their retreat to the capital; but even threatened disaster to their common country could not wholly unite the north and the south. The respective armies, Castro's numbering about one hundred and fifty men, and Pico's one hundred and twenty, kept about a day's march apart. They reached Los Angeles, and preparations were begun to resist the invasion of the Americans. Pico issued a proclamation ordering all able-bodied men between fifteen and sixty years of age, native and naturalized, to take up arms to defend the country; any able-bodied Mexican refusing was to be treated as a traitor. There was no enthusiasm for the cause. The old factional jealousy and distrust was as potent as ever. The militia of the south would obey none but their own officers; Castro's troops, who considered themselves regulars, ridiculed the raw recruits of the sureños, while the naturalized foreigners of American extraction secretly sympathized with their own people.

Pico, to counteract the malign influence of his Santa Barbara proclamation and enlist the sympathy and more ready adhesion of the foreign element of Los Angeles, issued the following circular: (This circular or proclamation has never before found its way into print. I find no allusion to it in Bancroft's or Hittell's Histories. A copy, probably the only one in existence, was donated some years since to the Historical Society of Southern California.)

"CIRCULAR.—As owing to the unfortunate condition of things that now prevails in this department in consequence of the war into which the United States has provoked the Mexican nation, some ill feeling might spring up between the citizens of the two countries, out of which unfortunate occurrences might grow, and as this government desires to remove every cause of friction, it has seen fit, in the use of its power, to issue the present circular.

"The Government of the department of California declares in the most solemn manner that all the citizens of the United States that have come lawfully into its territory, relying upon the honest administration of the laws and the observance of the prevailing treaties, shall not be molested in the least, and their lives and property shall remain in perfect safety under the protection of the Mexican laws and authorities legally constituted.

"Therefore, in the name of the supreme government of the nation, and by virtue of the authority vested upon me, I enjoin upon all the inhabitants of California to observe towards the citizens of the United States that have lawfully come among us, the kindest and most cordial conduct, and to abstain from all acts of violence against their persons or property; provided they remain neutral, as heretofore, and take no part in the invasion effected by the armies of their nation.

"The authorities of the various municipalities and corporations will be held strictly responsible for the faithful fulfillment of this order, and shall, as soon as possible, take the necessary measures to bring it to the knowledge of the people. God and Liberty.

"PICO PICO.

"JOSE MATIAS MARENO, Secretary pro tem." Angeles, July 27. 1846.

When we consider the conditions existing in California at the time this circular was issued, its sentiments reflect great credit on Pico for his humanity and forbearance. A little over a month before, a party of Americans seized General Vallejo and several other prominent Californians in their homes and incarcerated them in prison at Sutter's Fort. Nor was this outrage mitigated when the stars and stripes were raised. The perpetrators of the outrage were not punished. These native Californians were kept in prison nearly two months without any charge against them. Besides, Governor Pico and the leading Californians very well knew that the Americans whose lives and property this proclamation was designed to protect would not remain neutral when their countrymen invaded the territory. Pico Pico deserved better treatment from the Americans than he received. He was robbed of his landed possessions by unscrupulous land sharks, and his character defamed by irresponsible historical scribblers.

Pico made strenuous efforts to raise men and means to resist the threatened invasion. He had mortgaged the government house to de Celis for $2,000, the mortgage to be paid "as soon as order shall be established in the department." This loan was really negotiated to fit out the expedition against Castro, but a part of it was expended after his return to Los Angeles in procuring supplies while preparing to meet the American army. The government had but little credit. The moneyed men of the pueblo were averse to putting money into what was almost sure to prove a lost cause. The bickerings and jealousies between the factions neutralized to a considerable degree the efforts of Pico and Castro to mobilize the army.

Castro established his camp on the mesa east of the river. Here he and Andres Pico undertook to drill the somewhat incongruous collection of hombres in military maneuvering. Their entire force at no time exceeded three hundred men. These were poorly armed and lacking in discipline.

29, he issued a proclamation. It was as bombastic as the pronunciamiento of a Mexican governor. Bancroft says: "The paper was made up of falsehood, of irrelevant issues and bombastic ranting in about equal parts, the tone being offensive and impolitic even in those inconsiderable portions which were true and legitimate." His only object in taking possession of the country was "to save from destruction the lives and property of the foreign residents and citizens of the territory who had invoked his protection." In view of Pico's humane circular and the uniform kind treatment that the Californians accorded the American residents, there was very little need of Stockton's interference on that score. Commodore Sloat did not approve of Stockton's proclamation or of his policy.

On the 6th of August, Stockton reached San Pedro and landed three hundred and sixty sailors and marines. These were drilled in military movements on land and prepared for the march to Los Angeles.

Castro sent two commissioners, Pablo de La Guerra and José M. Flores, to Stockton, asking for a conference and a cessation of hostilities while negotiations were pending. They asked that the United States forces remain at San Pedro while the terms of the treaty were under discussion. These requests Commodore Stockton peremptorily refused, and the commissioners returned to Los Angeles without stating the terms on which they proposed to treat.

In several so-called histories, I find a very dramatic account of this interview. On the arrival of the commissioners they were marched up to the mouth of an immense mortar, shrouded in skins save its huge aperture. Their terror and discomfiture were plainly discernible. Stockton received them with a stern and forbidding countenance, harshly demanding their mission, which they disclosed in great confusion. They bore a letter from Castro proposing a truce, each party to hold its own possessions until a general pacification should be had. This proposal Stockton rejected with contempt, and dismissed the commissioners with the assurance that only an immediate disbandment of his forces and an unconditional surrender would shield Castro from the vengeance of an incensed foe. The messengers remounted their horses in dismay and fled back to Castro." The mortar story, it is needless to say, is pure fabrication, yet it runs through a number of so-called histories of California. Castro, on the 9th of August, held a council of war with his officers at the Campo en La Mesa. He announced his intention of leaving the country for the purpose of reporting to the supreme government, and of returning at some future day to punish the usurpers. He wrote to Pico: "I can count only one hundred men, badly armed, worse supplied and discontented by reason of the miseries they suffer; so that I have reason to fear that not even these men will fight when the necessity arises." And this is the force that some imaginative historians estimate at eight hundred to one thousand men.

Pico and Castro left Los Angeles on the night of August 10, for Mexico; Castro going by the Colorado River route to Sonora, and Pico, after being concealed for a time by his brother-in-law, Juan Foster, at the Santa Margarita and narrowly escaping capture by Fremont's men, finally reached Lower California and later on crossed the Gulf to Sonora.

Stockton began his march on Los Angeles August 11. He took with him a battery of four guns. The guns were mounted on carretas, and each gun drawn by four oxen. He had with him a good brass band.

Major Fremont, who had been sent to San Diego with his battalion of one hundred and seventy men, had, after considerable skirmishing among the ranchos, secured enough horses to move, and on the 8th of August had begun his march to join Stockton. He took with him one hundred and twenty men, leaving about fifty to garrison San Diego.

Stockton consumed three days on the march. Fremont's troops joined him just south of the city, and at 4 p. m. of the 13th the combined force, numbering nearly five hundred men, entered the town without opposition, "our entry," says Major Fremont, "having more the effect of a parade of home guards than of an enemy taking possession of a conquered town." Stockton reported finding at Castro's abandoned camp ten pieces of artillery, four of them spiked. Fremont says he (Castro) "had buried part of his guns." Castro's troops that he had brought down with him took their departure for their northern homes soon after their general left, breaking up into small squads as they advanced. The southern troops that Pico had recruited dispersed to their homes before the arrival of the Americans. Squads of Fremont's battalion were sent out to scour the country and bring in any of the Californian officers or leading men whom they could find. These, when found, were paroled.

Another of those historical myths, like the mortar story previously mentioned, which is palmed off on credulous readers as genuine history, runs as follows: "Stockton, while en route from San Pedro to Los Angeles, was informed by a courier from Castro 'that if he marched upon the town he would find it the grave of himself and men.' 'Then,' answered the commodore, 'tell the general to have the bells ready to toll at eight o'clock, as I shall be there by that time.'" As Castro left Los Angeles the day before Stockton began his march from San Pedro, and when the commodore entered the city the Mexican general was probably two hundred miles away, the bell tolling myth goes to join its kindred myths in the category of history as it should not be written.

On the 17th of August, Stockton issued a second proclamation, in which he signs himself commander-in-chief and governor of the territory of California. It was milder in tone and more dignified than the first. He informed the people that their country now belonged to the United States. For the present it would be governed by martial law. They were invited to elect their local officers if those now in office refused to serve.

Four days after the capture of Los Angeles, The Warren, Captain Hull, commander, anchored at San Pedro. She brought official notice of the declaration of war between the United States and Mexico. Then for the first time Stockton learned that there had been an official declaration of war between the two countries. United States officers had waged war and had taken possession of California upon the strength of a rumor that hostilities existed between the countries.

The conquest, if conquest it can be called, was accomplished without the loss of a life, if we except the two Americans, Fowler and Cowie, of the Bear Flag party, who were brutally murdered by a band of Californians under Padillo, and the equally brutal shooting of Beryessa and the two de Haro boys by the Americans at San Rafael. These three men were shot as spies, but there was no proof that they were such, and they were not tried. These murders occurred before Commodore Sloat raised the stars and stripes at Monterey.

On the 15th of August, 1846, just thirty-seven days after the raising of the stars and stripes at Monterey, the first newspaper ever published in California made its appearance. It was published at Monterey by Semple and Colton and named The Californian. Rev. Walter Colton was a chaplain in the United States navy and came to California on the Congress with Commodore Stockton. He was made alcalde of Monterey and built, by the labor of the chain gang and from contributions and fines, the first schoolhouse in California, named for him Colton Hall. Colton thus describes the other member of the firm, Dr. Robert Semple: "My partner is an emigrant from Kentucky, who stands six feet eight in his stockings. He is in a buckskin dress, a foxskin cap; is true with his rifle, ready with his pen and quick at the type case." Semple came to California in 1845, with the Hastings party, and was one of the leaders in the Bear Flag revolution. The type and press used were brought to California by Augustin V. Zamorano in 1834, and by him sold to the territorial government, and had been used for printing bandos and pronunciamientos. The only paper the publishers of The Californian could procure was that used in the manufacture of cigarettes, which came in sheets a little larger than foolscap. The font of type was short of w's, so two v's were substituted for that letter, and when these ran out two u's were used. The paper was moved to San Francisco in 1848 and later on consolidated with the California Star.

CHAPTER XVII.

REVOLT OF THE CALIFORNIANS.

HOSTILITIES had ceased in all parts of the territory. The leaders of the Californians had escaped to Mexico, and Stockton, regarding the conquest as completed, set about organizing a government for the conquered territory. Fremont was to be appointed military governor. Detachments from his battalion were to be detailed to garrison different towns, while Stockton, with what recruits he could gather in California, and his sailors and marines, was to undertake a naval expedition against the west coast of Mexico, land his forces at Mazatlan or Acapulco and march overland to "shake hands with General Taylor at the gates of Mexico." Captain Gillespie was made military commandant of the southern department, with headquarters at Los Angeles, and assigned a garrison of fifty men. Commodore Stockton left Los Angeles for the north September 2. Fremont, with the remainder of his battalion, took up his line of march for Monterey a few days later. Gillespie's orders were to place the city under martial law, but not to enforce the more burdensome restrictions upon quiet and well-disposed citizens. A conciliatory policy in accordance with instructions of the secretary of the navy was to be adopted and the people were to be encouraged to "neutrality, self-government and friendship."

Nearly all historians who have written upon this subject lay the blame for the subsequent uprising of the Californians and their revolt against the rule of the military commandant, Gillespie, to his petty tyrannies. Col. J. J. Warner, in his Historical Sketch of Los Angeles County, says: "Gillespie attempted by a coercive system to effect a moral and social change in the habits, diversions and pastimes of the people and to reduce them to his standard of propriety." Warner was not an impartial judge. He had a grievance against Gillespie which embittered him against the captain. Gillespie may have been lacking in tact, and his schooling in the navy under the tyrannical régime of the quarterdeck of fifty years ago was not the best training to fit him for government, but it is hardly probable that in two weeks' time he undertook to enforce a "coercive system" looking toward an entire change in the moral and social habits of the people. Los Angeles under Mexican domination was a hotbed of revolutions. It had a turbulent and restless element among its inhabitants that was never happier than when fomenting strife and conspiring to overthrow those in power. Of this class Colton, writing in 1846, says: "They drift about like Arabs. If the tide of fortune turns against them they disband and scatter to the four winds. They never become martyrs to any cause. They are too numerous to be brought to punishment by any of their governors, and thus escape justice." There was a conservative class in the territory, made up principally of the large landed proprietors, both native and foreign-born, but these exerted small influence in controlling the turbulent. While Los Angeles had a monopoly of this turbulent and revolutionary element, other settlements in the territory furnished their full quota of that class of political knight errants whose chief pastime was revolution, and whose capital consisted of a gaily caparisoned steed, a riata, a lance, a dagger and possibly a pair of horse pistols. These were the fellows whose "habits, diversions and pastimes" Gillespie undertook to reduce "to his standard of propriety."

That Commodore Stockton should have left Gillespie so small a garrison to hold the city and surrounding country in subjection shows that either he was ignorant of the character of the people, or that he placed too great reliance in the completeness of their subjection. With Castro's men in the city or dispersed among the neighboring ranchos, many of them still retaining their arms, and all of them ready to rally at a moment's notice to the call of their leaders; with no reinforcements nearer than five hundred, miles to come to the aid of Gillespie in case of an uprising, it was foolhardiness in Stockton to entrust the holding of the most important place in California to a mere handful of men, half disciplined and poorly equipped, without fortifications for defense or supplies to hold out in case of a siege.

Scarcely had Stockton and Fremont, with their men, left the city before trouble began. The turbulent element of the city fomented strife and seized every occasion to annoy and harass the military commandant and his men. While his "petty tyrannies," so called, which were probably nothing more than the enforcement of martial law, may have been somewhat provocative, the real cause was more deep seated. The Californians, without provocation on their part and without really knowing the cause why, found their country invaded, their property taken from them and their government in the hands of an alien race, foreign to them in customs and religion. They would have been a tame and spiritless people indeed, had they neglected the opportunity that Stockton's blundering gave them to regain their liberties. They did not waste much time. Within two weeks from the time Stockton sailed from San Pedro hostilities had begun and the city was in a state of siege.

Gillespie, writing in the Sacramento Statesman in 1858, thus describes the first attack: "On the 22d of September, at three o'clock in the morning, a party of sixty-five Californians and Sonorens made an attack upon my small command quartered in the government house. We were not wholly surprised, and with twenty-one rifles we beat them back without loss to ourselves, killing and wounding three of their number. When daylight came, Lieutenant Hensley, with a few men, took several prisoners and drove the Californians from the town. This party was merely the nucleus of a revolution commenced and known to Colonel Fremont before he left Los Angeles. In twenty-four hours, six hundred well-mounted horsemen, armed with escopetas (shotguns), lances and one fine brass piece of light artillery, surrounded Los Angeles and summoned me to surrender. There were three old honey-combed iron guns (spiked in the corral of my quarters, which we at once cleared and mounted upon the axles of carts."

Serbulo Varela, a young man of some ability, but of a turbulent and reckless character, had been the leader at first, but as the uprising assumed the character of a revolution, Castro's old officers came to the front. Capt. José Maria Flores was chosen comandante-general; José Antonio Carrillo, major-general; and Andres Pico, comandante de escuadron. The main camp of the insurgents was located on the mesa, east of the river, at a place called Paredon Blanco (White Bluff).

On the 24th of September, from the camp at White Bluff, was issued the famous Pronunciamiento de Barelás y otros Californias contra Los Americanos (The Proclamation of Barelás and other Californians against the Americans). It was signed by Serbulo Varela (spelled Barelás), Leonardo Cota and over three hundred others. Although this proclamation is generally credited to Flores, there is no evidence to show that he had anything to do with framing it. He promulgated it over his signature October 1. It is probable that it was written by Varela and Cota. It has been the custom of American writers to sneer at this production as florid and bombastic. In fiery invective and fierce denunciation it is the equal of Patrick Henry's famous "Give me liberty or give me death!" Its recital of wrongs is brief, but to the point. "And shall we be capable of permitting ourselves to be subjugated and to accept in silence the heavy chains of slavery? Shall we lose the soil inherited from our fathers, which cost them so much blood? Shall we leave our families victims of the most barbarous servitude? Shall we wait to see our wives outraged, our innocent children beaten by American whips, our property sacked, our temples profaned, to drag out a life full of shame and disgrace? No! a thousand times no! Compatriots, death rather than that! Who of you does not feel his heart beat and his blood boil on contemplating our situation? Who will be the Mexican that will not be indignant and rise in arms to destroy our oppressors? We believe there will be not one so vile and cowardly!"

Gillespie had left the government house (located on what is now the site of the St. Charles Hotel) and taken a position on Fort Hill, where he had erected a temporary barricade of sacks filled with earth and had mounted his cannon there. The Americans had been summoned to surrender, but had refused. They were besieged by the Californians. There was but little firing between the combatants, an occasional sortie and a volley of rifle balls by the Americans when the Californians approached too near. The Californians were well mounted, but poorly armed, their weapons being principally muskets, shotguns, pistols, lances and riatas; while the Americans were armed with long-range rifles, of which the Californians had a wholesome dread. The fear of these arms and his cannon doubtless saved Gillespie and his men from capture.

On the 24th Gillespie dispatched a messenger to find Stockton at Monterey, or at San Francisco if he had left Monterey, and apprise him of the perilous situation of the Americans at Los Angeles. Gillespie's dispatch bearer, John Brown, better known by his California nickname, Juan Flaco or Lean John, made one of the most wonderful rides in history. Gillespie furnished Juan Flaco with a package of cigaretes, the paper of each bearing the inscription, "Believe the bearer;" these were stamped with Gillespie's seal. Brown started from Los Angeles at 8 p. m., September 24, and claimed to have reached Yerba Buena at 8 p. m. of the 28th, a ride of six hundred and thirty miles in four days. This is incorrect. Colton, who was alcalde of Monterey at that time, notes Brown's arrival at that place on the evening of the 29th. Colton, in his "Three Years in California," says that Brown rode the whole distance (Los Angeles to Monterey) of four hundred and sixty miles in fifty-two hours, during which time he had not slept. His intelligence was for Commodore Stockton and, in the nature of the case, was not committed to paper, except a few words rolled in a cigar fastened in his hair. But the commodore had sailed for San Francisco and it was necessary he should go one hundred and forty miles further. He was quite exhausted and was allowed to sleep three hours. Before day he was up and away on his journey. Gil-

Gillespie, in a letter published in the Los Angeles Star, May 28, 1858, describing Juan Flaco's ride says: "Before sunrise of the 29th he was lying in the bushes at San Francisco, in front of the congress frigate, waiting for the early market boat to come on shore, and he delivered my dispatches to Commodore Stockton before 7 o'clock."

In trying to steal through the picket line of the Mexicans at Los Angeles, he was discovered and pursued by a squad of them. A hot race ensued. Finding the enemy gaining on him he forced his horse to leap a wide ravine. A shot from one of his pursuers mortally wounded his horse, which, after running a short distance, fell dead. Flaco, carrying his spurs and riata, made his way on foot in the darkness to Las Virgenes, a distance of twenty-seven miles. Here he secured another mount and again set off on his perilous journey. The trail over which Flaco held his way was not like "the road from Winchester town, a good, broad highway leading down," but instead a Camino de heradura, bridle path, now winding up through rocky cañons, skirting along the edge of precipitous cliffs, then zigzagging down chaparral covered mountains; now over the sands of the sea beach and again across long stretches of brown mesa, winding through narrow valleys and out onto the rolling hills—a trail as nature made it, unchanged by the hand of man. Such was the highway over which Flaco's steeds "stretched away with utmost speed." Harassed and pursued by the enemy, facing death night and day, with scarcely a stop or a stay to eat or sleep, Juan Flaco rode six hundred miles.

"Of all the rides since the birth of time,
Told in story or sung in rhyme,
The fleetest ride that ever was sped," was Juan Flaco's ride from Los Angeles to San Francisco. Longfellow has immortalized the "Ride of Paul Revere," Robert Browning tells in stirring verse of the riders who brought the good news from Ghent to Aix, and Buchanan Read thrills us with the heroic measures of Sheridan's Ride. No poet has sung of Juan Flaco's wonderful ride, fleetest, longer and more perilous than any of these. Flaco rode six hundred miles through the enemy's country, to bring aid to a besieged garrison, while Revere and Jorris and Sheridan were in the country of friends or protected by an army from enemies.

Gillespie's situation was growing more and more desperate each day. B. D. Wilson, who with a company of riflemen had been on an expedition against the Indians, had been ordered by Gillespie to join him. They reached the Chino ranch, where a fight took place between them and the Californians. Wilson's men being out of ammunition were compelled to surrender. In the charge upon the adobe, where Wilson and his men had taken refuge, Carlos Ballestaros had been killed and several Californians wounded. This and Gillespie's stubborn resistance had embittered the Californians against him and his men. The Chino prisoners had been saved from massacre after their surrender by the firmness and bravery of Varela. If Gillespie continued to hold the town his obstinacy might bring down the vengeance of the Californians not only upon him and his men, but upon many of the American residents of the south, who had favored their countrymen.

Finally Flores issued his ultimatum to the Americans, surrender within twenty-four hours or take the consequences of an onslaught by the Californians, which might result in the massacre of the entire garrison. In the meantime he kept his cavalry deployed on the hills, completely investing the Americans. Despairing of assistance from Stockton, on the advice of Wilson, who had been permitted by Flores to intercede with Gillespie, articles of capitulation were drawn up and signed by Gillespie and the leaders of the Californians. On the 30th of September the Americans marched out of the city with all the honors of war, drums beating, colors flying and two pieces of artillery mounted on carts drawn by oxen. They arrived at San Pedro without molestation and four or five days later embarked on the merchant ship Vandalia, which remained at anchor in the bay. Gillespie in his march was accompanied by a few of the American residents and probably a dozen of the Chino prisoners, who had been exchanged for the same number of Californians, whom he had held under arrest most likely as hostages.

Gillespie⁹ took two cannon with him when he evacuated the city, leaving two spiked and broken on Fort Hill. There seems to have been a proviso in the articles of capitulation requiring him to deliver the guns to Flores on reaching the embarcadero. If there was such a stipulation Gillespie violated it. He spiked the guns, broke off the trunnions and rolled one of them into the bay.

CHAPTER XVIII.

THE DEFEAT AND RETREAT OF MERVINE'S MEN.

THE revolt of the Californians at Los Angeles was followed by similar uprisings in the different centers of population where American garrisons were stationed. Upon the receipt of Gillespie's message Commodore Stockton ordered Captain Mervine to proceed at once to San Pedro to regain, if possible, the lost territory. Juan Flaco had delivered his message to Stockton on September 30. Early on the morning of October 1st, Captain Mervine got under way for San Pedro. "He went ashore at Sausalito," says Gillespie, "on some trivial excuse, and a dense fog coming on he was compelled to remain there until the 4th."

Of the notable events occurring during the conquest of California there are few others of which there are so contradictory accounts as that known as the battle of Dominguez Ranch, where Mervine was defeated and compelled to retreat to San Pedro. Historians differ widely in the number engaged and in the number killed. The following account of Mervine's expedition I take from a log book kept by Midshipman and Acting-Lieut. Robert C. Duvall of the Savannah. He commanded a company during the battle. This book was donated to the Historical Society of Southern California by Dr. J. E. Cowles of Los Angeles, a nephew of Lieutenant Duvall. The account given by Lieutenant Duvall is one of the fullest and most accurate in existence.

"At 9.30 a. m." (October 1, 1846), says Lieutenant Duvall, "we commenced working out of the harbor of San Francisco on the ebb tide. The ship anchored at Sausalito, where, on account of a dense fog, it remained until the 4th, when it put to sea. On the 7th the ship entered the harbor of San Pedro. At 6:30 p. m., as we were standing in for anchorage, we made out the American merchant ship Vandalia, having on her decks a body of men. On passing she saluted with two guns, which was repeated with three cheers, which we returned. * * * * Brevet Capt. Archibald Gillespie came on board and reported that he had evacuated the Pueblo de Los Angeles on account of the overpowering force of the enemy and had retired with his men on board the Vandalia after having spiked his guns, one of which he threw into the water. He also reported that the whole of California below the pueblo had risen in arms against our authorities, headed by Flores, a Mexican captain on furlough in this country, who had but a few days ago given his parole of honor not to take up arms against the United States. We made preparations to land a force to march to the pueblo at daylight.

"October 8, at 6 a. m., all the boats left the ship for the purpose of landing the forces, numbering in all two hundred and ninety-nine men, including the volunteers under command of Captain Gillespie. At 6:30 all were landed without opposition, the enemy in small detachments retreating toward the pueblo. From their movements we apprehended that their whole force was near. Captain Mervine sent on board ship for a reinforcement of eighty men, under command of Lieut. R. B. Hitchcock. At 8 a. m. the several companies, all under command of Capt William Mervine, took up the line of march for the purpose of retaking the pueblo. The enemy retreated as our forces advanced. (On landing, William A. Smith, first cabin boy, was killed by the accidental discharge of a Colt's pistol.) The reinforcements under the command of Lieut. R. B. Hitchcock returned on board ship. For the first four miles our march was through hills and ravines, which the enemy might have taken advantage of, but preferred to occupy as spectators only, until our approach. A few shots from our flankers (who were the volunteer riflemen) would start them off; they returned the compliment before going. The remainder of our march was performed over a continuous plain overgrown with wild mustard, rising in places to six or eight feet in height. The ground was excessively dry, the clouds of dust were suffocating and there was not a breath of wind in motion. There was no water on our line of march for ten or twelve miles and we suffered greatly from thirst.

"At 2:30 p. m. we reached our camping ground. The enemy appeared in considerable numbers. Their numbers continued to increase until sundown, when they formed on a hill near us, gradually inclining towards our camp. They were admirably formed for a cavalry charge. We drew up our forces to meet them, but finding they were disposed to remain stationary, the marines, under command of Captain Marston, the Colt's riflemen, under command of Lieut. I. B. Carter and myself, and the volunteers, under command of Capt. A. Gillespie, were ordered to charge on them, which we did. They stood their ground until our shots commenced 'telling' on them, when they took to flight in every direction. They continued to annoy us by firing into our camp through the night. About 2 a. m. they brought a piece of artillery and fired into our camp, the shot striking the ground near us. The marines, riflemen and volunteers were sent in pursuit of the gun, but could see or hear nothing of it.

"We left our camp the next morning at 6 o'clock. Our plan of march was in column by platoon. We had not proceeded far before the enemy appeared before us drawn up on each side of the road, mounted on fine horses, each man armed with a lance and carbine. They also had a field piece (a four-pounder), to which were hitched eight or ten horses, placed on the road ahead of us.

"Captain Mervine, thinking it was the enemy's intention to throw us into confusion by using their gun on us loaded with round shot and copper grape shot and then charge us with their cavalry, ordered us to form a square—which was the order of march throughout the battle. When within about four hundred yards of them the enemy opened on us with their artillery. We made frequent charges, driving them before us, and at one time causing them to leave some of their cannon balls and cartridges; but owing to the rapidity with which they could carry off the gun, using their lassos on every part, enabled them to choose their own distance, entirely out of all range of our muskets. Their horsemen kept out of danger, apparently content to let the gun do the fighting. They kept up a constant fire with their carbines, but these did no harm. The enemy numbered between one hundred and seventy-five and two hundred strong.

"Finding it impossible to capture the gun, the retreat was sounded. The captain consulted with his officers on the best steps to be taken. It was decided unanimously to return on board ship. To continue the march would sacrifice a number of lives to no purpose, for, admitting we could have reached the pueblo, all communications would be cut off with the ship, and we would further be constantly annoyed by their artillery without the least chance of capturing it. It was reported that the enemy were between five and six hundred strong at the city and it was thought he had more artillery. On retreating they got the gun planted on a hill ahead of us.

"The captain made us an address, saying to the troops that it was his intention to march straight ahead in the same orderly manner in which we had advanced, and that sooner than he would surrender to such an enemy, he would sacrifice himself and every other man in his command. The enemy fired into us four times on the retreat, the fourth shot falling short, the report of the gun indicating a small quantity of powder, after which they remained stationary and manifested no further disposition to molest us. We proceeded quietly on our march to the landing, where we found a body of men under command of Lieutenant Hitchcock with two nine-pounder cannon gotten from the Vandalia to render us assistance in case we should need it.

"We presented truly a pitiable condition, many being barely able to drag one foot after the other from excessive fatigue, having gone through the exertions and excitement in battle and afterwards performing a march of eighteen or twenty miles without rest. This is the first battle I have ever been engaged in, and, having taken particular notice of those around me, I can assert that no men could have acted more bravely. Even when their shipmates were falling by their sides, I saw but one impulse and that was to push forward, and when retreat was ordered I noticed a general reluctance to turn their backs to the enemy.

"The following is a list of the killed and wounded: Michael Hoey, ordinary seaman, killed; David Johnson, ordinary seaman, killed; William H. Berry, ordinary seaman, mortally wounded; Charles Sommers, musician, mortally wounded; John Tyre, seaman, severely wounded; John Anderson, seaman, severely wounded; recovery doubtful. The following-named were slightly wounded: William Conland, marine; Hiram Rockvill, marine; H. Linland, marine; James Smith, marine.

"On the following morning we buried the bodies of William A. Smith, Charles Sommers, David Johnson and Michael Hoey on an island in the harbor.

"At 11 a. m. the captain called a council of commissioned officers regarding the proper course to adopt in the present crisis, which decided that no force should be landed, and that the ship remain here until further orders from the commodore, who is daily expected."

Entry in the log for Sunday, 11th: "William H. Berry, ordinary seaman, departed this life from the effect of wounds received in battle. Sent his body for interment to Dead Man's Island, so named by us. Mustered the command at quarters, after which performed divine service."

From this account it will be seen that the number killed and died of wounds received in battle was four; number wounded six, and one accidentally killed before the battle. On October 22d, Henry Lewis died and was buried on the island. Lewis' name does not appear in the list of wounded. It is presumable that he died of disease. Six of the crew of the Savannah were buried on Dead Man's Island, four of whom were killed in battle. Lieutenant Duvall gives the following list of the officers in the "Expedition on the march to retake Pueblo de Los Angeles:" Capt. William Mervine, commanding; Capt. Ward Marston, commanding marines; Brevet Capt. A. H. Gillespie, commanding volunteers; Lieut. Henry W. Queen, adjutant; Lieut. B. F. Pinckney, commanding first company; Lieut. W. Rinckindoff, commanding second company; Lieut. I. B. Carter, Colt's riflemen; Midshipman R. D. Minor, acting lieutenant second company; Midshipman S. P. Griffin, acting lieutenant first company; Midshipman P. G. Walmough, acting lieutenant second company; Midshipman R. C. Duvall, acting lieutenant Colt's riflemen; Captain Clark and Captain Goodsall, commanding pikemen; Lieutenant Hensley, first lieutenant volunteers; Lieutenant Russeau, second lieutenant volunteers.

The piece of artillery that did such deadly execution on the Americans was the famous Old Woman's gun. It was a bronze four-pounder, or pedréro (swivel-gun) that for a number of years had stood on the plaza in front of the church, and was used for firing salutes on feast days and other occasions. When on the approach of Stockton's and Fremont's forces Castro abandoned his artillery and fled, an old lady, Dona Clara Cota de Reyes, declared that the gringos should not have the church's gun; so, with the assistance of her daughters, she buried it in a cane patch near her residence, which stood on the east side of Alameda street, near First. When the Californians revolted against Gillespie's rule the gun was unearched and used against him. The Historical Society of Southern California has in its possession a brass grapeshot, one of a charge that was fired into the face of Fort Hill at Gillespie's men when they were posted on the hill. This gun was in the exhibit of trophies at the New Orleans Exposition in 1885. The label on it read: "Trophy 53. No. 63, Class 7. Used by Mexico against the United States at the battle of Dominguez' Ranch, October 9, 1846; at San Gabriel and the Mesa, January 8 and 9, 1847; used by the United States forces against Mexico at Mazatlan, November 11, 1847; Urios (crew all killed or wounded), Palos Prietos, December 13, 1847, and Lower California, at San José, February 15, 1848."

Before the battle the old gun had been mounted on forward axle of a Jersey wagon, which a man by the name of Hunt had brought across the plains the year before. It was lashed to the axle by means of rawhide thongs, and was drawn by riatas, as described by Lieutenant Duvall. The range was obtained by raising or lowering the pole of the wagon. Ignacio Aguilar acted as gunner, and having neither lanyard or pent-stock to fire it, he touched off the gun with the lighted end of a cigarette. Never before or since, perhaps, was a battle won with such crude artillery. José Antonio Carrillo was in command of the Californians. During the skirmishing of the first day he had between eighty and ninety men. During the night of the 8th Flores joined him with a force of sixty men. Next morning Flores returned to Los Angeles, taking with him twenty men. Carrillo's force in the battle numbered about one hundred and twenty men. Had Mervine known that the Californians had fired their last shot (their powder being exhausted) he could have pushed on and captured the pueblo.

The expulsion of Gillespie's garrison from Los Angeles and the defeat of Mervine's force raised the spirits of the Californians, and there was great rejoicing at the pueblo. Detachments of Flores' army were kept at Sepulveda's rancho, the Palos Verdes, and at Temple's rancho of the Cerritos, to watch the Savannah and report any attempt at landing. The leaders of the revolt were not so sanguine of success as the rank and file. They were without means to procure arms and supplies. There was a scarcity of ammunition, too. An inferior article of gunpowder was manufactured in limited quantities at San Gabriel. The only uniformity in weapons was in lances. These were rough, home-made affairs, the blade beaten out of a rasp or file, and the shaft a willow pole about eight feet long. These weapons were formidable in a charge against infantry, but easily parried by a swordsman in a cavalry charge.

After the defeat of Mervine, Flores set about reorganizing the territorial government. He called together the departmental assembly. It met at the capital (Los Angeles) October 26th. The members present, Figueroa, Botello, Guerra and Olvera, were all from the south. The assembly decided to fill the place of governor, vacated by Pico, and that of comandante-general, left vacant by the flight of Castro.

José Maria Flores, who was now recognized as the leader of the revolt against American rule, was chosen to fill both offices, and the two offices, as had formerly been the custom, were united in one person. He chose Narciso Botello for his secretary. Flores, who was Mexican born, was an intelligent and patriotic officer. He used every means in his power to prepare his forces for the coming conflict with the Americans, but with little success. The old jealousy of the hijos del pais against the Mexican would crop out, and it neutralized his efforts. There were bickerings and complaints in the ranks and among the officers. The natives claimed that a Californian ought to be chief in command.

The feeling of jealousy against Flores at length culminated in open revolt. Flores had decided to send the prisoners taken at the Chino fight to Mexico. His object was twofold—first, to enhance his own glory with the Mexican government, and, secondly, by showing what the Californians had already accomplished to obtain aid in the coming conflict. As most of these men were married to California wives, and by marriage related to many of the leading California families of the south, there was at once a family uproar and fierce denunciations of Flores. But as the Chino prisoners were foreigners, and had been taken while fighting against the Mexican government, it was necessary to disguise the hostility to Flores under some other pretext. He was charged with the design of running away to Sonora with the public funds. On the night of December 3, Francisco Rico, at the head of a party of Californians, took possession of the cuartel, or guard house, and arrested Flores. A special session of the assembly was called to investigate the charges.

Flores expressed his willingness to give up his purpose of sending the Clino prisoners to Mexico, and the assembly found no foundation to the charge of his design of running away with the public funds, nor did they find any funds to run away with. Flores was liberated, and Rico imprisoned in turn.

Flores was really the last Mexican governor of California. Like Pico, he was elected by the territorial legislature, but he was not confirmed by the Mexican congress. Generals Scott and Taylor were keeping President Santa Anna and his congress on the move so rapidly they had no time to spare for California affairs.

Flores was governor from October 26, 1846, to January 8, 1847.

With a threatened invasion by the Americans and a divided people within, it was hard times in the old pueblo. The town had to supply the army with provisions. The few who possessed money hid it away and all business was suspended except preparations to meet the invaders.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE FINAL CONQUEST OF CALIFORNIA.

COMMODORE STOCKTON, convinced that the revolt of the Californians was a serious affair, ordered Fremont's battalion, which had been recruited to one hundred and sixty men, to proceed to the south to co-operate with him in quelling the rebellion. The battalion sailed on the Sterling, but shortly after putting to sea, meeting the Vandalia, Fremont learned of Mervine's defeat and also that no horses could be procured in the lower country; the vessel was put about and the battalion landed at Monterey, October 28. It was decided to recruit the battalion to a regiment and mounting it to march down the coast. Recruiting was actively begun among the newly arrived immigrants. Horses and saddles were procured by giving receipts on the government, payable after the close of the war or by confiscation if it brought returns quicker than receipts.

The report of the revolt in the south quickly spread among the Californians in the north and they made haste to resist their spoilers. Manuel Castro was made comandante of the military forces of the north, headquarters at San Luis Obispo. Castro collected a force of about one hundred men, well mounted but poorly armed. His purpose was to carry on a sort of guerrilla warfare, capturing men and horses from the enemy whenever an opportunity offered.

Fremont, now raised to the rank of lieutenant-colonel in the regular army with headquarters at Monterey, was rapidly mobilizing his motley collection of recruits into a formidable force. Officers and men were scouring the country for recruits, horses, accouterments and supplies. Two of these recruiting squads encountered the enemy in considerable force and an engagement known as the battle of Natividad ensued. Capt. Charles Burroughs with thirty-four men and two hundred horses, recruited at Sacramento, arrived at San Juan Bautista, November 15, on his way to Monterey on the same day Captain Thompson, with about the same number of men recruited at San José, reached San Juan. The Californians, with the design of capturing the horses, made a night march from their camp on the Salinas. At Gomez rancho they took prisoner Thomas O. Larkin, the American consul, who was on his way from Monterey to San Francisco on official business. On the morning of the 16th the Americans began their march for Monterey. At Gomez rancho their advance learned of the presence of the enemy and of the capture of Larkin. A squad of six or eight scouts was sent out to find the Californians. The scouts encountered a detachment of Castro's force at Encinalitos (Little Oaks) and a fight ensued. The main body of the enemy came up and surrounded the grove of oaks. The scouts, though greatly outnumbered, were well armed with long range rifles and held the enemy at bay, until Captains Burroughs and Thompson brought up their companies. Burroughs, who seems to have been the ranking officer, hesitated to charge the Californians, who had the superior force, and besides he was fearful of losing his horses and thus delaying Fremont's movements. But, taunted with cowardice and urged on by Thompson, a fire eater, who was making loud protestations of his bravery, Burroughs ordered a charge. The Americans, badly mounted, were soon strung out in an irregular line. The Californians, who had made a feint of retreating, turned and attacked with vigor, Captain Burroughs and four or five others were killed. The straggling line fell back on the main body and the Californians, having expended their ammunition, retreated. The loss in killed and wounded amounted to twelve or fifteen on each side.

The only other engagement in the north was the bloodless battle of Santa Clara. Fremont's methods of procuring horses, cattle and other supplies was to take them and give in payment demands on the government, payable after the close of the war. After his departure the same method was continued by the officers of the garrisons at San Francisco, San José and Monterey. Indeed, it was their only method of procuring supplies. The quartermasters were without money and the government without credit. On the 8th of December Lieutenant Bartlett, also alcalde of Yerba Buena, with a squad of five men started down the peninsula toward San José to purchase supplies. Francisco Sanchez, a rancher, whose horse and cattle corrals had been raided by former purchasers, with a band of Californians waylaid and captured Bartlett and his men. Other California rancheros who had lost their stock in similar raids rallied to the support of Sanchez and soon he found himself at the head of one hundred men. The object of their organization was rather to protect their property than to fight. The news soon spread that the Californians had revolted and were preparing to massacre the Americans. Captain Weber of San José had a company of thirty-three men organized for defense. There was also a company of twenty men under command of Captain Aram stationed at the ex-mission of Santa Clara. On the 29th of December, Capt. Ward Marston with a detachment of thirty-four men and a field piece in charge of Master de Long and ten sailors was sent to Santa Clara. The entire force collected at the seat of war numbered one hundred and one men. On January 2 the American force encountered the Californians, one hundred strong, on the plains of Santa Clara. Firing at long range began and continued for an hour or more. Sanchez sent in a flag of truce asking an armistice preparatory to the settlement of difficulties. January 3, Captain Maddox arrived from Monterey with fifty-nine mounted men, and on the 7th Lieutenant Grayson came with fifteen men. On the 8th a treaty of peace was concluded, by which the enemy surrendered Lieutenant Bartlett and all the other prisoners, as well as their arms, including a small field piece and were permitted to go to their homes. Upon "reliable authority" four Californians were reported killed, but their graves have never been discovered nor did their living relatives, so far as known, mourn their loss.

Stockton with his flagship, the Congress, arrived at San Pedro on the 23d of October, 1846. The Savannah was still lying at anchor in the harbor. The commodore had now at San Pedro a force of about eight hundred men; but, notwithstanding the contemptuous opinion he held of the Californian soldiers, he did not march against the pueblo. Stockton in his report says: "Elated by this transient success (Mervine's defeat), which the enemy with his usual want of veracity magnified into a great victory, they collected in large bodies on all the adjacent hills and would not permit a hoof except their own horses to be within fifty miles of San Pedro." But "in the face of their boasting insolence" Stockton landed and again hoisted "the glorious stars and stripes in the presence of their horse covered hills." "The enemy had driven off every animal, man and beast from that section of the country; and it was not possible by any means in our power to carry provisions for our march to the city." The city was only thirty miles away and American soldiers have been known to carry rations in their haversacks for a march of one hundred miles. The "transient success" of the insolent enemy had evidently made an impression on Stockton. He estimated the California force in the vicinity of the landing at eight hundred men, which was just seven hundred too high. He determined to approach Los Angeles by way of San Diego, and on the last day of October he sailed for that port. B. D. Wilson, Stephen C. Foster and others attribute Stockton's abandonment of an attack on Los Angeles from San Pedro to a trick played on him by José Antonio Carrillo. Carrillo was in command of the detachment stationed at the Cerritos and the Palos Verdes. Carrillo was anxious to obtain an interview with Stockton and if possible secure a cessation of hostilities until the war then progressing in Mexico should be decided, thus settling the fate of California. B. D. Wilson, one of the Chino prisoners, was sent with a Mexican sergeant to raise a white flag as the boats of the Congress approached the landing and present Carrillo's proposition for a truce. Carrillo, with the intention of giving Stockton an exaggerated idea of the number of his troops and thus obtaining more favorable terms in the proposed treaty, collected droves of wild horses from the plains; these his caballeros kept in motion, passing and repassing through a gap in the hills, which was in plain view from Stockton's vessel. Owing to the dust raised by the cavalcade it was impossible to discover that most of the horses were riderless. The troops were signalled to return to the vessel, and the commodore shortly afterwards sailed to San Diego. Carrillo always regretted that he made too much demonstration.

As an illustration of the literary trash that has been palmed off for California history, I give an extract from Frost's Pictorial History of California, a book written the year after the close of the Mexican war by Prof. John Frost, a noted compiler of histories, who writes LL. D. after his name. It relates to Stockton's exploits at San Pedro. "At the Rancho Sepulveda (the Palos Verdes) a large force of Californians were posted, Commodore Stockton sent one hundred men forward to receive the fire of the enemy and then fall back on the main body without returning it. The main body of Stockton's army was formed in a triangle with the guns hid by the men. By the retreat of the advance party the enemy were decoyed close to the main force, when the wings (of the triangle) were extended and a deadly fire from the artillery opened upon the astonished Californians. More than one hundred were killed, the same number wounded and one hundred prisoners taken." The mathematical accuracy of Stockton's artillerists was truly astonishing. They killed a man for every one wounded and took a prisoner for every man they killed. As Flores' army never amounted to more than three hundred, if we are to believe Frost, Stockton had all the enemy "present or accounted for." This silly fabrication of Frost's runs through a number of so-called histories of California. Stockton was a brave man and a very energetic commander, but he would boast of his achievements, and his reports are unreliable.

As previously mentioned, Fremont after his return to Monterey proceeded to recruit a force to move against Los Angeles by land from Monterey. His recruits were principally obtained from the recently arrived immigrants. Each man was furnished with a horse and was to receive $25 a month. A force of about four hundred and fifty was obtained. Fremont left Monterey November 17 and rendezvoused at San Juan Bautista, where he remained to the 29th of the month organizing his battalion. On the 29th of November he began his march southward to co-operate with Stockton against Flores.

After the expulsion of Gillespie and his men from Los Angeles, detachments from Flores' army were sent to Santa Barbara and San Diego to recapture these places. At Santa Barbara Fremont had left nine men of his battalion under Lient. Theodore Talbot to garrison the town. A demand was made on the garrison to surrender by Colonel Garfias of Flores' army. Two hours were given the Americans to decide. Instead of surrendering they fell back into the hills, where they remained three or four days, hoping that reinforcements might be sent them from Monterey. Their only subsistence was the flesh of an old gray mare of Daniel Hill's that they captured, brought into camp and killed. They secured one of Micheltorena's cholos that had remained in the country and was living in a cañon among the hills for a guide. He furnished them a horse to carry their blankets and conducted them through the mountains to the San Joaquin valley. Here the guide left them with the Indians, he returning to Santa Barbara. The Indians fed them on chia (wild flaxseed), mush and acorn bread. They traveled down the San Joaquin valley. On their journey they lived on the flesh of wild horses, seventeen of which they killed. After many hardships they reached Monterey on the 8th of November, where they joined Fremont's battalion.

Captain Merritt, of Fremont's battalion, had been left at San Diego with forty men to hold the town when the battalion marched north to co-operate with Stockton against Los Angeles. Immediately after Gillespie's retreat, Francisco Rico was sent with fifty men to capture the place. He was joined by recruits at San Diego. Merritt being in no condition to stand a siege, took refuge on board the American whale ship Stonington, which was lying at anchor. After remaining on board the Stonington ten days, taking advantage of the laxity of discipline among the Californians, he stole a march on them, recapturing the town and one piece of artillery. He sent Don Miguel de Pedrona, who was one of his allies, in a whale boat with four sailors to San Pedro to obtain supplies and assistance. Pedrona arrived at San Pedro on the 13th of October with Merritt's dispatches. Captain Mervine chartered the whale ship Magnolia, which was lying in the San Pedro harbor, and dispatched Lieutenant Minor, Midshipman Duvall and Morgan with thirty-three sailors and fifteen of Gillespie's volunteers to reinforce Merritt. They reached San Diego on the 16th. The combined forces of Minor and Merritt, numbering about ninety men, put in the greater part of the next two weeks in dragging cannon from the old fort and mounting them at their barracks, which were located on the hill at the edge of the plain on the west side of the town, convenient to water. They succeeded in mounting six brass nine-pounders and building two bastions of adobes, taken from an old house. There was constant skirmishing between the hostile parties, but few fatalities. The Americans claimed to have killed three of the enemy, and one American was ambushed and killed.

The Californians kept well out of range, but prevented the Americans from obtaining supplies. Their provisions were nearly exhausted, and when reduced to almost the last extreme they made a successful foraging expedition and procured a supply of mutton. Midshipman Duvall thus describes the adventure: "We had with us an Indian (chief of a numerous tribe) who, from his knowledge of the country, we thought could avoid the enemy; and getting news of a number of sheep about thirty-five miles to the south on the coast, we determined to send him and his companion to drive them onto an island which at low tide connected with the mainland. In a few days a signal was made on the island, and the boats of the whale ship Stonington, stationed off the island, were sent to it. Our good old Indian had managed, through his cunning and by keeping concealed in ravines, to drive onto the island about six hundred sheep, but his companion had been caught and killed by the enemy. I shall never forget his famished appearance, but pride in his Indian triumph could be seen playing in his dark eyes.

"For thirty or forty days we were constantly expecting, from the movements of the enemy, an attack, soldiers and officers sleeping on their arms and ready for action. About the 1st of November, Commodore Stockton arrived, and, after landing Captain Gillespie with his company and about forty-three marines, he suddenly disappeared, leaving Lieutenant Minor governor of the place and Captain Gillespie commandant."*

Foraging continued, the whale ship Stonington, which had been impressed into the government service, being used to take parties down the coast, who made raids inland and brought back with them cattle and horses.

It was probably on one of these excursions that the flag-making episode occurred, of which there are more versions than Homer had birth-places. The correct version of the story is as follows: A party had been sent under command of Lieutenant Hensley to Juan Bandini's rancho in Lower California to bring up bands of cattle and horses. Bandini was an adherent of the American cause. He and his family returned with the cavalcade to San Diego. At their last camping place before reaching the town, Hensley, in a conversation with Bandini, regretted they had no flag with them to display on their entry into the town. Señora Bandini volunteered to make one, which she did from red, white and blue dresses of her children. This flag, fastened to a staff, was carried at the head of the cavalcade when it made its triumphal entry into San Diego. The Mexican government confiscated Bandini's ranchos in Lower California on account of his friendship to the Americans during the war.

Skirmishing continued almost daily. José Antonio Carrillo was now in command of the Californians, their force numbering about one hundred men. Commodore Stockton returned and decided to fortify. Midshipman Duvall, in the Log Book referred to in the previous chapter, thus describes the fort: "The commodore now commenced to fortify the hill which overlooked the town by building a fort, constructed by placing three hundred gallon casks full of sand close together. The inclosure was twenty by thirty yards. A bank of earth and small gravel was thrown up in front as high as the top of the casks and a ditch dug around on the outside. Inside a ball-proof vault of ketch was built out of plank and lined on the inside with adobes, on top of which a swivel was mounted. The entrance was guarded by a strong gate, with a drawbridge in front across the ditch or moat. The whole fortification was completed and the guns mounted on it in about three weeks. Our men working on the fort were on short allowance of beef and wheat, and for a time without bread, tea, sugar or coffee, many of them being destitute of shoes, but there were few complaints.

"About the 1st of December, information having been received that General Kearny was at Warner's Pass, about eighty miles distant, with one hundred dragoons on his march to San Diego, Commodore Stockton immediately sent an escort of fifty men under command of Captain Gillespie, accompanied by Past Midshipmen Beale and Duncan, having with them one piece of artillery. They reached General Kearny without molestation. On the march the combined force was surprised by about ninety-three Californians at San Pasqual, under command of Andres Pico, who had been sent to that part of the country to drive off all the cattle and horses to prevent us from getting them. In the battle that ensued General Kearny lost in killed Captains Johnston and Moore and Lieutenant Hammond, and fifteen dragoons. Seventeen dragoons were severely wounded. The enemy captured one piece of artillery. General Kearny and Captains Gillespie and Gibson were severely wounded; also one of the engineer officers. Some of the dragoons have since died."

"After the engagement General Kearny took position on a hill covered with large rocks. It was well suited for defense. Lieutenant Godey of Gillespie's volunteers, the night after the battle, escaped through the enemy's line of sentries and came in with a letter from Captain Turner to the commodore. Whilst among the rocks, Past Midshipman Beale and Kit Carson managed, under cover of night, to pass out through the enemy's ranks, and after three days' and nights' hard marching through the mountains without water, succeeded in getting safely into San Diego, completely famished. Soon after arriving Lieutenant Beale fainted away, and for some days entirely lost his reason."

On the night of Beale's arrival, December 9, about 9 p. m., detachments of two hundred sailors and marines from the Congress and Portsmouth, under the immediate command of Captain Zeilin, assisted by Lieutenants Gray, Hunter, Renshaw, Parrish, Thompson and Tilghman and Midshipmen Duvall and Morgan, each man carrying a blanket, three pounds of jerked beef and the same of hard-tack, began their march to relieve General Kearny. They marched all night and camped on a chaparral covered mountain during the day. At 4 p. m. of the second night's march they reached Kearny's camp, surprising him. Godey, who had been sent ahead to inform Kearny that assistance was coming, had been captured by the enemy. General Kearny had burnt and destroyed all his baggage and camp equipage, saddles, bridles, clothing, etc., preparatory to forcing his way through the enemy's line. Burdened with his wounded, it is doubtful whether he could have escaped. Midshipman Duvall says: "It would not be a hazard of opinion to say he would have been overpowered and compelled to surrender." The enemy disappeared on the arrival of reinforcements. The relief expedition, with Kearny's men, reached San Diego after two days' march.

A brief explanation of the reason why Kearny was at San Pasqual may be necessary. In June, 1846, Gen. Stephen W. Kearny, commander of the Army of the West, as his command was designated, left Fort Leavenworth with a force of regulars and volunteers to take possession of New Mexico. The conquest of that territory was accomplished without a battle. Under orders from the war department, Kearny began his march to California with a part of his force to co-operate with the naval forces there. October 6, near Socorro, N. M., he met Kit Carson with an escort of fifteen men en route from Los Angeles to Washington, bearing dispatches from Stockton, giving the report of the conquest of California. Kearny required Carson to turn back and act as his guide. Carson was very unwilling to do so, as he was within a few days' journey of his home and family, from whom he had been separated for nearly two years. He had been guide for Fremont on his exploring expedition. He, however, obeyed Kearny's orders.

General Kearny sent back about three hundred of his men, taking with him one hundred and twenty. After a toilsome march by way of the Pima villages, Tucson, the Gila and across the Colorado desert, they reached the Indian village of San Pasqual (about forty miles from San Diego), where the battle was fought. It was the bloodiest battle of the conquest; Kearny's men, at daybreak, riding on broken down mules and half broken horses, in an irregular and disorderly line, charged the Californians. While the American line was stretched out over the plain Capt. Andres Pico, who was in command, wheeled his column and charged the Americans. A fierce hand to hand fight ensued, the Californians using their lances and lariats, the Americans clubbed guns and sabers. Of Kearny's command eighteen men were killed and nineteen wounded; three of the wounded died. Only one, Capt. Abraham R. Johnston (a relative of the author's), was killed by a gunshot; all the others were lanced. The mules to one of the howitzers became unmanageable and ran into the enemy's lines. The driver was killed and the gun captured. One Californian was captured and several slightly wounded; none were killed. Less than half of Kearny's one hundred and seventy men* took part in the battle. His loss in killed and wounded was fifty per cent of those engaged. Dr. John S. Griffin, for many years a leading physician of Los Angeles, was the surgeon of the command.

The foraging expeditions in Lower California having been quite successful in bringing in cattle, horses and mules, Commodore Stockton hastened his preparation for marching against Los Angeles. The enemy obtained information of the projected movement and left for the pueblo.

"The Cyane having arrived," says Duvall, "our force was increased to about six hundred men, most of whom, understanding the drill, performed the evolutions like regular soldiers. Everything being ready for our departure, the commodore left Captain Montgomery and officers in command of the town, and on the 29th of December took up his line of march for Los Angeles. General Kearny was second in command and having the immediate arrangement of the forces, reserving for himself the prerogative which his rank necessarily imposed upon him. Owing to the weak state of our oxen we had not crossed the dry bed of the river San Diego before they began breaking down, and the carts, which were thirty or forty in number, had to be dragged by the men. The general urged on the commodore that it was useless to commence such a march as was before us with our present means of transportation, but the commodore insisted on performing at least one day's march even if we should have to return the next day. We succeeded in reaching the valley of the Soledad that night by dragging our carts. Next day the commodore proposed to go six miles farther, which we accomplished, and then continued six miles farther. Having obtained some fresh oxen, by assisting the carts up hill we made ten or twelve miles a day. At San Luis Rey we secured men, carts and oxen, and after that our days' marches ranged from fifteen to twenty-two miles a day.

"The third day out from San Luis Rey a white flag was seen ahead, the bearer of which had a communication from Flores, signing himself 'Commander-in-Chief and Governor of California,' asking for a conference for the purpose of coming to terms, which would be alike 'honorable to both countries.' The commodore refused to answer him in writing, saying to the bearer of the truce that his answer was, 'he knew no such person as Governor Flores; that he himself was the only governor in California; that he knew a rebel by that name, a man who had given his parole of honor not to take up arms against the government of the United States, who, if the people of California now in arms against the forces of the United States would deliver up, he (Stockton) would treat with them on condition that they surrender their arms and retire peaceably to their homes and he would grant them, as citizens of the United States, protection from further molestation.' This the embassy refused to entertain, saying 'they would prefer to die with Flores than to surrender on such terms.'"

"On the 8th of January, 1847, they met us on the banks of the river San Gabriel with between five and six hundred men mounted on good horses and armed with lances and carbines, having also four pieces of artillery planted on the heights about three hundred and fifty yards distant from the river. Owing to circumstances which have occurred since the surrender of the enemy, I prefer not mentioning the particulars of this day's battle and also that of the day following, or of referring to individuals concerned in the successful management of our forces." (The circumstance to which Lieutenant Duvall refers was undoubtedly the quarrel between Stockton and Kearny after the capture of Los Angeles.) "It is sufficient to say that on the 8th of January we succeeded in crossing the river and driving the enemy from the heights. Having resisted all their charges, dismounted one of their pieces and put them to flight in every direction, we encamped on the ground they had occupied during the fight.

"The next day the Californians met us on the plains of the mesa. For a time the fighting was carried on by both sides with artillery, but that proving too hot for them they concentrated their whole force in a line ahead of us and at a given signal divided from the center and came down on us like a tornado, charging us on all sides at the same time; but they were effectually defeated and fled in every direction in the utmost confusion. Many of their horses were left dead on the field. Their loss in the two battles, as given by Andres Pico, second in command, was eighty-three killed and wounded; our loss, three killed (one accidentally), and fifteen or twenty wounded, none dangerously. The enemy abandoned two pieces of artillery in an Indian village near by."

I have given at considerable length Midshipman Duvall's account of Stockton's march from San Diego and of the two battles fought, not because it is the fullest account of those events, but because it is original historical matter, never having appeared in print before, and also because it is the observations of a participant written at the time the events occurred. In it the losses of the enemy are greatly exaggerated, but that was a fault of his superior officers as well. Commodore Stockton, in his official reports of the two battles, gives the enemy's loss in killed and wounded "between seventy and eighty." And General Kearny, in his report of the battle of San Pasqual, claimed it as a victory, and states that the enemy left six dead on the field. The actual loss of the Californians in the two battles (San Gabriel river and La Mesa) was three killed and ten or twelve wounded.*

*The killed were Ignacio Sepulveda, Francisco Rubio, and El Guaymeno, a Yaqui Indian.

While the events recorded in this chapter were transpiring at San Diego and its vicinity, what was the state of affairs in the capital, Los Angeles? After the exultation and rejoicing over the expulsion of Gillespie's garrison, Merivine's defeat and the victory over Kearny at San Pasqual there came a reaction. Dissension continued between the leaders. There was lack of arms and laxity of discipline. The army was but little better than a mob. Obedience to orders of a superior was foreign to the nature of a Californian. His wild, free life in the saddle made him impatient of all restraint. Then the impossibility of successful resistance against the Americans became more and more apparent as the final conflict approached. Fremont's army was moving down on the doomed city from the north, and Stockton's was coming up from the south. Either one of these, in numbers, exceeded the force that Flores could bring into action; combined they would crush him out of existence. The California troops were greatly discouraged and it was with great difficulty that the officers kept their men together. There was another and more potent element of disintegration. Many of the wealthier natives and all the foreigners, regarding the contest as hopeless, secretly favored the American cause, and it was only through fear of loss of property that they furnished Flores and his officers any supplies for the army.

During the latter part of December and the first days of January Flores' army was stationed at the San Fernando Mission, on the lookout for Fremont's battalion; but the more rapid advance of Stockton's army compelled a change of base. On the 6th and 7th of January Flores moved his army back secretly through the Cahuenga Pass, and, passing to the southward of the city, took position where La Jabonera (the soap factory) road crosses the San Gabriel river. Here his men were stationed in the thick willows to give Stockton a surprise. Stockton received information of the trap set for him and after leaving the Los Coyotes swung off to the right until he struck the Upper Santa Ana road. The Californians had barely time to effect a change of base and get their cannon planted when the Americans arrived at the crossing.

Stockton called the engagement there the battle of San Gabriel river; the Californians call it the battle of Paño de Bartolo, which is the better name. The place where the battle was fought is on bluff just south of the Upper Santa Ana road, near where the Southern California railroad crosses the old San Gabriel river. (The ford or crossing was formerly known as Pico's Crossing.) There was, at the time of the battle, but one San Gabriel river. The new river channel was made in the great flood of 1868. What Stockton, Emory, Duvall and other American officers call the battle of the Plains of the Mesa the Californians call the battle of La Mesa, which is most decidedly a better name than the "Plains of the Plain." It was fought at a ravine, the Canada de Los Alisos, near the southeastern corner of the Los Angeles city boundary. In these battles the Californians had four pieces of artillery, two iron nine-pounders, the old woman's gun and the howitzer captured from Kearny. Their powder was very poor. It was made at San Gabriel. It was owing to this that they did so little execution in the fight. That the Californians escaped with so little punishment was probably due to the wretched marksmanship of Stockton's sailors and marines.

CHAPTER XX.

CAPTURE AND OCCUPATION OF THE CAPITAL.

AFTER the battle of La Mesa, the Americans, keeping to the south, crossed the Los Angeles river at about the point where the south boundary line of the city crosses it and camped on the right bank. Here, under a willow tree, those killed in battle were buried. Lieutenant Emory, in his "Notes of a Military Reconnoissance," says: "The town, known to contain great quantities of wine and aguardiente, was four miles distant (four miles from the battlefield). From previous experience of the difficulty of controlling men when entering towns, it was determined to cross the river San Fernando (Los Angeles), halt there for the night and enter the town in the morning, with the whole day before us.

"After we had pitched our camp, the enemy came down from the hills, and four hundred horsemen with four pieces of artillery drew off towards the town, in order and regularity, whilst about sixty made a movement down the river on our rear and left flank. This led us to suppose they were not yet whipped, as we thought, and that we should have a night attack.

"January 10 (1847)—. Just as we had raised our camp, a flag of truce, borne by Mr. Celis, a Castilian; Mr. Workman, an Englishman, and Alvarado, the owner of the rancho at the Alisos, was brought into camp. They proposed, on behalf of the Californians, to surrender their dear City of the Angels provided we would respect property and persons. This was agreed to, but not altogether trusting to the honesty of General Flores, who had once broken his parole, we moved into the town in the same order we should have done if expecting an attack. It was a wise precaution, for the streets were full of desperate and drunken fellows, who brandished their arms and saluted us with every form of reproach. The crest, overlooking the town, in rifle range, was covered with horsemen engaged in the same hospitable manner.

"Our men marched steadily on, until crossing the ravine leading into the public square (plaza), when a fight took place amongst the Californians on the hill; one became disarmed and to avoid death rolled down the hill towards us, his adversary pursuing and lancing him in the most cold-blooded manner. The man tumbling down the hill was supposed to be one of our vaqueros, and the cry of 'rescue him' was raised. The crew of the Cyane, nearest the scene, at once and without any orders, halted and gave the man that was lancing him a volley; strange to say, he did not fall. The general gave the jack tars a cursing, not so much for the firing without orders, as for their bad marksmanship."

Shortly after the above episode, the Californians did open fire from the hill on the vaqueros in charge of the cattle. (These vaqueros were Californians in the employ of the Americans and were regarded by their countrymen as traitors.) A company of riflemen was ordered to clear the hill. A single volley effected this, killing two of the enemy. This was the last bloodshed in the war; and the second conquest of California was completed as the first had been by the capture of Los Angeles. Two hundred men, with two pieces of artillery, were stationed on the hill.

The Angeleños did not exactly welcome the invaders with "bloody hands to inhospitable graves," but they did their best to let them know they were not wanted. The better class of the native inhabitants closed their houses and took refuge with foreign residents or went to the ranchos of their friends in the country. The fellows of the baser sort, who were in possession of the city, exhausted their vocabularies of abuse on the invading gringos. There was one paisano who excelled all his countrymen in this species of warfare. It is a pity his name has not been preserved in history with that of other famous scolds and kickers. He rode by the side of the advancing column up Main street, firing volleys of invective and denunciation at the hated gringos. At certain points of his tirade he worked himself to such a pitch of indignation that language failed him; then he would solemnly go through the motions of "Make ready, take aim!" with an old shotgun he carried, but when it came to the order "Fire!" discretion got the better of his valor; he lowered his gun and began again, firing invective at the gringo soldiers; his mouth would go off if his gun would not.

Commodore Stockton's headquarters were in the Abila house, the second house on Olvera street, north of the plaza. The building is still standing, but has undergone many changes in fifty years. A rather amusing account was recently given me by an old pioneer of the manner in which Commodore Stockton got possession of the house. The widow Abila and her daughters, at the approach of the American army, had abandoned their house and taken refuge with Don Luis Vignes of the Aliso. Vignes was a Frenchman and friendly to both sides. The widow left a young Californian in charge of her house (which was finely furnished), with strict orders to keep it closed. Stockton had with him a fine brass band, something new in California. When the troops halted on the plaza, the band began to play. The boyish guardian of the Abila casa could not resist the temptation to open the door and look out. The enchanting music drew him to the plaza. Stockton and his staff, hunting for a place suitable for headquarters, passing by, found the door invitingly open, entered, and, finding the house deserted, took possession. The recreant guardian returned to find himself dispossessed and the house in possession of the enemy. "And the band played on."

It is a fact not generally known that there were two forts planned and partially built on Fort Hill during the war for the conquest of California. The first was planned by Lieut. William H. Emory, topographical engineer of General Kearny's staff, and work was begun on it by Commodore Stockton's sailors and marines. The second was planned by Lieut. J. W. David-son, of the First United States Dragoons, and built by the Mormon battalion. The first was not completed and not named. The second was named Fort Moore. Their location seems to have been identical. The first was designed to hold one hundred men. The second was much larger. Flores' army was supposed to be in the neighborhood of the city ready to make a dash into it, so Stockton decided to fortify.

"On January 11th," Lieutenant Emory writes, "I was ordered to select a site and place a fort capable of containing a hundred men. With this in view a rapid reconnoissance of the town was made and the plan of a fort sketched, so placed as to enable a small garrison to command the town and the principal avenues to it, the plan was approved."

"January 12. I laid off the work and before night broke the first ground. The population of the town and its dependencies is about three thousand; that of the town itself about fifteen hundred. * * * Here all the revolutions have had their origin, and it is the point upon which any Mexican force from Sonora would be directed. It was therefore desirable to establish a fort which, in case of trouble, should enable a small garrison to hold out till aid might come from San Diego, San Francisco or Monterey, places which are destined to become centers of American settlements."

"January 13. It rained steadily all day and nothing was done on the work. At night I worked on the details of the fort."

"January 15. The details to work on the fort were by companies. I sent to Captain Tilghman, who commanded on the hill, to detach one of the companies under his command to commence the work. He furnished, on the 16th, a company of artillery (seamen from the Congress) for the day's work, which was performed bravely, and gave me great hopes of success."

On the 18th Lieutenant Emory took his departure with General Kearny for San Diego. From there he was sent with despatches, via Panama, to the war department. In his book he says: "Subsequent to my departure the entire plan of the fort was changed, and I am not the projector of the work finally adopted for defense of that town."

As previously stated, Fremont's battalion began its march down the coast on the 29th of November, 1846. The winter rains set in with great severity. The volunteers were scantily provided with clothing and the horses were in poor condition. Many of the horses died of starvation and hard usage. The battalion encountered no opposition from the enemy on its march and did no fighting. On the 11th of January, a few miles above San Fernando, Colonel Kearny received a message from General Kearny informing him of the defeat of the enemy and the capture of Los Angeles. That night the battalion encamped in the mission buildings at San Fernando. From the mission that evening Jesus Pico, a cousin of Gen. Andres Pico, set out to find the Californian army and open negotiations with its leaders. Jesus Pico, better known as Tortoi, had been arrested at his home near San Luis Obispo, tried by court-martial and sentenced to be shot for breaking his parole. Fremont, moved by the pleadings of Pico's wife and children, pardoned him. He became a warm admirer and devoted friend of Fremont's.

He found the advance guard of the Californians encamped at Verdugas. He was detained here, and the leading officers of the army were summoned to a council. Pico informed them of Fremont's arrival and the number of his men. With the combined forces of Fremont and Stockton against them, their cause was hopeless. He urged them to surrender to Fremont, as they could obtain better terms from him than from Stockton.

General Flores, who held a commission in the Mexican army, and who had been appointed by the territorial assembly governor and comandante-general by virtue of his rank, appointed Andres Pico general and gave him command of the army. The same night he took his departure for Mexico, by way of San Geronio Pass, accompanied by Colonel Garfias, Diego Sepulveda, Manuel Castro, Segura, and about thirty privates. General Pico, on assuming command, appointed Francisco Rico and Francisco de La Guerra to go with Jesus Pico to confer with Colonel Fremont. Fremont appointed as commissioners to negotiate a treaty, Major P.

B. Reading, Major William H. Russell and Capt. Louis McLane. On the return of Guerra and Rico to the Californian camp, Gen. Andres Pico appointed as commissioners, José Antonio Carrillo, commander of the cavalry squadron, and Agustin Olivera, diputado of the assembly, and moved his army near the river at Cahuenga. On the 13th Fremont moved his camp to the Cahuenga. The commissioners met in the deserted ranch-house, and the treaty was drawn up and signed.

The principal conditions of the treaty or capitulation of "Cahuenga," as it was termed, were that the Californians, on delivering up their artillery and public arms, and promising not again to take arms during the war, and conforming to the laws and regulations of the United States, shall be allowed peaceably to return to their homes. They were to be allowed the same rights and privileges as are allowed to citizens of the United States, and were not to be compelled to take an oath of allegiance until a treaty of peace was signed between the United States and Mexico, and were given the privilege of leaving the country if they wished to. An additional section was added to the treaty on the 16th at Los Angeles releasing the officers from their paroles. Two cannon were surrendered, the howitzer captured from General Kearny at San Pasqual and the woman's gun that won the battle of Dominguez. On the 14th, Fremont's battalion marched through the Cahuenga Pass to Los Angeles in a pouring rainstorm, and entered it four days after its surrender to Stockton. The conquest of California was completed. Stockton approved the treaty, although it was not altogether satisfactory to him. On the 16th he appointed Colonel Fremont governor of the territory, and William H. Russell, of the battalion, secretary of state.

This precipitated a quarrel between Stockton and Kearny, which had been brewing for some time. General Kearny claimed that under his instructions from the government he should be recognized as governor. As he had directly under his command but the one company of dragoons that he brought across the plain with him, he was unable to enforce his authority. He left on the 18th for San Diego, taking with him his officers and dragoons. On the 20th Commodore Stockton, with his sailors and marines, marched to San Pedro, where they all embarked on a man-of-war for San Diego to rejoin their ships. Shortly afterwards Commodore Stockton was superseded in the command of the Pacific squadron by Commodore Shubrick.

CHAPTER XXI.

TRANSITION AND TRANSFORMATION.

THE capitulation of Gen. Andres Pico at Cahuenga put an end to the war in California. The instructions from the secretary of war were to pursue a policy of conciliation towards the Californians with the ultimate design of transforming them into American citizens. Colonel Fremont was left in command at Los Angeles. He established his headquarters on the second floor of the Bell block (corner of Los Angeles and Aliso streets), then the best building in the city. One company of his battalion was retained in the city; the others, under command of Captain Owens, were quartered at the Mission San Gabriel.

The Mormons had been driven out of Illinois and Missouri. A sentiment of antagonism had been engendered against them and they had begun their migration to the far west, presumably to California. They were encamped on the Missouri river at Kanesville, now Council Bluffs, preparatory to crossing the plains, when hostilities broke out between the United States and Mexico, in April, 1846. A proposition was made by President Polk to their leaders to raise a battalion of five hundred men to serve as United States volunteers for twelve months. These volunteers, under command of regular army officers, were to march to Santa Fe, or, if necessary, to California, where, at the expiration of their term of enlistment, they were to be discharged and allowed to retain their arms. Through the influence of Brigham Young and other leaders, the battalion was recruited and General Kearny, commanding the Army of the West, detailed Capt. James Allen, of the First United States Dragoons, to muster them into the service and take command of the battalion. On the 16th of July, at Council Bluffs, the battalion was mustered into service and on the 14th of August it began its long and weary march. About eighty women and children, wives and families of the officers and some of the enlisted men, accompanied the battalion on its march. Shortly after the beginning of the march, Allen, who had been promoted to lieutenant-colonel, fell sick and died. The battalion was placed temporarily under the command of Lieut. A. J. Smith, of the regular army. At Santa Fe Lieut.-Col. Philip St. George Cooke took command under orders from General Kearny. The battalion was detailed to open a wagon road by the Gila route to California. About sixty of the soldiers who had become unfit for duty and all the women except five were sent back and the remainder of the force, after a toilsome journey, reached San Luis Rey, Cal., January 29, 1847, where it remained until ordered to Los Angeles, which place it reached March 17.

Captain Owens, in command of Fremont's battalion, had moved all the artillery, ten pieces, from Los Angeles to San Gabriel, probably with the design of preventing it falling into the hands of Colonel Cooke, who was an adherent of General Kearny. General Kearny, under additional instructions from the general government, brought by Colonel Mason from the war department, had established himself as governor at Monterey. With a governor in the north and one in the south, antagonistic to each other, California had fallen back to its normal condition under Mexican rule. Colonel Cooke, shortly after his arrival in the territory, thus describes the condition prevailing: "General Kearny is supreme somewhere up the coast. Colonel Fremont is supreme at Pueblo de Los Angeles; Colonel Stockton is commander-in-chief at San Diego; Commodore Shubrick the same at Monterey; and I at San Luis Rey; and we are all supremely poor, the government having no money and no credit, and we hold the territory because Mexico is the poorest of all."

Col. R. B. Mason was appointed inspector of the troops in California and made an official visit to Los Angeles. In a misunderstanding about some official matters he used insulting language to Colonel Fremont. Fremont promptly challenged him to fight a duel. The challenge was accepted; double-barreled shot-guns were chosen as the weapons and the Rancho Rosa del Castillo as the place of meeting. Mason was summoned north and the duel was postponed until his return. General Kearny, hearing of the proposed affair of honor, put a stop to further proceedings by the duelists.

Col. Philip St. George Cooke, of the Mormon battalion, was made commander of the military district of the south with headquarters at Los Angeles. Fremont's battalion was mustered out of service. The Mormon soldiers and the two companies of United States Dragoons who came with General Kearny were stationed at Los Angeles to do guard duty and prevent any uprising of the natives.

Colonel Fremont's appointment as governor of California had never been recognized by General Kearny. So when the general had made himself supreme at Monterey he ordered Fremont to report to him at the capital and turn over the papers of his governorship. Fremont did so and passed out of office. He was nominally governor of the territory about two months. His appointment was made by Commodore Stockton, but was never confirmed by the president or secretary of war. His jurisdiction did not extend beyond Los Angeles. He left Los Angeles May 12 for Monterey. From that place, in company with General Kearny, on May 31, he took his departure for the states. The relations between the two were strained. While ostensibly traveling as one company, each officer, with his staff and escort, made separate camps. At Fort Leavenworth General Kearny placed Fremont under arrest and preferred charges against him for disobedience of orders. He was tried by court-martial at Washington and was ably defended by his father-in-law, Colonel Benton, and his brother-in-law, William Carey Jones. The court found him guilty and fixed the penalty, dismissal from the service. President Polk remitted the penalty and ordered Colonel Fremont to resume his sword and report for duty. He did so, but shortly afterward resigned his commission and left the army.

While Colonel Cooke was in command of the southern district rumors reached Los Angeles that the Mexican general, Bustamente, with a force of fifteen hundred men, was preparing to reconquer California. "Positive information," writes Colonel Cooke, under date of April 20, 1847, "has been received that the Mexican government has appropriated $600,000 towards fitting out this force." It was also reported that cannon and military stores had been landed at San Vicente, in Lower California. Rumors of an approaching army came thick and fast. The natives were supposed to be in league with Bustamente and to be secretly preparing for an uprising. Precautions were taken against a surprise. A troop of cavalry was sent to Warner's ranch to patrol the Sonora road as far as the desert. The construction of a fort on the hill fully commanding the town, which had previously been determined upon, was begun and a company of infantry posted on the hill.

On the 23d of April, three months after work had ceased on Emory's fort, the construction of the second fort was begun and pushed vigorously. Rumors continued to come of the approach of the enemy. May 3, Colonel Cooke writes: "A report was received through the most available sources of information that General Bustamente had crossed the Gulf of California near its head, in boats of the pearl fishers, and at last information was at a rancho on the western road, seventy leagues below San Diego." Colonel Stevenson's regiment of New York volunteers had recently arrived in California. Two companies of that regiment had been sent to Los Angeles and two to San Diego. The report that Colonel Cooke had received reinforcement and that Los Angeles was being fortified was supposed to have frightened Bustamente into abandoning his invasion of California. Bustamente's invading army was largely the creation of somebody's fertile imagination. The scare, however, had the effect of hurrying up work on the fort. May 13, Colonel Cooke resigned and Col. J. B. Stevenson succeeded him in the command of the southern military district.

Colonel Stevenson continued work on the fort and on the 1st of July work had progressed so far that he decided to dedicate and name it on the 4th. He issued an official order for the celebration of the anniversary of the birthday of American independence at this port, as he called Los Angeles. "At sunrise a Federal salute will be fired from the field work on the hill which commands this town and for the first time from this point the American standard will be displayed. At 11 o'clock all the troops of the district, consisting of the Mormon battalion, the two companies of dragoons and two companies of the New York volunteers, were formed in a hollow square at the fort. The Declaration of Independence was read in English by Captain Stuart Taylor and in Spanish by Stephen C. Foster. The native Californians, seated on their horses in rear of the soldiers, listened to Don Esteban as he rolled out in sonorous Spanish the Declaration's arraignment of King George III, and smiled. They had probably never heard of King George or the Declaration of Independence, either, but they knew a pronunciamiento when they heard it, and after a pronunciamiento in their governmental system came a revolution, therefore they smiled at the prospect of a gringo revolution. "At the close of this ceremony (reading of the Declaration) the field work will be dedicated and appropriately named; and at 12 o'clock a national salute will be fired. The field work at this post having been planned and the work conducted entirely by Lieutenant Davidson of the First Dragoons, he is requested to hoist upon it for the first time on the morning of the 4th the American standard." * * * The commander directs that from and after the 4th instant the fort shall bear the name of Moore. Benjamin D. Moore, after whom the fort was named, was captain of Company A, First United States Dragoons. He was killed by a lance thrust in the disastrous charge at the battle of San Pasqual. This fort was located on what is now called Fort Hill, near the geographical center of Los Angeles. It was a breastwork about four hundred feet long with bastions and embrasures for cannon. The principal embrasure commanded the church and the plaza, two places most likely to be the rallying points in a rebellion. It was built more for the suppression of a revolt than to resist an invasion. It was in a commanding position; two hundred men, about its capacity, could have defended it against a thousand if the attack came from the front; but as it was never completed, in an attack from the rear it could easily have been captured with an equal force.

Col. Richard B. Mason succeeded General Kearny as commander-in-chief of the troops and military governor of California. Col. Philip St. George Cooke resigned command of the military district of the south May 13, joined General Kearny at Monterey and went east with him. As previously stated, Col. J. D. Stevenson, of the New York volunteers, succeeded him. His regiment, the First New York, but really the Seventh, had been recruited in the eastern part of the state of New York in the summer of 1846, for the double purpose of conquest and colonization. The United States government had no intention of giving up California once it was conquered, and therefore this regiment came to the coast well provided with provisions and implements of husbandry. It came to California via Cape Horn in three transports. The first ship, the Perkins, arrived at San Francisco, March 6, 1847; the second, the Drew, March 19; and the third, the Loo Choo, March 26. Hostilities had ceased in California before their arrival. Two companies, A and B, under command of Lieutenant-Colonel Burton, were sent to Lower California, where they saw hard service and took part in several engagements. The other companies of the regiment were sent to different towns in Alta California to do garrison duty.

Another military organization that reached California after the conquest was Company F of the Third United States Artillery. It landed at Monterey January 28, 1847. It was commanded by Capt. C. Q. Thompkins. With it came Lieuts. E. O. C. Ord, William T. Sherman and H. W. Halleck, all of whom became prominent in California affairs and attained national reputation during the Civil war. The Mormon battalion was mustered out in July, 1847. One company under command of Captain Hunt re-enlisted. The others made their way to Utah, where they joined their brethren who the year before had crossed the plains and founded the City of Salt Lake. The New York volunteers were discharged in August, 1848. After the treaty of peace, in 1848, four companies of United States Dragoons, under command of Major L. P. Graham, marched from Chihuahua, by way of Tucson, to California. Major Graham was the last military commander of the south.

Commodore W. Branford Shubrick succeeded Commodore Stockton in command of the naval forces of the north Pacific coast. Jointly with General Kearny he issued a circular or proclamation to the people of California, printed in English and Spanish, setting forth "That the president of the United States, desirous to give and secure to the people of California a share of the good government and happy civil organization enjoyed by the people of the United States, and to protect them at the same time from the attacks of foreign foes and from internal commotions, has invested the undersigned with separate and distinct powers, civil and military; a cordial co-operation in the exercise of which, it is hoped and believed, will have the happy results desired.

"To the commander-in-chief of the naval forces the president has assigned the regulation of the import trade, the conditions on which vessels of all nations, our own as well as foreign, may be admitted into the ports of the territory, and the establishment of all port regulations. To the commanding military officer the president has assigned the direction of the operations on land and has invested him with administrative functions of government over the people and territory occupied by the forces of the United States.

"Done at Monterey, capital of California, this 1st day of March, A. D. 1847. W. Branford Shubrick, commander-in-chief of the naval forces. S. W. Kearny, Brig.-Gen. United States Army, and Governor of California."

Under the administration of Col. Richard B. Mason, the successor of General Kearny as military governor, the reconstruction, or, more appropriately, the transformation period began. The orders from the general government were to conciliate the people and to make no radical changes in the form of government. The Mexican laws were continued in force. Just what these laws were, it was difficult to find out. No code commissioner had codified the laws and it sometimes happened that the judge made the law to suit the case. Under the old régime the alcalde was often law-giver, judge, jury and executioner, all in one. Occasionally there was friction between the military and civil powers, and there were rumors of insurrections and invasions, but nothing came of them. The Californians, with easy good nature so characteristic of them, made the best of the situation. "A thousand things," says Judge Hays, "combined to smooth the asperities of war. Fremont had been courteous and gay; Mason was just and firm. The natural good temper of the population favored a speedy and perfect conciliation. The American officers at once found themselves happy in every circle. In suppers, balls, visiting in town and country, the hours glided away with pleasant reflections."

There were, however, a few individuals who were not happy unless they could stir up dissensions and cause trouble. One of the chief of these was Serbulo Varela, agitator and revolutionist. Varela, for some offense not specified in the records, had been committed to prison by the second alcalde of Los Angeles. Colonel Stevenson turned him out of jail, and Varela gave the judge a tongue lashing in refuse Castilian. The judge's official dignity was hurt. He sent a communication to the ayuntamiento saying: "Owing to personal abuse which I received at the hands of a private individual and from the present military commander, I tender my resignation."

The ayuntamiento sent a communication to Colonel Stevenson asking why he had turned Varela out of jail and why he had insulted the judge. The colonel curtly replied that the military would not act as jailers over persons guilty of trifling offenses while the city had plenty of persons to do guard duty at the jail. As to the abuse of the judge, he was not aware that any abuse had been given, and would take no further notice of him unless he stated the nature of the insult offered him. The council decided to notify the governor of the outrage perpetrated by the military commander, and the second alcalde said since he could get no satisfaction for insults to his authority from the military despot, he would resign; but the council would not accept his resignation, so he refused to act, and the city had to worry along with one alcalde.

Although foreigners had been coming to California ever since 1814, their numbers had not increased very rapidly. Nearly all of these had found their way there by sea. Those who had become permanent residents had married native Californian women and adopted the customs of the country. Capt. Jedediah S. Smith, in 1827, crossed the Sierra Nevada mountains from California and by way of the Humboldt, or, as he named it, the Mary River, had reached the Great Salt Lake. From there through the South Pass of the Rocky mountains the route had been traveled for several years by the fur trappers. This latter became the great emigrant route to California a few years later. A southern route by way of Santa Fe had been marked out and the Pattee party had found their way to the Colorado by the Gila route, but so far no emigrant trains had come from the States to California with women and children. The first of these mixed trains was organized in western Missouri in May, 1841. The party consisted of sixty-nine persons, including men, women and children. This party divided at Soda Springs, half going to Oregon and the others keeping on their way to California. They reached the San Joaquin valley in November, 1841, after a toilsome journey of six months. The first settlement they found was Dr. Marsh's ranch in what is now called Contra Costa county. Marsh gave them a cordial reception at first, but afterwards treated them meanly.

Fourteen of the party started for the Pueblo de San José. At the Mission of San José, twelve miles from the Pueblo, they were all arrested by order of General Vallejo. One of the men was sent to Dr. Marsh to have him come forthwith and explain why an armed force of his countrymen were roaming around the country without passports. Marsh secured their release and passports for all the party. On his return home he charged the men who had remained at his ranch $5 each for a passport, although the passports had cost him nothing. As there was no money in the party, each had to put up some equivalent from his scanty possessions. Marsh had taken this course to reimburse himself for the meal he had given the half-starved emigrants the first night of their arrival at his ranch.

In marked contrast with the meanness of Marsh was the liberality of Captain Sutter. Sutter had built a fort at the junction of the American river and the Sacramento in 1839 and had obtained extensive land grants. His fort was the frontier post for the overland emigration. Gen. John Bidwell, who came with the first emigrant train to California, in a description of "Life in California Before the Gold Discovery," says: "Nearly everybody who came to California then made it a point to reach Sutter's Fort. Sutter was one of the most liberal and hospitable of men. Everybody was welcome, one man or a hundred, it was all the same."

Another emigrant train, known as the Workman-Rowland party, numbering forty-five persons, came from Santa Fe by the Gila route to Los Angeles. About twenty-five of this party were persons who had arrived too late at Westport, Mo., to join the northern emigrant party, so they went with the annual caravan of St. Louis traders to Santa Fe and from there, with traders and trappers, continued their journey to California. From 1841 to the American conquest immigrant trains came across the plains every year.

One of the most noted of these, on account of the tragic fate that befell it, was the Donner party. The nucleus of this party, George and Jacob Donner and James K. Reed, with their families, started from Springfield, Ill., in the spring of 1846. By accretions and combinations, when it reached Fort Bridger, July 25, it had increased to eighty-seven persons—thirty-six men, twenty-one women and thirty children, under the command of George Donner. A new route called the Hastings Cut-Off, had just been opened by Lansford W. Hastings. This route passed to the south of Great Salt Lake and struck the old Fort Hall emigrant road on the Humboldt. It was claimed that the "cut-off" shortened the distance three hundred miles. The Donner party, by misrepresentations, were induced to take this route. The cut-off proved to be almost impassable. They started on the cut-off the last day of July, and it was the end of September when they struck the old emigrant trail on the Humboldt. They had lost most of their cattle and were nearly out of provisions. From this on, unmerciful disaster followed them fast and faster. In an altercation, Reed, one of the best men of the party, killed Snyder. He was banished from the train and compelled to leave his wife and children behind. An old Belgian named Hardcoop and Wolfinger, a German, unable to keep up, were abandoned to die on the road. Pike was accidentally shot by Foster. The Indians stole a number of their cattle, and one calamity after another delayed them. In the latter part of October they had reached the Truckee. Here they encountered a heavy snow storm, which blocked all further progress. They wasted their strength in trying to ascend the mountains in the deep snow that had fallen. Finally, finding this impossible, they turned back and built cabins at a lake since known as Donner Lake, and prepared to pass the winter. Most of their oxen had strayed away during the storm and perished. Those still alive they killed and preserved the meat.

A party of fifteen, ten men and five women, known as the "Forlorn Hope," started, December 16, on snowshoes to cross the Sierras. They had provisions for six days, but the journey consumed thirty-two days. Eight of the ten men perished, and among them the noble Stanton, who had brought relief to the emigrants from Sutter's Fort before the snows began to fall. The five women survived. Upon the arrival of the wretched survivors of the "Forlorn Hope," the terrible sufferings of the snow-bound immigrants were made known at Sutter's Fort, and the first relief party was organized, and on the 5th of February started for the lake. Seven of the thirteen who started succeeded in reaching the lake. On the 19th they started back with twenty-one of the immigrants, three of whom died on the way. A second relief, under Reed and McCutchen, was organized. Reed had gone to Yerba Buena to seek assistance. A public meeting was called and $1,500 subscribed. The second relief started from Johnston's Ranch, the nearest point to the mountains, on the 23d of February and reached the camp on March 1st. They brought out seventeen. Two others were organized and reached Donner Lake, the last on the 17th of April. The only survivor then was Keseburg, a German, who was hated by all the company. There was a strong suspicion that he had killed Mrs. Donner, who had refused to leave her husband (who was too weak to travel) with the previous relief. There were threats of hanging him. Keseburg had saved his life by eating the bodies of the dead. Of the original party of eighty-seven, a total of thirty-nine perished from starvation. Most of the survivors were compelled to resort to cannibalism. They were not to blame if they did.

CHAPTER XXII.

MEXICAN LAWS AND AMERICAN OFFICIALS.

UPON the departure of General Kearny, May 31, 1847, Col. Richard B. Mason became governor and commander-in-chief of the United States forces in California by order of the president. Stockton, Kearny and Fremont had taken their departure, the dissensions that had existed since the conquest of the territory among the conquerors ceased, and peace reigned.

There were reports of Mexican invasions and suspicions of secret plottings against gringo rule, but the invaders came not and the plottings never produced even the mildest form of a Mexican revolution. Mexican laws were administered for the most part by military officers. The municipal authorities were encouraged to continue in power and perform their governmental functions, but they were indifferent and sometimes rebelled. Under Mexican rule there was no trial by jury. The alcalde acted as judge and in criminal cases a council of war settled the fate of the criminal. The Rev. Walter Colton, while acting as alcalde of Monterey, in 1846-47, impaneled the first jury ever summoned in California. "The plaintiff and defendant," he writes, "are among the principal citizens of the country. The case was one involving property on the one side and integrity of character on the other. Its merits had been pretty widely discussed, and had called forth an unusual interest. One-third of the jury were Mexicans, one-third Californians and the other third Americans. This mixture may have the better answered the ends of justice, but I was apprehensive at one time it would embarrass the proceedings; for the plaintiff spoke in English, the defendant in French; the jury, save the Americans, Spanish, and the witnesses, all the languages known to California. By the tact of Mr. Hartnell, who acted as interpreter, and the absence of young lawyers, we got along very well.

"The examination of witnesses lasted five or six hours. I then gave the case to the jury, stating the questions of fact upon which they were to render their verdict. They retired for an hour and then returned, when the foreman handed in their verdict, which was clear and explicit, though the case itself was rather complicated. To this verdict both parties bowed without a word of dissent. The inhabitants who witnessed the trial said it was what they liked, that there could be no bribery in it, that the opinion of twelve honest men should set the case forever at rest. And so it did, though neither party completely triumphed in the issue. One recovered his property, which had been taken from him by mistake, the other his character, which had been slandered by design."

The process of Americanizing the people was no easy undertaking. The population of the country and its laws were in a chaotic condition. It was an arduous task that Colonel Mason and the military commanders at the various pueblos had to perform, that of evolving order out of the chaos that had been brought about by the change in nations. The native population neither understood the language nor the customs of their new rules, and the newcomers among the Americans had very little toleration for the slow-going Mexican ways and methods they found prevailing. To keep peace between the factions required more tact than knowledge of law, military or civil, in the commanders.

Los Angeles, under Mexican domination, had been the storm center of revolutions, and here under the new régime the most difficulty was encountered in transforming the quondam revolutionists into law-abiding and peaceful American citizens. The ayuntamiento was convened in 1847, after the conquest, and continued in power until the close of the year. When the time came round for the election of a new ayuntamiento there was trouble. Stephen C. Foster, Colonel Stevenson's interpreter, submitted a paper to the council stating that the government had authorized him to get up a register of voters. The ayuntamiento voted to return the paper just as it was received. Then the colonel made a demand of the council to assist Stephen in compiling a register of voters. Regidor Chavez took the floor and said such a register should not be gotten up under the auspices of the military, but, since the government had so disposed, thereby outraging this honorable body, no attention should be paid to said communication. But the council decided that the matter did not amount to much, so they granted the request, much to the disgust of Chavez. The election was held and a new ayuntamiento elected. At the last meeting of the old council, December 29, 1847, Colonel Stevenson addressed a note to it requesting that Stephen C. Foster be recognized as first alcalde and judge of the first instance. The council decided to turn the whole business over to its successor, to deal with as it sees fit.

Colonel Stevenson's request was made in accordance with the wish of Governor Mason that a part of the civil offices be filled by Americans. The new ayuntamiento resented the interference. How the matter terminated is best told in Stephen C. Foster's own words: "Colonel Stevenson was determined to have our inauguration done in style. So on the day appointed, January 1, 1848, he, together with myself and colleague, escorted by a guard of soldiers, proceeded from the colonel's quarters to the alcalde's office. There we found the retiring ayuntamiento and the new one awaiting our arrival. The oath of office was administered by the retiring first alcalde. We knelt to take the oath, when we found they had changed their minds, and the alcalde told us that if two of their number were to be kicked out they would all go. So they all marched out and left us in possession. Here was a dilemma, but Colonel Stevenson was equal to the emergency. He said he could give us a swear as well as the alcalde. So we stood up and he administered to us an oath to support the constitution of the United States and administer justice in accordance with Mexican law. I then knew as much about Mexican law as I did about Chinese, and my colleague knew as much as I did. Guerrero gathered up the books that pertained to his office and took them to his house, where he established his office, and I took the archives and records across the street to a house I had rented, and there I was duly installed for the next seventeen months, the first American alcalde and carpet-bagger in Los Angeles."

Colonel Stevenson issued a call for the election of a new ayuntamiento, but the people stayed at home and no votes were cast. At the close of the year the voters had gotten over their pet and when a call was made a council was elected, but only Californians (hijos del pais) were returned. The ayuntamientos continued to be the governing power in the pueblos until superseded by city and county governments in 1850.

The most difficult problem that General Kearny in his short term had to confront and, unsolved, he handed down to his successor, Colonel Mason, was the authority and jurisdiction of the alcaldes. Under the Mexican régime these officers were supreme in the pueblo over which they ruled. For the Spanish transgressor fines of various degrees were the usual penalty; for the mission neophyte, the lash, well laid on, and labor in the chain gang. There was no written code that defined the amount of punishment; the alcalde meted out justice and sometimes injustice, as suited his humor. Kearny appointed John H. Nash alcalde of Sonoma. Nash was a somewhat erratic individual, who had taken part in the Bear Flag revolution. When the offices of the prospective Pacific Republic were divided among the revolutionists, he was to be the chief justice. After the collapse of that short-lived republic, Nash was elected alcalde. His rule was so arbitrary and his decisions so biased by favoritism or prejudice that the American settlers soon protested and General Kearny removed him or tried to. He appointed L. W. Boggs, a recently arrived immigrant, to the office. Nash refused to surrender the books and papers of the office. Lieut. W. T. Sherman was detailed by Colonel Mason, after his succession to the office of governor, to proceed to Sonoma and arrest Nash. Sherman quietly arrested him at night and before the bellicose alcalde's friends (for he had quite a following) were aware of what was going on, marched him off to San Francisco. He was put on board the Dale and sent to Monterey. Finding that it was useless for him to resist the authority of the United States, its army and navy as well, Nash expressed his willingness to submit to the inevitable, and surrendered his office. He was released and ceased from troubling.⁸ Another strenuous alcalde was William Blackburn, of Santa Cruz. He came to the country in 1845, and before his elevation to the honorable position of a judge of the first instance he had been engaged in making shingles in the redwoods. He had no knowledge of law and but little acquaintance with books of any kind. His decisions were always on the side of justice, although some of the penalties imposed were somewhat irregular.

In Alcalde Blackburn's docket for August 14, 1847, appears this entry: "Pedro Gomez was tried for the murder of his wife, Barbara Gomez, and found guilty. The sentence of the court is that the prisoner be conducted back to prison, there to remain until Monday, the 16th of August, and then be taken out and shot." August 17, sentence carried into effect on the 16th accordingly. WILLIAM BLACKBURN, Alcalde.

It does not appear in the records that Blackburn was the executioner. He proceeded to dispose of the two orphaned children of the murderer. The older daughter he indentured to Jacinto Castro "to raise until she is twenty-one years of age, unless sooner married, said Jacinto Castro, obligating himself to give her a good education, three cows and calves at her marriage or when of age." The younger daughter was disposed of on similar terms to A. Rodriguez. Colonel Mason severely reprimanded Blackburn, but the alcalde replied that there was no use making a fuss over it; the man was guilty, he had a fair trial before a jury and deserved to die. Another case in his court illustrates the versatility of the judge. A Spanish boy, out of revenge, sheared the mane and tail of a neighbor's horse. The offense was proved, but the judge was sorely perplexed when he came to sentence the culprit. He could find no law in his law books to fit the case. After pondering over the question a while, he gave this decision: "I find no law in any of the statutes to fit this case, except in the law of Moses, 'An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth.' Let the prisoner be taken out in front of this office and there sheared close." The sentence was immediately executed.

Another story is told of Blackburn, which may or may not be true. A mission Indian who had committed murder took the right of sanctuary in the church, and the padre refused to give him up. Blackburn wrote to the governor, stating the case. The Indian, considering himself safe while with the padre, left the church in company with the priest. Blackburn seized him, tried him and hung him. He then reported to the governor: "I received your order to suspend the execution of the condemned man, but I had hung him. When I see you I will explain the affair."

Some of the military commanders of the presidios and pueblos gave Governor Mason as much trouble as the alcaldes. These, for the most part, were officers of the volunteers who had arrived after the conquest. They were unused to "war's alarms," and, being new to the country and ignorant of the Spanish language, they regarded the natives with suspicion. They were on the lookout for plots and revolutions. Sometimes they found these incubating and undertook to crush them, only to discover that the affair was a hoax or a practical joke. The Cañon Perdido (lost cañon) of Santa Barbara episode is a good illustration of the trouble one "finicky" man can make when entrusted with military power.

In the winter of 1847-48 the American bark Elisabeth was wrecked on the Santa Barbara coast. Among the flotsam of the wreck was a brass cannon of uncertain calibre; it might have been a six, a nine or a twelve pounder. What the capacity of its bore matters not, for the gun unloaded made more noise in Santa Barbara than it ever did when it belched forth shot and shell in battle. The gun, after its rescue from a watery grave, lay for some time on the beach, devoid of carriage and useless, apparently, for offense or defense.

One dark night a little squad of native Californians stole down to the beach, loaded the gun in an ox cart, hauled it to the estero and hid it in the sands. What was their object in taking the gun no one knows. Perhaps they did not know themselves. It might come handy in a revolution, or maybe they only intended to play a practical joke on the gringos. Whatever their object, the outcome of their prank must have astonished them. There was a company (F) of Stevenson's New York volunteers stationed at Santa Barbara, under command of Captain Lippett. Lippett was a fussy, nervous individual who lost his head when anything unusual occurred. In the theft of the cannon he thought he had discovered a California revolution in the formative stages, and he determined to crush it in its infancy. He sent post haste a courier to Governor Mason at Monterey, informing him of the prospective uprising of the natives and the possible destruction of the troops at Santa Barbara by the terrible gun the enemy had stolen.

Colonel Mason, relying on Captain Lippett's report, determined to give the natives a lesson that would teach them to let guns and revolutions alone. He issued an order from headquarters at Monterey, in which he said that ample time having been allowed for the return of the gun, and the citizens having failed to produce it, he ordered that the town be laid under a contribution of $500, assessed in the following manner: A capitation tax of $2 on all males over twenty years of age; the balance to be paid by the heads of families and property-holders in the proportion of the value of their respective real and personal estate in the town of Santa Barbara and vicinity. Col. J. D. Stevenson was appointed to direct the appraisement of the property and the collection of the assessment. If any failed to pay his capitation, enough of his property was to be seized and sold to pay his enforced contribution.

The promulgation of the order at Santa Barbara raised a storm of indignation at the old pueblo. Colonel Stevenson came up from Los Angeles and had an interview with Don Pablo de La Guerra, a leading citizen of Santa Barbara. Don Pablo was wrathfully indignant at the insult put upon his people, but after talking over the affair with Colonel Stevenson, he became somewhat mollified. He invited Colonel Stevenson to make Santa Barbara his headquarters and inquired about the brass band at the lower pueblo. Stevenson took the hint and ordered up the band from Los Angeles. July 4th had been fixed upon as the day for the payment of the fines, doubtless with the idea of giving the Californians a little celebration that would remind them hereafter of Liberty's natal day. Colonel Stevenson contrived to have the band reach Santa Barbara on the night of the 3d. The band astonished Don Pablo and his family with a serenade. The Don was so delighted that he hugged the colonel in the most approved style. The band serenaded all the Dons of note in town and tooted until long after midnight, then started in next morning and kept it up till ten o'clock, the time set for each man to contribute his "dos pesos" to the common fund. By that time every hombre on the list was so filled with wine, music and patriotism that the greater portion of the fine was handed over without protest. The day closed with a grand ball. The beauty and the chivalry of Santa Barbara danced to the music of a gringo brass band and the brass cannon for the nonce was forgotten.

But the memory of the city's ransom rankled, and although an American band played Spanish airs, American injustice was still remembered. When the city's survey was made in 1850 the nomenclature of three streets, Cañon Perdido (Lost Cannon street), Quinientos (Five Hundred street) and Mason street kept the cannon episode green in the memory of the Barbareños. When the pueblo, by legislative act, became a ciudad, the municipal authorities selected this device for a seal: In the center a cannon emblazoned, encircled with these words, Vale Quinientos Pesos—Worth $500, or, more liberally translated, Good-bye, $500, which, by the way, as the sequel of the story will show, is the better translation. This seal was used from the incorporation of the city in 1850 to 1860, when another design was chosen.

After peace was declared, Colonel Mason sent the $500 to the prefect at Santa Barbara, with instructions to use it in building a city jail; and although there was pressing need for a jail, the jail was not built. The prefect's needs were pressing, too. Several years passed; then the city council demanded that the prefect turn the money into the city treasury. He replied that the money was entrusted to him for a specific purpose, and he would trust no city treasurer with it. The fact was that long before he had lost it in a game of monte.

Ten years passed, and the episode of the lost cannon was but a dimly remembered story of the olden time. The old gun reposed peacefully in its grave of sand and those who buried it had forgotten the place of its interment. One stormy night in December, 1858, the estero (creek) cut a new channel to the ocean. In the morning, as some Barbareños were surveying the changes caused by the flood, they saw the muzzle of a large gun protruding from the cut in the bank. They unearched it, cleaned off the sand and discovered that it was El Cañon Perdido, the lost cannon. It was hauled up State street to Cañon Perdido, where it was mounted on an improvised carriage. But the sight of it was a reminder of an unpleasant incident. The finders sold it to a merchant for $80. He shipped it to San Francisco and sold it at a handsome profit for old brass.

Governor Pio Pico returned from Mexico to California, arriving at San Gabriel July 17, 1848. Although the treaty of peace between the United States and Mexico had been signed and proclaimed, the news had not reached California. Pico, from San Fernando, addressed letters to Colonel Stevenson at Los Angeles and Governor Mason at Monterey, stating that as Mexican governor of California he had come back to the country with the object of carrying out the armistice which then existed between the United States and Mexico. He further stated that he had no desire to impede the establishment of peace between the two countries; and that he wished to see the Mexicans and Americans treat each other in a spirit of fraternity. Mason did not like Pico's assumption of the title of Mexican governor of California, although it is not probable that Pico intended to assert any claim to his former position. Governor Mason sent a special courier to Los Angeles with orders to Colonel Stevenson to arrest the ex-governor, who was then at his Santa Margarita rancho, and send him to Monterey, but the news of the ratification of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo reached Los Angeles before the arrest was made, and Pico was spared this humiliation.

The treaty of peace between the United States and Mexico was signed at Guadalupe Hidalgo, a hamlet a few miles from the City of Mexico, February 2, 1848; ratifications were exchanged at Queretaro, May 30 following, and a proclamation that peace had been established between the two countries was published July 4, 1848. Under this treaty the United States assumed the payment of the claims of American citizens against Mexico, and paid, in addition, $15,000,000 to Mexico for Texas, New Mexico and Alta California. Out of what was the Mexican territory of Alta California there has been carved all of California, all of Nevada, Utah and Arizona and part of Colorado and Wyoming. The territory acquired by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo was nearly equal to the aggregated area of the thirteen original states at the time of the Revolutionary war.

The news of the treaty of peace reached California August 6, 1848. On the 7th Governor Mason issued a proclamation announcing the ratification of the treaty. He announced that all residents of California, who wished to become citizens of the United States, were absolved from their allegiance to Mexico. Those who desired to retain their Mexican citizenship could do so, provided they signified such intention within one year from May 30, 1848. Those who wished to go to Mexico were at liberty to do so without passports. Six months before, Governor Mason had issued a proclamation prohibiting any citizen of Sonora from entering California except on official business, and then only under flag of truce. He also required all Sonorans in the country to report themselves either at Los Angeles or Monterey.

The war was over; and the treaty of peace had made all who so elected, native or foreign born, American citizens. Strict military rule was relaxed and the people henceforth were to be self-governing. American and Californian were one people and were to enjoy the same rights and to be subject to the same penalties. The war ended, the troops were no longer needed. Orders were issued to muster out the volunteers. These all belonged to Stevenson's New York regiment. The last company of the Mormon battalion had been discharged in April.

The New York volunteers were scattered all along the coast from Sonoma to Cape St. Lucas, doing garrison duty. They were collected at different points and mustered out. Although those stationed in Alta California had done no fighting, they had performed arduous service in keeping peace in the conquered territory. Most of them remained in California after their discharge and rendered a good account of themselves as citizens.

CHAPTER XXIII.

GOLD! GOLD! GOLD!

SEBASTIAN VISCAINO, from the bay of Monterey, writing to the King of Spain three hundred years ago, says of the Indians of California: "They are well acquainted with gold and silver, and said that these were found in the interior." Viscaino was endeavoring to make a good impression on the mind of the king in regard to his discoveries, and the remark about the existence of gold and silver in California was thrown to excite the cupidity of his Catholic majesty. The traditions of the existence of gold in California before any was discovered are legion. Most of these have been evolved since gold was actually found. Col. J. J. Warner, a pioneer of 1831, in his Historical Sketch of Los Angeles County, briefly and very effectually disposes of these rumored discoveries. He says: "While statements respecting the existence of gold in the earth of California and its procurement therefrom have been made and published as historical facts, carrying back the date of the knowledge of the auriferous character of this state as far as the time of the visit of Sir Francis Drake to this coast, there is no evidence to be found in the written or oral history of the missions, the acts and correspondence of the civil or military officers, or in the unwritten and traditional history of Upper California that the existence of gold, either with ores or in its virgin state, was ever suspected by any inhabitant of California previous to 1841, and, furthermore, there is conclusive testimony that the first known grain of native gold dust was found upon or near the San Francisco ranch, about forty-five miles north-westerly from Los Angeles City, in the month of June, 1841. This discovery consisted of grain gold fields (known as placer mines), and the auriferous fields discovered in that year embraced the greater part of the country drained by the Santa Clara river from a point some fifteen or twenty miles from its mouth to its source, and easterly beyond Mount San Bernardino."

The story of the discovery as told by Warner and by Don Abel Stearns agrees in the main facts, but differing materially in the date. Stearns says gold was first discovered by Francisco Lopez, a native of California, in the month of March, 1842, at a place called San Francisquito, about thirty-five miles northwest from this city (Los Angeles). The circumstances of the discovery by Lopez, as related by himself, are as follows: "Lopez, with a companion, was out in search of some stray horses, and about midday they stopped under some trees and tied their horses out to feed, they resting under the shade, when Lopez, with his sheath-knife, dug up some wild onions, and in the dirt discovered a piece of gold, and, searching further, found some more. He brought these to town, and showed them to his friends, who at once declared there must be a placer of gold. This news being circulated, numbers of the citizens went to the place, and commenced prospecting in the neighborhood, and found it to be a fact that there was a placer of gold."

Colonel Warner says: "The news of this discovery soon spread among the inhabitants from Santa Barbara to Los Angeles, and in a few weeks hundreds of people were engaged in washing and winnowing the sands and earth of these gold fields."

Warner visited the mines a few weeks after their discovery. He says: "From these mines was obtained the first parcel of California gold dust received at the United States mint in Philadelphia, and which was sent with Alfred Robinson, and went in a merchant ship around Cape Horn." This shipment of gold was 18.34 ounces before and 18.1 ounces after melting; fineness, .925; value, $344.75, or over $19 to the ounce, a very superior quality of gold dust. It was deposited in the mint July 8, 1843.

It may be regarded as a settled historical fact that the first authenticated discovery of gold in Alta California was made on the San Francisco rancho in the San Feliciano Cañon, Los Angeles county. This cañon is about ten miles northwest of Newhall station on the Southern Pacific railroad, and about forty miles northwest of Los Angeles.

The date of the discovery is in doubt. A petition to the governor (Alvarado) asking permission to work the placers, signed by Francisco Lopez, Manuel Cota and Domingo Bermudez is on file in the California archives. It recites: "That as Divine Providence was pleased to give us a placer of gold on the 9th of last March in the locality of San Francisco rancho, that belongs to the late Don Antonio del Valle." This petition fixes the day of the month the discovery was made, but unfortunately omits all other dates. The evidence is about equally divided between the years 1841 and 1842.

It is impossible to obtain definite information in regard to the yield of the San Fernando placers, as these mines are generally called. William Heath Davis, in his "Sixty Years in California," states that from $80,000 to $100,000 was taken out for the first two years after their discovery. He says that Mellus at one time shipped $5,000 of dust on the ship Alert. Bancroft says: "That by December, 1843, two thousand ounces of gold had been taken from the San Fernando mines." Don Antonio Coronel informed the author that he, with the assistance of three Indian laborers, in 1842, took out $600 worth of dust in two months. De Mofras, in his book, states that Carlos Baric, a Frenchman, in 1842, was obtaining an ounce a day of pure gold from his placer.

These mines were worked continuously from the time of their discovery until the American conquest, principally by Sonorians. The discovery of gold at Coloma, January 24, 1848, drew away the miners, and no work was done on these mines between 1848 and 1854. After the latter dates work was resumed, and in 1855, Francisco Garcia, working a gang of Indians, is reported to have taken out $65,000 in one season. The mines are not exhausted, but the scarcity of water prevents working them profitably.

It is rather a singular coincidence that the exact dates of both the first and second authenticated discoveries of gold in California are still among the undecided questions of history. In the first, we know the day but not the year; in the second, we know the year but not the day of the month on which Marshall picked up the first nuggets in the millrace at Coloma. For a number of years after the anniversary of Marshall's discovery began to be observed the 19th of January was celebrated. Of late years January 24 has been fixed upon as the correct date, but the Associated Pioneers of the Territorial Days of California, an association made up of men who were in the territory at the time of Marshall's discovery or came here before it became a state, object to the change. For nearly thirty years they have held their annual dinners on January 18, "the anniversary of the discovery of gold at Sutter's sawmill, Coloma, Cal." This society has its headquarters in New York City. In a circular recently issued, disapproving of the change of date from the 18th to the 24th, the trustees of that society say: "Upon the organization of this society, February 11, 1875, it was decided to hold its annual dinners on the anniversary of the discovery of gold at Sutter's sawmill, Coloma, Cal. Through the Hon. Newton Booth, of the United States Senate, this information was sought, with the result of a communication from the secretary of the state of California to the effect 'that the archives of the state of California recorded the date as of January 18, 1848. Some years ago this date was changed by the society at San Francisco to that of January 24, and that date has been adopted by other similar societies located upon the Pacific and Atlantic coasts. This society took the matter under advisement, with the result that the new evidence upon which it was proposed to change the date was not deemed sufficient to justify this society in ignoring its past records, founded on the authority of the state of California; therefore it has never accepted the new date.'

Marshall himself was uncertain about the exact date. At various times he gave three different dates—the 18th, 19th and 20th, but never moved it along as far as the 24th. In the past thirty years three different dates—the 18th, 19th and 24th of January—have been celebrated as the anniversary of Marshall's gold discovery.

The evidence upon which the date was changed to the 24th is found in an entry in a diary kept by H. W. Bigler, a Mormon, who was working for Marshall on the millrace at the time gold was discovered. The entry reads: "January 24. This day some kind of metal that looks like gold was found in the tailrace." On this authority about ten years ago the California Pioneers adopted the 24th as the correct date of Marshall's discovery.

While written records, especially if made at the time of the occurrence of the event, are more reliable than oral testimony given long after, yet when we take into consideration the conflicting stories of Sutter, Marshall, the Winners and others who were immediately concerned in some way with the discovery, we must concede that the Territorial Pioneers have good reasons to hesitate about making a change in the date of their anniversary. In Dr. Trywhitt Brook's "Four Months Among the Gold Finders," a book published in London in 1849, and long since out of print, we have Sutter's version of Marshall's discovery given only three months after that discovery was made: Dr. Brooks visited Sutter's Fort early in May, 1848, and received from Sutter himself the story of the find. Sutter stated that he was sitting in his room at the fort, one afternoon, when Marshall, whom he supposed to be at the mill, forty miles up the American river, suddenly burst in upon him. Marshall was so wildly excited that Sutter, suspecting that he, was crazy, looked to see whether his rifle was in reach. Marshall declared that he had made a discovery that would give them both millions and millions of dollars. Then he drew his sack and poured out a handful of nuggets on the table. Sutter, when he had tested the metal and found that it was gold, became almost as excited as Marshall. He eagerly asked if the workmen at the mill knew of the discovery. Marshall declared that he had not spoken to a single person about it. They both agreed to keep it secret. Next day Sutter and Marshall arrived at the sawmill. The day after their arrival, they prospected the bars of the river and the channels of some of the dry creeks and found gold in all.

"On our return to the mill," says Sutter, "we were astonished by the work-people coming up to us in a body and showing us some flakes of gold similar to those we had ourselves procured. Marshall tried to laugh the matter off with them, and to persuade them that what they had found was only some shining mineral of trifling value; but one of the Indians, who had worked at a gold mine in the neighborhood of La Paz, Lower California, cried out: 'Ora! Ora!' (gold! gold!), and the secret was out."

Captain Sutter continues: "I heard afterward that one of them, a sly Kentuckian, had dogged us about and, that, looking on the ground to see if he could discover what we were in search of, he lighted on some of the flakes himself."

If this account is correct, Bigler's entry in his diary was made on the day that the workmen found gold, which was five or six days after Marshall's first find, and consequently the 24th is that much too late for the true date of the discovery. The story of the discovery given in the "Life and Adventures of James W. Marshall," by George Frederick Parsons, differs materially from Sutter's account. The date of the discovery given in that book is January 19, 1848. On the morning of that day Marshall, after shutting off the water, walked down the tailrace to see what sand and gravel had been removed during the night. (The water was turned into the tailrace during the night to cut it deeper.) While examining a mass of debris, "his eye caught the glitter of something that lay lodged in a crevice on a rille of soft granite some six inches under water." Picking up the nugget and examining it, he became satisfied that it must be one of three substances—mica, sulphurets of copper, or gold. Its weight satisfied him that it was not mica. Knowing that gold was malleable, he placed the specimen on a flat rock and struck it with another; it bent, but did not crack or break. He was satisfied that it was gold. He showed the nugget to his men. In the course of a few days he had collected several ounces of precious metal. "Some four days after the discovery it became necessary for him to go below, for Sutter had failed to send a supply of provisions to the mill, and the men were on short commons. While on his way down he discovered gold in a ravine at a place afterwards known as Mormon island. Arrived at the fort, he interviewed Sutter in his private office and showed him about three ounces of gold nuggets. Sutter did not believe it to be gold, but after weighing it in scales against $3.25 worth of silver, all the coin they could raise at the fort, and testing it with nitric acid obtained from the gun shop, Sutter became convinced and returned to the mill with Marshall. So little did the workmen at the mill value the discovery that they continued to work for Sutter until the mill was completed, March 11, six weeks after the nuggets were found in the tailrace.

The news of the discovery spread slowly. It was two months in reaching San Francisco, although the distance is not over one hundred and twenty-five miles. The great rush to the mines from San Francisco did not begin until the middle of May, nearly four months after the discovery. On the 10th of May, Dr. Brooks, who was in San Francisco, writes: "A number of people have actually started off with shovels, mattocks and pans to dig the gold themselves. It is not likely, however, that this will be allowed, for Captain Folsom has already written to Colonel Mason about taking possession of the mine on behalf of the government, it being, he says, on public land."

As the people began to realize the richness and extent of the discovery, the excitement increased rapidly. May 17, Dr. Brooks writes: "This place (San Francisco) is now in a perfect furore of excitement; all the workpeople have struck. Walking through the town to-day, I observed that laborers were employed only upon about half a dozen of the fifty new buildings which were in course of being run up. The majority of the mechanics at this place are making preparations for moving off to the mines, and several people of all classes—lawyers, store-keepers, merchants, etc., are smitten with the fever; in fact, there is a regular gold mania springing up. I counted no less than eighteen houses which were closed, the owners having left. If Colonel Mason is moving a force to the American Fork, as is reported here, their journey will be in vain."

Colonel Mason's soldiers moved without orders—they nearly all deserted, and ran off to the mines.

The first newspaper announcement of the discovery appeared in The Californian of March 15, 1848, nearly two months after the discovery. But little attention was paid to it. In the issue of April 19, another discovery is reported. The item reads: "New gold mine. It is stated that a new gold mine has been discovered on the American Fork of the Sacramento, supposed to be on the land of W. A. Leidesdorff, of this place. A specimen of the gold has been exhibited, and is represented to be very pure." On the 29th of May, The Californian had suspended publication. "Othello's occupation is gone," wails the editor. "The majority of our subscribers and many of our advertising patrons have closed their doors and places of business and left town, and we have received one order after another conveying the pleasant request that the printer will please stop my paper or my ad, as I am about leaving for Sacramento."

The editor of the other paper, The California Star, made a pilgrimage to the mines in the latter part of April, but gave them no extended write-up. "Great country, fine climate," he wrote on his return. "Full flowing streams, mighty timber, large crops, luxuriant clover, fragrant flowers, gold and silver," were his comments on what he saw. The policy of both papers seems to have been to ignore as much as possible the gold discovery. To give it publicity was for a time, at least, to lose their occupation.

In The Star of May 20, 1848, its eccentric editor, E. C. Kemble, under the caption "El Dorado Anew," discourses in a dubious manner upon the effects of the discovery and the extent of the gold fields: "A terrible visitant we have had of late. A fever which has well-nigh depopulated a town, a town hard pressing upon a thousand souls, and but for the gracious interposition of the elements, perhaps not a goose would have been spared to furnish a quill to pen the melancholy fate of the remainder. It has preyed upon defenseless old age, subdued the elasticity of careless youth and attacked indiscriminately sex and class, from town councilman to tow-frocked cartman, from tailor to tippler, of which, thank its pestilential powers, it has beneficially drained (of tipplers, we mean) every villainous pulperia in the place.

"And this is the gold fever, the only form of that popular southerner, yellow jack, with which we can be alarmingly threatened. The insatiate maw of the monster, not appeased by the easy conquest of the rough-fisted yeomanry of the north, must needs ravage a healthy, prosperous place beyond his dominion and turn the town topsy-turvy in a twinkling.

"A fleet of launches left this place on Sunday and Monday last bound up the Sacramento river, close stowed with human beings, led by love of filthy lucre to the perennial yielding gold mines of the north. When any man can find two ounces a day and two thousand men can find their hands full, of work, was there ever anything so superlatively silly!

"Honestly, though, we are inclined to believe the reputed wealth of that section of country, thirty miles in extent, all sham, a superb take-in as was ever got up to guzzle the gullible. But it is not improbable that this mine, or, properly, placer of gold can be traced as far south as the city of Los Angeles, where the precious metal has been found for a number of years in the bed of a stream issuing from its mountains, said to be a continuation of this gold chain which courses southward from the base of the snowy mountains. But our best information respecting the metal and the quantity in which it is gathered varies much from many reports current, yet it is beyond a question that no richer mines of gold have ever been discovered upon this continent.

"Should there be no paper forthcoming on Saturday next, our readers may assure themselves it will not be the fault of us individually. To make the matter public, already our devil has rebelled, our pressman (poor fellow) last seen was in search of a pickaxe, and we feel like Mr. Hamlet, we shall never again look upon the likes of him. Then, too, our compositors have, in defiance, sworn terrible oaths against type-sticking as vulgar and unfashionable. Hope has not yet fled us, but really, in the phraseology of the day, 'things is getting curious.'"

And things kept getting more and more curious. The rush increased. The next issue of The Star (May 27) announces that the Sacramento, a first-class craft, left here Thursday last thronged with passengers for the gold mines, a motley assemblage, composed of lawyers, merchants, grocers, carpenters, cartmen and cooks, all possessed with the desire of becoming rich. The latest accounts from the gold country are highly flattering. Over three hundred men are engaged in washing gold, and numbers are continually arriving from every part of the country. Then the editor closes with a wail: "Persons recently arrived from the country speak of ranches deserted and crops neglected and suffered to waste. The unhappy consequence of this state of affairs is easily foreseen. One more twinkle, and The Star disappeared in the gloom. On June 14 appeared a single sheet, the size of foolscap. The editor announced: "In fewer words than are usually employed in the announcement of similar events, we appear before the remnant of a reading community on this occasion with the material or immaterial information that we have stopped the paper, that its publication ceased with the last regular issue (June 7). On the approach of autumn, we shall again appear to announce The Star's reditus. We have done. Let our parting word be hasto luego." (Star and Californian reappeared November 14, 1848. The Star had absorbed The Californian. E. C. Kemble was its editor and proprietor.)

Although there was no paper in existence on the coast to spread the news from the gold fields, it found its way out of California, and the rush from abroad began. It did not acquire great force in 1848, but in 1849 the immigration to California exceeded all previous migrations in the history of the race.

Among the first foreigners to rush to the mines were the Mexicans of Sonora. Many of these had had some experience in placer mining in their native country, and the report of rich placers in California, where gold could be had for the picking up, aroused them from their lazy self-content and stimulated them to go in search of it. Traveling in squads of from fifty to one hundred, they came by the old Auza trail across the Colorado desert, through the San Gorgonio Pass, then up the coast and on to the mines. They were a job lot of immigrants, poor in purse and poor in brain. They were despised by the native Californians and maltreated by the Americans. Their knowledge of mining came in play, and the more provident among them soon managed to pick up a few thousand dollars, and then returned to their homes, plutocrats. The improvident gambled away their earnings and remained in the country to add to its criminal element. The Oregonians came in force, and all the towns in California were almost depopulated of their male population. By the close of 1848, there were ten thousand men at work in the mines.

The first official report of the discovery was sent to Washington by Thomas O. Larkin, June 1, and reached its destination about the middle of September. Lieutenant Beale, by way of Mexico, brought dispatches dated a month later, which arrived about the same time as Larkin's report. These accounts were published in the eastern papers, and the excitement began.

In the early part of December, Lieutenant Loeser arrived at Washington with Governor Mason's report of his observations in the mines made in August. But the most positive evidence was a tea caddy of gold dust containing about two hundred and thirty ounces that Governor Mason had caused to be purchased in the mines with money from the civil service fund. This the lieutenant had brought with him. It was placed on exhibition at the war office. Here was tangible evidence of the existence of gold in California, the doubters were silenced and the excitement was on and the rush began.

By the 1st of January, 1849, vessels were fitting out in every seaport on the Atlantic coast and the Gulf of Mexico. Sixty ships were announced to sail from New York in February and seventy from Philadelphia and Boston. All kinds of crafts were pressed into the service, some to go by way of Cape Horn, others to land their passengers at Vera Cruz, Nicaragua and Panama, the voyagers to take their chances on the Pacific side for a passage on some unknown vessel.

With opening of spring, the overland travel began. Forty thousand men gathered at different points on the Missouri river, but principally at St. Joseph and Independence. Horses, mules, oxen and cows were used for the propelling power of the various forms of vehicles that were to convey the provisions and other impedimenta of the army of gold seekers. By the 1st of May the grass was grown enough on the plains to furnish feed for the stock, and the vanguard of the grand army of gold hunters started. For two months, company after company left the rendezvous and joined the procession until for one thousand miles there was an almost unbroken line of wagons and pack trains. The first half of the journey was made with little inconvenience, but on the last part there was great suffering and loss of life. The cholera broke out among them, and it is estimated that five thousand died on the plains. The alkali desert of the Humboldt was the place where the immigrants suffered most. Exhausted by the long journey and weakened by lack of food, many succumbed under the hardship of the desert journey and died. The crossing of the Sierras was attended with great hardships. From the loss of their horses and oxen, many were compelled to cross the mountains on foot. Their provisions exhausted, they would have perished but for relief sent out from California. The greatest sufferers were the woman and children, who in considerable numbers made the perilous journey.

The overland immigration of 1850 exceeded that of 1849. According to record kept at Fort Laramie, there passed that station during the season thirty-nine thousand men, two thousand five hundred women and six hundred children, making a total of forty-two thousand one hundred persons. These immigrants had with them when passing Fort Laramie twenty-three thousand horses, eight thousand mules, three thousand six hundred oxen, seven thousand cows and nine thousand wagons.

Besides those coming by the northern route, that is by the South Pass and the Humboldt river, at least ten thousand found their way to the land of gold by the old Spanish trail, by the Gila route and by Texas, Coahuila and Chihuahua into Arizona, and thence across the Colorado desert to Los Angeles, and from there by the coast route or the San Joaquin valley to the mines.

The Pacific Mail Steamship Company had been organized before the discovery of gold in California. March 3, 1847, an act of Congress was passed authorizing the secretary of the navy to advertise for bids to carry the United States mails by one line of steamers between New York and Chagres, and by another line between Panama and Astoria, Ore. On the Atlantic side the contract called for five ships of one thousand five hundred tons burden, on the Pacific side two of one thousand tons each, and one of six hundred tons. These were deemed sufficient for the trade and travel between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of the United States. The Pacific Mail Steamship Company was incorporated April 12, 1848, with a capital stock of $500,000. October 6, 1848, the California, the first steamer for the Pacific, sailed from New York, and was followed in the two succeeding months by the Oregon and the Panama. The California sailed before the news of the gold discovery had reached New York, and she had taken no passengers. When she arrived at Panama, January 30, 1849, she encountered a rush of fifteen hundred gold hunters, clamorous for a passage. These had reached Chagres on sailing vessels, and ascended the Chagres river in bongos or dugouts to Gorgona, and from thence by land to Panama. The California had accommodations for only one hundred, but four hundred managed to find some place to stow themselves away. The price of tickets rose to a fabulous sum, as high as $1,000 having been paid for a steerage passage. The California entered the bay of San Francisco February 28, 1849, and was greeted by the boom of cannon and the cheers of thousands of people lining the shores of the bay. The other two steamers arrived on time, and the Pacific Mail Steamship Company became the predominant factor in California travel for twenty years, or up to the completion of the first transcontinental railroad in 1869. The charges for fare on these steamers in the early '50s were prohibitory to men of small means. From New York to Chagres in the saloon the fare was $150, in the cabin $120. From Panama to San Francisco in the saloon, $250; cabin, $200. Add to these the expense of crossing the isthmus, and the argonaut was out a goodly sum when he reached the land of the golden fleece, indeed, he was often fleeced of his last dollar before he entered the Golden Gate.

The first effect of the gold discovery on San Francisco, as we have seen, was to depopulate it, and of necessity suspend all building operations. In less than three months the reaction began, and the city experienced one of the most magical booms in history. Real estate doubled in some instances in twenty-four hours. The Californian of September 3, 1848, says: "The vacant lot on the corner of Montgomery and Washington streets was offered the day previous for $5,000 and next day sold readily for $10,000." Lumber went up in value until it was sold at a dollar per square foot. Wages kept pace with the general advance. Sixteen dollars a day was mechanic's wages, and the labor market was not overstocked even at these high rates. With the approach of winter, the gold seekers came flocking back to the city to find shelter and to spend their suddenly acquired wealth. The latter was easily accomplished, but the former was more difficult. Any kind of a shelter that would keep out the rain was utilized for a dwelling. Rows of tents that circled around the business portion, shanties patched together from pieces of packing boxes and sheds thatched with brush from the chaparral-covered hills constituted the principal dwellings at that time of the future metropolis of California. The yield of the mines for 1848 has been estimated at ten million dollars. This was the result of only a few months' labor of not to exceed at any time ten thousand men. The rush of miners did not reach the mines until July, and mining operations were mainly suspended by the middle of October.

New discoveries had followed in quick succession Marshall's find at Coloma until by the close of 1848 gold placers had been located on all the principal tributaries of the Sacramento and San Joaquin rivers. Some of the richest yields were obtained from what was known as "Dry Diggins." These were dry ravines from which pay dirt had to be packed to water for washing or the gold separated by dry washing, tossing the earth into the air until it was blown away by the wind, the gold, on account of its weight, remaining in the pan.

A correspondent of the Californian, writing August 15, 1848, from what he designates as "Dry Diggins," gives this account of the richness of that gold field: "At the lower mines (Mormon Island) the miners count the success of the day in dollars; at the upper mines near the mill (Coloma), in ounces, and here in pounds. The only instrument used at first was a butcher knife, and the demand for that article was so great that $40 has been refused for one.

"The earth is taken out of the ravines which make out of the mountains and is carried in wagons or packed on horses from one to three miles to water and washed. Four hundred dollars is the average to the cart load. In one instance five loads yielded $16,000. Instances are known here where men have carried the earth on their backs and collected from $800 to $1,500 a day."

The rapidity with which the country was explored by prospectors was truly remarkable. The editor of the Californian, who had suspended the publication of his paper on May 29 to visit the mines, returned and resumed it on July 15 (1848). In an editorial in that issue he gives his observations: "The country from the Ajuba (Yuba) to the San Joaquin rivers, a distance of one hundred and twenty miles, and from the base toward the summit of the mountains as far as Snow Hill, about seventy miles, has been explored, and gold found in every part. There are probably three thousand men, including Indians, engaged in collecting gold. The amount collected by each man who works ranges from $10 to $350 per day. The publisher of this paper, while on a tour alone to the mining district, collected, with the aid of a shovel, pick and pan, from $44 to $128 a day, averaging about $100. The largest piece of gold known to be found weighed four pounds." Among other remarkable yields the Californian reports these: "One man dug $12,000 in six days, and three others obtained thirty-six pounds of pure metal in one day."

CHAPTER XXIV.

MAKING A STATE.

COL. R. B. MASON, who had been the military governor of California since the departure of General Kearny in May, 1847, had grown weary of his task. He had been in the military service of his country thirty years and wished to be relieved. His request was granted, and on the 12th of April, 1849, Brevet Brigadier General Bennett Riley, his successor, arrived at Monterey and the next day entered upon his duties as civil governor. Gen. Persifer F. Smith, who had been appointed commander of the Pacific division of the United States army, arrived at San Francisco February 26, 1849, and relieved Colonel Mason of his military command. A brigade of troops six hundred and fifty strong had been sent to California for military service on the border and to maintain order. Most of these promptly deserted as soon as an opportunity offered and found their way to the mines.

Colonel Mason, who under the most trying circumstances had faithfully served his government and administered justice to the people of California, took his departure May 1, 1849. The same year he died at St. Louis of cholera.

A year had passed since the treaty of peace with Mexico had been signed, which made California United States territory, but Congress had done nothing toward giving it a government. The anomalous condition existed of citizens of the United States, living in the United States, being governed by Mexican laws administered by a mixed constituency of Mexican-born and American-born officials. The pro-slavery element in Congress was determined to foist the curse of human slavery on a portion of the territory acquired from Mexico, but the discovery of gold and the consequent rush of freemen to the territory had disarranged the plans of the slave-holding faction in Congress, and as a consequence all legislation was at a standstill.

The people were becoming restive at the long delay. The Americanized Mexican laws and forms of government were unpopular and it was humiliating to the conqueror to be governed by the laws of the people conquered. The question of calling a convention to form a provisional government was agitated by the newspapers and met a hearty response from the people. Meetings were held at San José, December 11, 1848; at San Francisco, December 21, and at Sacramento, January 6, 1849, to consider the question of establishing a provisional government. It was recommended by the San José meeting that a convention be held at that place on the second Monday of January. The San Francisco convention recommended the 5th of March; this the Monterey committee considered too early as it would take the delegates from below fifteen days to reach the pueblo of San José. There was no regular mail and the roads in February (when the delegates would have to start) were impassable. The committee recommended May 1 as the earliest date for the meeting to consider the question of calling of a convention. Sonoma, without waiting, took the initiative and elected ten delegates to a provisional government convention. There was no unanimity in regard to the time of meeting or as to what could be done if the convention met. It was finally agreed to postpone the time of meeting to the first Monday of August, when, if Congress had done nothing towards giving California some form of government better than that existing, the convention should meet and organize a provisional government.

The local government of San Francisco had become so entangled and mixed up by various councils that it was doubtful whether it had any legal legislative body. When the term of the first council, which had been authorized by Colonel Mason in 1848, was about to expire an election was held December 27, to choose their successors. Seven new councilmen were chosen. The old council declared the election fraudulent and ordered a new one. An election was held, notwithstanding the protest of a number of the best citizens, and another council chosen. So the city was blessed or cursed with three separate and distinct councils. The old council voted itself out of existence and then there were but two, but that was one too many. Then the people, disgusted with the condition of affairs, called a public meeting, at which it was decided to elect a legislative assembly of fifteen members, who should be empowered to make the necessary laws for the government of the city. An election was held on the 21st of February, 1849, and a legislative assembly and justices elected. Then Alcalde Levenworth refused to turn over the city records to the Chief Magistrate-elect Norton. On the 22d of March the legislative assembly abolished the office of alcalde, but Levenworth still held on to the records. He was finally compelled by public opinion and a writ of replevin to surrender the official records to Judge Norton. The confusion constantly arising from the attempt to carry on a government that was semi-military and semi-Mexican induced Governor Riley to order an election to be held August 1st, to elect delegates to a convention to meet in Monterey September 1st, 1849, to form a state constitution or territorial organization to be ratified by the people and submitted to Congress for its approval. Judges, prefects and alcaldes were to be elected at the same time in the principal municipal districts. The constitutional convention was to consist of thirty-seven delegates, apportioned as follows: San Diego two, Los Angeles four, Santa Barbara two, San Luis Obispo two, Monterey five, San José five, San Francisco five, Sonoma four, Sacramento four, and San Joaquin four. Instead of thirty-seven delegates as provided for in the call, forty-eight were elected and seated.

The convention met September 1, 1849, at Monterey in Colton Hall. This was a stone building erected by Alcalde Walter Colton for a town hall and school house. The money to build it was derived partly from fines and partly from subscriptions, the prisoners doing the greater part of the work. It was the most commodious public building at that time in the territory.

Of the forty-eight delegates elected twenty-two were natives of the northern states; fifteen of the slave states; four were of foreign birth, and seven were native Californians. Several of the latter neither spoke nor understood the English language and William E. P. Hartnell was appointed interpreter. Dr. Robert Semple of Bear Flag fame was elected president, William G. Marcy and J. Ross Browne reporters.

Early in the session the slavery question was disposed of by the adoption of a section declaring that neither slavery or involuntary servitude, unless for the punishment of crimes, shall ever be tolerated in this state. The question of fixing the boundaries of the future state excited the most discussion. The pro-slavery faction was led by William M. Gwin, who had a few months before migrated from Tennessee to California with the avowed purpose of representing the new state in the United States senate. The scheme of Gwin and his southern associates was to make the Rocky mountains the eastern boundary. This would create a state with an area of about four hundred thousand square miles. They reasoned that when the admission of the state came before congress the southern members would oppose the admission of so large an area under a free state constitution and that ultimately a compromise might be effected. California would be split in two from east to west, the old dividing line, the parallel of 36° 30', would be established and Southern California come into the Union as a slave state. There were at that time fifteen free and fifteen slave states. If two states, one free and one slave, could be made out of California, the equilibrium between the opposing factions would be maintained. The Rocky mountain boundary was at one time during the session adopted, but in the closing days of the session the free state men discovered Gwin's scheme and it was defeated. The present boundaries were established by a majority of two.

A committee had been appointed to receive propositions and designs for a state seal. Only one design was offered. It was presented by Caleb Lyon of Lyondale, as he usually signed his name, but was drawn by Major Robert S. Garnett, an army officer. It contained a figure of Minerva in the foreground, a grizzly bear feeding on a bunch of grapes; a miner with an uplifted pick; a gold rocker and pan; a view of the Golden Gate with ships riding at anchor in the Bay of San Francisco; the peaks of the Sierra Nevadas in the distance; a sheaf of wheat; thirty-one stars and above all the word "Eureka" (I have found it), which might apply either to the miner or the bear. The design seems to have been an attempt to advertise the resources of the state. General Vallejo wanted the bear taken out of the design, or if allowed to remain, that he be made fast by a lasso in the hands of a vaquero. This amendment was rejected, as was also one submitted by O. M. Wozencraft to strike out the figures of the gold digger and the bear and introduce instead bales of merchandise and bags of gold. The original design was adopted with the addition of the words, "The Great Seal of the State of California." The convention voted to give Lyon $1,000 as full compensation for engraving the seal and furnishing the press and all appendages.

Garnett, the designer of the seal, was a Virginian by birth. He graduated from West Point in 1841, served through the Mexican war and through several of the Indian wars on the Pacific coast. At the breaking out of the rebellion in 1861 he joined the Confederates and was made a brigadier general. He was killed at the battle of Carrick's Ford July 15, 1861.

The constitution was completed on the 11th of October and an election was called by Governor Riley to be held on the 13th of November to vote upon the adoption of the constitution and to elect state officers, a legislature and members of congress.

At the election Peter H. Burnett, recently from Oregon territory, who had been quite active in urging the organization of a state government, was chosen governor; John McDougall, lieutenant governor, and George W. Wright and Edward Gilbert members of congress. San José had been designated by the constitutional convention the capital of the state pro tem.

The people of San José had pledged themselves to provide a suitable building for the meeting of the legislature in hopes that their town might be made the permanent capital. They were unable to complete the building designed for a state capital in time for the meeting. The uncomfortable quarters furnished created a great deal of dissatisfaction. The legislature consisted of sixteen senators and thirty-six assemblymen. There being no county organization, the members were elected by districts. The representation was not equally distributed; San Joaquin district had more senators than San Francisco. The senate and assembly were organized on the 17th of December. E. K. Chamberlain of San Diego was elected president pro tem. of the senate and Thomas J. White of Sacramento speaker of the assembly. The governor and lieutenant-governor were sworn in on the 20th. The state government being organized the legislature proceeded to the election of United States senators. The candidates were T. Butler King, John C. Fremont, William M. Gwin, Thomas J. Henly, John W. Geary, Robert Semple and H. W. Halleck. Fremont received twenty-nine out of forty-six votes on the first ballot and was declared elected. Of the aspirants, T. Butler King and William M. Gwin represented the ultra pro-slavery element. King was a crossroads politician from down in Georgia, who had been sent to the coast as a confidential agent of the government. The officers of the army and navy were enjoined to "in all matters aid and assist him in carrying out the views of the government and be guided by his advice and council in the conduct of all proper measures within the scope of those instructions." He made a tour of the mines, accompanied by General Smith and his staff; Commodore Ap Catesby Jones and staff and a cavalry escort under Lieutenant Stoneman. He wore a black stovepipe hat and a dress coat. He made himself the laughing stock of the miners and by traveling in the heat of the day contracted a fever that very nearly terminated his existence. He had been active so far as his influence went in trying to bring California into the Union with the hope of representing it in the senate. Gwin had come a few months before from Mississippi with the same object in view. Although the free state men were in the majority in the legislature they recognized the fact that to elect two senators opposed to the extension of slavery would result in arraying the pro-slavery faction in congress against the admission of the state into the Union. Of the two representatives of the south, Gwin was the least objectionable and on the second ballot he was elected. On the 21st Governor Burnett delivered his message. It was a wordy document, but not marked by any very brilliant ideas or valuable suggestions. Burnett was a southerner from Missouri. He was hobbled on the subject of the exclusion of free negroes. The African, free to earn his own living unrestrained by a master, was, in his opinion, a menace to the perpetuity of the commonwealth.

On the 22d the legislature elected the remaining state officers, viz.: Richard Roman, treasurer; John I. Houston, controller; E. J. C. Kewen, attorney general; Charles J. Whiting, surveyor-general; S. C. Hastings, chief justice; Henry Lyons and Nathaniel Bennett, associate justices. The legislature continued in session until April 22, 1850. Although it was nicknamed the "Legislature of a thousand drinks," it did a vast amount of work and did most of it well. It was not made up of hard drinkers. The majority of its members were above the average legislator in intelligence, temperance and patriotism. The members were not there for pay or for political preferment. They were there for the good of their adopted state and labored conscientiously for its benefit. The opprobrious nickname is said to have originated thus: A roystering individual by the name of Green had been elected to the senate from Sacramento as a joke. He regarded the whole proceedings as a huge joke. He kept a supply of liquors on hand at his quarters and when the legislature adjourned he was in the habit of calling: "Come, boys, let us take a thousand drinks."

The state had set up housekeeping without a cent on hand to defray expenses. There was not a quire of paper, a pen, nor an inkstand belonging to the state and no money to buy supplies. After wrestling with the financial problem some time an act authorizing a loan of $200,000 for current expenses was passed. Later on in the session another act was passed authorizing the bonding of the state for $300,000 with interest at the rate of three per cent a month. The legislature divided the state into twenty-seven counties, created nine judicial districts, passed laws for the collection of revenue, taxing all real and personal property and imposing a poll tax of $5 on all male inhabitants over twenty-one and under fifty years of age.

California was a self-constituted state. It had organized a state government and put it into successful operation without the sanction of congress. Officials, state, county and town, had been elected and had sworn to support the constitution of the state of California and yet there was really no state of California. It had not been admitted into the Union. It was only a state de facto and it continued in that condition nine months before it became a state de jure.

When the question of admitting California into the Union came before congress it evoked a bitter controversy. The senate was equally divided, thirty senators from the slave states and the same number from the free. There were among the southern senators some broad minded and patriotic men, willing to do what was right, but they were handicapped by an ultra pro-slavery faction, extremists, who would willingly sacrifice the Union if by that they could extend and perpetuate that sum of all villainies, human slavery. This faction in the long controversy resorted to every known parliamentary device to prevent the admission of California under a free state constitution. To admit two senators from a free state would destroy the balance of power. That gone, it could never be regained by the south. The north was increasing in power and population, while the south, under the blighting influence of slavery, was retrograding.

Henry Clay, the man of compromises, undertook to bridge over the difficulty by a set of resolutions known as the Omnibus bill. These were largely concessions to the slave holding faction for the loss of the territory acquired by the Mexican war. Among others was this, that provision should be made by law for the restitution of fugitive slaves in any state or territory of the Union. This afterward was embodied into what was known as the fugitive slave law and did more perhaps than any other cause to destroy the south's beloved institution.

These resolutions were debated through many months and were so amended and changed that their author could scarcely recognize them. Most of them were adopted in some form and effected a temporary compromise.

On August 13th the bill for the admission of California finally came to a vote. It passed the senate, thirty-four ayes to eighteen noes. Even then the opposition did not cease. Ten of the southern pro-slavery extremists, led by Jefferson Davis, joined in a protest against the action of the majority, the language of which was an insult to the senate and treason to the government. In the house the bill passed by a vote of one hundred and fifty ayes to fifty-six ultra southern noes. It was approved and signed by President Fillmore September 9, 1850. On the 11th of September the California senators and congressmen presented themselves to be sworn in. The slave holding faction in the senate, headed by Jefferson Davis, who had been one of the most bitter opponents to the admission, objected. But their protest availed them nothing. Their ascendancy was gone. We might sympathize with them had their fight been made for a noble principle, but it was not. From that day on until the attempt was made in 1861 these men schemed to destroy the Union. The admission of California as a free state was the beginning of the slave holders' rebellion.

The news of the admission of California reached San Francisco on the morning of October 18, by the mail steamer Oregon, nearly six weeks after congress had admitted it. Business was at once suspended, the courts were adjourned and the people went wild with excitement. Messengers, mounted on fleet steeds, spread the news throughout the state. Newspapers from the states containing an account of the proceedings of congress at the time of admission sold for $5 each. It was decided to hold a formal celebration of the event on the 29th and preparations were begun for a grand demonstration. Neither labor nor money was spared to make the procession a success. The parade was cosmopolitan in the fullest meaning of that word. There were people in it from almost every nation under the sun. The Chinese made quite an imposing spectacle in the parade. Dressed in rich native costumes, each carrying a gaudily painted fan, they marched under command of their own marshals, Ah He and Ah Sing. At their head proudly marched a color bearer carrying a large blue silk banner, inscribed the "China boys." Following them came a triumphal car, in which was seated thirty boys in black trousers and white shirts, representing the thirty states. In the center of this group, seated on a raised platform, was a young girl robed in white with gold and silver gauze floating about her and supporting a breast plate, upon which was inscribed "California, the Union, it must and shall be preserved." The California pioneers carried a banner on which was represented a New Englander in the act of stepping ashore and facing a native Californian with lasso and serape. In the center the state seal and the inscription, "Far west, Eureka 1846, California pioneers, organized August, 1850." Army and navy officers, soldiers, sailors and marines, veterans of the Mexican war, municipal officers, the fire department, secret and benevolent societies and associations, with a company of mounted native Californians bearing a banner with thirty-one stars on a blue satin ground with the inscription in gold letters, California, E Pluribus Unum, all these various organizations and orders with their marshals and aids mounted on gaily caparisoned steeds and decked out with their gold and silver trimmed scarfs, made an imposing display that has seldom if ever been equaled since in the metropolis of California.

At the plaza a flag of thirty-one stars was raised to the mast head. An oration was delivered by Judge Nathaniel Bennett and Mrs. Wills recited an original ode of her own composition. The rejoicing over, the people settled down to business. Their unprecedented action in organizing a state government and putting it into operation without the sanction of congress had been approved and legalized by that body.

Like the Goddess Minerva, represented on its great seal, who sprung full grown from the brain of Jupiter, California was born a fully matured state. She passed through no territorial probation. No state had such a phenomenal growth in its infancy. No state before or since has met with such bitter opposition when it sought admission into the family of states. Never before was there such a medley of nationalities—Yankees, Mexicans, English, Germans, French, Spaniards, Peruvians, Polynesians, Mongolians—organized into a state and made a part of the body politic nolens volens.

The constitutional convention of 1849 did not definitely fix the state capital. San José was designated as the place of meeting for the legislature and the organization of the state government. San José had offered to donate a square of thirty-two acres, valued at $60,000, for capitol grounds and provide a suitable building for the legislature and state officers. The offer was accepted, but when the legislature met there December 15, 1849, the building was unfinished and for a time the meetings of the legislature were held at a private residence. There was a great deal of complaining and dissatisfaction. The first capitol of the state was a two-story adobe building 40x60, which had been intended for a hotel. It was destroyed by fire April 29, 1853. The accommodations at San José were so unsatisfactory that the legislature decided to locate the capital at some other point. Propositions were received from Monterey, from Reed of San José, from Stevenson & Parker of New York of the Pacific and from Gen. M. G. Vallejo. Vallejo's proposition was accepted. He offered to donate one hundred and fifty-six acres of land in a new town that he proposed to lay out on the straits of Carquinez (now Vallejo) for a capital site and within two years to give $370,000 in money for the erection of public buildings. He asked that his proposition be submitted to a vote of the people at the next general election. His proposition was accepted by the legislature. At the general election, October 7, 1850, Vallejo received seventy-four hundred and seventy-seven votes; San José twelve hundred and ninety-two, and Monterey three hundred and ninety-nine. The second legislature convened at San José. General Vallejo exerted himself to have the change made in accordance with the previous proposition. The citizens of San José made an effort to retain the capital, but a bill was passed making Vallejo the permanent seat of government after the close of the session, provided General Vallejo should give bonds to carry out his proposals. In June Governor McDougal caused the governmental archives to be removed from San José to Vallejo.

When the members of the third legislature met at the new capital January 2, 1852, they found a large unfurnished and partly unfinished wooden building for their reception. Hotel accommodations could not be obtained and there was even a scarcity of food to feed the hungry lawmakers. Sacramento offered its new court house and on the 16th of January the legislature convened in that city. The great flood of March, 1852, inundated the city and the lawmakers were forced to reach the halls of legislation in boats and again there was dissatisfaction. Then Benicia came to the front with an offer of her new city hall, which was above high water mark. General Vallejo had become financially embarrassed and could not carry out his contract with the state, so it was annulled. The offer of Benicia was accepted and on May 18, 1853, that town was declared the permanent capital.

In the legislature of 1854 the capital question again became an issue. Offers were made by several aspiring cities, but Sacramento won with the proffer of her court house and a block of land between I and J, Ninth and Tenth streets. Then the question of the location of the capital got into the courts. The supreme court decided in favor of Sacramento. Before the legislature met again the court house that had been offered to the state burned down. A new and more commodious one was erected and rented to the state at $12,000 a year. Oakland made an unsuccessful effort to obtain the capital. Finally a bill was passed authorizing the erection of a capitol building in Sacramento at a cost not to exceed $500,000. Work was begun on the foundation in October, 1860. The great flood of 1861-62 inundated the city and ruined the foundations of the capitol. San Francisco made a vigorous effort to get the capital removed to that city, but was unsuccessful. Work was resumed on the building, the plans were changed, the edifice enlarged, and, finally, after many delays, it was ready for occupancy in December, 1869. From the original limit of half a million dollars its cost when completed had reached a million and a half. The amount expended on the building and grounds to date foots up $2,600,000.

CHAPTER XXV.

THE ARGONAUTS.

WHEN or by whom the name argonaut was first applied to the early California gold seekers I have not been able to ascertain. The earliest allusion to the similarity of Jason's voyage after the Golden Fleece and the miners' rush to the gold fields of California is found in a caricature published in the London Punch in 1849. On the shore of an island is a guide board bearing the inscription "California;" near it is a miner digging gold and presumably singing at his work. In a boat near the shore is a fat individual, a typical "Johnny Bull." He is struggling desperately with two individuals who are holding him back from leaping into the water, so fascinated is he by the song of the miner. Under the drawing are the words, "The Song of the Sirens."

If we include among the argonauts all who traveled by land or voyaged by sea in search of the golden fleece in the days of '49 we will have a motley mixture. The tales of the fabulous richness of the gold fields of California spread rapidly throughout the civilized world and drew to the territory all classes and conditions of men, the bad as well as the good, the indolent as well as the industrious, the vicious as well as the virtuous. They came from Europe, from South America and from Mexico. From Australia and Tasmania came the ex-convict and the ticket-of-leave man; from the isles of the sea came the Polynesian, and from Asia the Hindoo and the "Heathen Chinese."

The means of reaching the land of gold were as varied as the character of the people who came. Almost every form of vehicle was pressed into service on land. One individual, if not more, made the trip trundling his impedimenta in a wheelbarrow. Others started out in carriages, intent on making the journey in comfort and ease, but finished on foot, weary, worn and ragged. When the great rush came old sailing vessels that had long been deemed unseaworthy were fitted out for the voyage to California. It must have been the providence that protects fools which prevented these from going to the bottom of the ocean. With the desperate chances that the argonauts took on these old tubs, it is singular that there were so few shipwrecks and so little loss of life. Some of these were such slow sailers that it took them the greater part of a year to round Cape Horn and reach their destination. On one of these some passengers, exasperated at its slowness, landed near Cape St. Lucas and made the long journey up the peninsula of Lower California and on to San Francisco on foot, arriving there a month before their vessel. Another party undertook to make the voyage from Nicaragua in a whale boat and actually did accomplish seven hundred miles of it before they were picked up in the last extremities by a sailing vessel.

The Sierra Nevada region, in which gold was first found, comprised a strip about thirty miles wide and two hundred miles long from north to south in the basins of the Feather, Yuba, Bear, American, Cosumne, Mokolumne, Stanislaus, Tuolumne and Merced rivers, between the elevations of one thousand and five thousand feet. In all these streams miners washed gold in 1848. The placer mines on the Upper Sacramento and in the Shasta region were discovered and worked late in the fall of 1848. The Klamath mines were discovered later.

The southern mines, those on the San Joaquin, Fresno, Kern and San Gabriel rivers, were located between 1851 and 1855. Gold was found in some of the ravines and creeks of San Diego county. Practically the gold belt of California extends from the Mexican line to Oregon, but at some points it is rather thin. The first gold digging was done with butcher knives, the gold hunter scratching in the sand and crevices of the rock to find nuggets. Next the gold pan came into use and the miners became experts in twirling the pan in a pool of water, so as to wash out the sand and gravel and leave the gold dust in the pan. Isaac Humphreys, who had mined gold in Georgia, was the first person to use a rocker or gold cradle in California. Although a very simple piece of machinery those who reached the mines early found it quite an expensive one. Dr. Brooks in his diary, under date of June 11, 1848, writes: "On Tuesday we set to work upon our cradle. We resolved upon the construction of two and for this purpose went down to the store in a body to see about the boards. We found timber extravagantly dear, being asked $40 a hundred feet. The next question was as to whether we should hire a carpenter. We were told there was one or two in the diggings, who might be hired, though at a very extravagant rate. Accordingly Bradley and I proceeded to see one of these gentlemen, and found him washing away with a hollow log and a willow branch sieve. He offered to help us at the rate of $35 a day, we finding provisions and tools, and could not be brought to charge less. We thought this by far too extravagant and left him, determined to undertake the work ourselves. After two days' work of seven men they produced two rough cradles and found that three men with a cradle or rocker could wash out as much gold in a day as six could with pans in the same time."

A rocker or gold cradle had some resemblance to a child's cradle with similar rockers and was rocked by means of a perpendicular handle fastened to the cradle box. The cradle box consisted of a wooden trough about twenty inches wide and forty inches long with sides four or five inches high. The lower end was left open. On the upper end sat the hopper, a box twenty inches square with sides four inches high and a bottom of sheet iron or zinc pierced with holes one-half inch in diameter. Where zinc or iron could not be obtained a sieve of willow rods was used. Under the hopper was an apron of canvas, which sloped down from the lower end of the hopper to the upper end of the cradle box. A wooden riffle bar an inch square was nailed across the bottom of the cradle box about its middle, and another at its lower end. Under the cradle box were nailed rockers, and near the middle an upright handle by which motion was imparted. If water and pay dirt were convenient two men were sufficient to operate the machine. Seated on a stool or rock the operator rocked with one hand, while with a long handled dipper he dipped water from a pool and poured it on the sand and gravel in the hopper. When the sand and earth had been washed through the holes in the sieve the rocks were emptied and the hopper filled again from the buckets of pay dirt supplied by the other partner. The gold was caught on the canvas apron by the riffle bars, while the thin mud and sand were washed out of the machine by the water.

In the dry diggings a method of separating the gold from the earth was resorted to principally by Sonorans. The pay dirt was dug and dried in the sun, then pulverized by pounding into fine dust. With a batéa or bowl-shaped Indian basket filled with this dust, held in both hands, the Mexican skillfully tossed the earth in the air, allowing the wind to blow away the dust and catching the heavier particles and the gold in the basket, repeating the process until there was little left but the gold.

The Long Tom was a single sluice with a sieve and a box underneath at the end and riffle bars to stop the gold. The pay dirt was shoveled in at the upper end and a rapid current of water washed away the sand and earth, the gold falling into the receptacle below. Ground sluicing was resorted to where a current of water from a ditch could be directed against a bank of earth or hill with a sloping bedrock. The stream of water washing against the upper side of the bank caved it down and carried the loose earth through a string of sluices, depositing the gold in the riffle bars in the bottom of the sluices.

In the creeks and gulches where there was not much fall, sluice mining was commonly resorted to. A string of sluice boxes was laid, each fitting into the upper end of the one below, and in the lower ones riffle bars were placed to stop the gold. The sluice boxes were placed on trestles four feet from the ground and given an incline of five or six inches to the rod. The gravel from the bedrock up as far as there was any pay dirt was shoveled into the upper boxes and a rapid current of water flowing through the boxes carried away the gravel and rocks, the gold remaining in the riffles. Quicksilver was placed between the riffles to catch the fine gold. The gold amalgamated with quicksilver was cleaned out of the boxes at the end of the day's work and separated from the quicksilver in a retort. These were the principal methods of mining used by the argonauts. The machinery and appliances were simple and inexpensive. Hydraulic mining came in later, when larger capital was required and the mines had fallen into the hands of corporations.

When the news spread throughout the states of the wonderful "finds" of gold in California, the crudest ideas prevailed in regard to how the precious metal was to be extracted from the earth. Gold mining was an almost unknown industry in the United States. Only in a few obscure districts of North Carolina and Georgia had gold been found, and but very few people outside of these districts had ever visited the mines. Not one in ten thousand of those who joined the rush to California in 1849 had ever seen a grain of virgin gold. The idea prevailed among the gold seekers that the gold being found in grains it could be winnowed from the sand and earth in which it was found like wheat is separated from chaff. Imbued with this idea Yankee ingenuity set to work to invent labor-saving machines that would accomplish the work quickly and enrich the miner proportionally. The ships that bore the argonauts from their native land carried out a variety of these gold machines, all guaranteed to wrest from the most secret recesses the auriferous deposits in nature's treasure vaults. These machines were of all varieties and patterns. They were made of copper, iron, zinc and brass. Some were operated by means of a crank, others had two cranks, while others were worked with a treadle. Some required that the operator should stand, others allowed the miner to sit in an arm chair and work in comfort.

Haskins, in his "Argonauts of California," describes one of these machines that was brought around the Horn in the ship he came on: "It was in the shape of a huge fanning mill, with sieves properly arranged for sorting the gold ready for bottling. All chunks too large for the bottle would be consigned to the pork barrel." (The question of bringing home the gold in bottles or barrels had been seriously discussed and decided in favor of barrels because these could be rolled and thus save cost of transportation from the mines.)

"This immense machine which, during our passage, excited the envy and jealousy of all who had not the means and opportunity of securing a similar one required, of course, the services of a hired man to turn the crank, whilst the proprietor would be busily engaged in shoveling in pay dirt and pumping water; the greater portion of the time, however, being required, as was firmly believed, in corking the bottles and fitting the heads in the barrels. This machine was owned by a Mr. Allen of Cambridge, Mass., who had brought with him a colored servant to manage and control the crank portion of the invaluable institution.

"Upon landing we found lying on the sand and half buried in the mud hundreds of similar machines, bearing silent witness at once to the value of our gold saving machines without the necessity of a trial."

Nor was it the argonaut alone who came by sea that brought these machines. Some of these wonderful inventions were hauled across the plains in wagons, their owners often sacrificing the necessities of life to save the prized machine. And, when, after infinite toil and trouble, they had landed their prize in the mines, they were chagrined to find it the subject of jest and ridicule by those who had some experience in mining.

The gold rush came early in the history of California placer mining. The story of a rich strike would often depopulate a mining camp in a few hours. Even a bare rumor of rich diggings in some indefinite locality would send scores of miners tramping off on a wild goose chase into the mountains. Some of these rushes originated through fake stories circulated for sinister purpose; others were caused by exaggerated stories of real discoveries.

One of the most famous fakes of early days was the Gold Lake rush of 1850. This wonderful lake was supposed to be located about two hundred miles northeast of Marysville, on the divide between the Feather and the Yuba rivers. The Sacramento Transcript of June 19, 1850, says: "We are informed by a gentleman from Marysville that it is currently reported there that the Indians upon this lake use gold for their commonest purposes; that they have a ready way of knocking out square blocks, which they use for seats and couches upon which to place their beds, which are simply bundles of wild oats, which grow so profusely in all sections of the state. According to report also they use for fishhooks crooked pieces of gold and kill their game with arrows made of the same material. They are reported to be thunderstruck at the movements of the whites and their eagerness to collect and hoard the materials of the very ground upon which they tread.

"A story is current that a man at Gold Lake saw a large piece of gold floating on the lake which he succeeded in getting ashore. So clear are the waters that another man saw a rock of gold on the bottom. After many efforts he succeeded in lassoing the rock. Three days afterward he was seen standing holding on to his rope."

The Placer Times of Marysville reports that the specimens brought into Marysville are of a value from $1,500 down. Ten ounces is reported as no unusual yield to the pan. The first party of sixty which started out under guidance of one who had returned successful were assured that they would not get less than $500 each per day. We were told that two hundred had left town with a full supply of provisions and four hundred mules. Mules and horses have doubled in value. Many places of business are closed. The diggings at the lake are probably the best ever discovered." The Times of June 19 says: "It is reported that up to last Thursday two thousand persons had taken up their journey. Many who were working good claims deserted them for the new discovery. Mules and horses were about impossible to obtain. Although the truth of the report rests on the authority of but two or three who have returned from Gold Lake, yet few are found who doubt the marvelous revelations. A party of Kanakas are said to have wintered at Gold Lake, subsisting chiefly on the flesh of their animals. They are said to have taken out $75,000 the first week. When a conviction takes such complete possession of a whole community, who are fully conversant with all the exaggerations that have had their day, it is scarcely prudent to utter even a qualified dissent from what is universally believed."

The denouement of the Gold Lake romance may be found in the Transcript of July 1, 1850. "The Gold Lake excitement, so much talked of and acted upon of late, has almost subsided. A crazy man comes in for a share of the responsibility. Another report is that they have found one of the pretended discoverers at Marysville and are about to lynch him. Indeed, we are told that a demonstration against the town is feared by many. People who have returned after traveling some one hundred and fifty to two hundred miles say that they left vast numbers of people roaming between the sources of the Yuba and the Feather rivers."

Scarcely had the deluded argonauts returned from a bootless search for the lake of gold when another rumored discovery of gold fields of fabulous richness sent them rushing off toward the sea coast. Now it was Gold Bluff that lured them away. On the northwest coast of California, near the mouth of the Klamath river, precipitous bluffs four hundred feet high mark the coast line of the ocean. A party of prospectors in the fall of 1850, who had been up in the Del Norte country, were making their way down to the little trading and trapping station of Trinidad to procure provisions. On reaching the bluffs, thirty miles above Trinidad, they were astonished to find stretching out before them a beach glittering with golden sands. They could not stop to gather gold; they were starving. So, scraping up a few handfuls of the glittering sands, they hastened on. In due time they reached San Francisco, where they exhibited their sand, which proved to be nearly half gold. The report of the wonderful find was spread by the newspapers and the excitement began. Companies were formed and claims located at long range. One company of nine locators sent an expert to examine their claims. He, by a careful mathematical calculation, ascertained that the claim would yield forty-three million dollars to each partner. As there were fifteen miles of gold beach, the amount of gold in the sands was sufficient to demonetize the precious metal. A laudable desire to benefit the human race possessed some of the claim owners. They formed joint stock companies with shares at $100 each. Gold Bluff mining stock went off like the proverbial hot cakes and prospectors went off as rapidly. Within two days after the expert's wonderful story was spread abroad nine ships were fitted out for Gold Bluff. The first to arrive off the Bluff was the vessel containing a party of the original discoverers. In attempting to land in a boat, the boat was upset in the breakers and five of the six occupants were drowned, Bertram, the leader of the party making the discovery, alone escaping. The vessel put back to Trinidad and the gold hunters made their way up the coast to the Bluff. But alas for their golden dreams! Where they had hoped to gather gold by the ship load no gold was found. Old ocean had gathered it back into his treasure vaults.

The bubble burst as suddenly as it had expanded. And yet there was gold at Gold Bluff and there is gold there yet. If the ocean could be drained or coffer dammed for two hundred miles along the gold coast of northern California and Oregon, all the wealth of Alaska would be but the panning out of a prospect hole compared to the richness that lies hidden in the sands of Gold Beach. For years after the bursting of the Gold Bluff bubble, when the tide was low, the sands along Gold Beach were mined with profit.

The Kern river excitement in the spring of 1855 surpassed everything that had preceded it. Seven years of mining had skimmed the richness of the placers. The northern and central gold fields of California had been thoroughly prospected. The miners who had been accustomed to the rich strikes of early years could not content themselves with moderate returns. They were on the qui vive for a rich strike and ready for a rush upon the first report of one. The first discoveries on the Kern river were made in the summer of 1854, but no excitement followed immediately. During the fall and winter rumors were set afloat of rich strikes on the head waters of that stream. The stories grew as they traveled. One that had a wide circulation and was readily accepted ran about as follows: "A Mexican doctor had appeared in Mariposa loaded down with gold nuggets. He reported that he and four companions had found a region paved with gold. The very hills were yellow with outcroppings. While gloating over their wealth and loading it into sacks the Indians attacked them and killed his four companions. He escaped with one sack of gold. He proposed to organize a company large enough to exterminate the Indians and then bring out the gold on pack mules." This as well as other stories as improbable were spread broadcast throughout the state. Many of the reports of wonderful strikes were purposely magnified by merchants and dealers in mining supplies who were overstocked with unsalable goods; and by transportation companies with whom business was slack. Their purpose was accomplished and the rush was on. It began in January, 1855. Every steamer down the coast to Los Angeles was loaded to the guards with adventurers for the mines. The sleepy old metropolis of the cow counties waked up to find itself suddenly transformed into a bustling mining camp. The Southern Californian of February 8, 1855, thus describes the situation: "The road from our valley is literally thronged with people on their way to the mines. Hundreds of people have been leaving not only the city, but every portion of the county. Every description of vehicle and animal has been brought into requisition to take the exultant seekers after wealth to the goal of their hopes. Immense ten-mule wagons strung out one after another; long trains of pack mules and men mounted and on foot, with picks and shovels; boarding-house keepers with their tents; merchants with their stocks of miners' necessaries and gamblers with their 'papers' are constantly leaving for the Kern river mines. The wildest stories are afloat. If the mines turn out $10 a day to the man everybody ought to be satisfied. The opening of these mines has been a Godsend to all of us, as the business of the entire country was on the point of taking to a tree. The great scarcity of money is seen in the present exorbitant rates of interest which it commands; 8, 10 and even 15 per cent a month is freely paid and the supply even at these rates is too meager to meet the demands." As the rush increased our editor grows more jubilant. In his issue of March 7, he throws out these headlines: "Stop the Press! Glorious News from Kern River! Bring Out the Big Gun! There are a thousand gulches rich with gold and room for ten thousand miners. Miners averaged $50 a day. One man with his own hands took out $160 in a day. Five men in ten days took out $4,500."

Another stream of miners and adventurers was pouring into the mines by way of the San Joaquin valley. From Stockton to the Kern river, a distance of three hundred miles, the road was crowded with men on foot, on stages, on horseback and on every form of conveyance that would take them to the new El Dorado. In four months five or six thousand men had found their way into the Kern river basin. There was gold there, but not enough to go around. A few struck it rich, the many struck nothing but "hard luck" and the rush out began. Those who had ridden into the valley footed it out, and those who had footed it in on sole leather footed it out on their natural soles.

After the wild frenzy of Kern river, the press of the state congratulated the public with the assurance that the era of wild rushes was past—"what had been lost in money had been gained in experience." As if prospectors ever profited by experience! Scarcely had the victims of Kern river resumed work in the old creeks and cañons they had deserted to join in the rush when a rumor came, faint at first, but gathering strength at each repetition, that rich diggings had been struck in the far north. This time it is Frazer river. True, Frazer river is in the British possessions, but what of that? There are enough miners in California to seize the country and hold it until the cream of the mines has been skimmed. Rumors of the richness of mines increased with every arrival of a steamer from the north. Captains, pursers, mates, cooks and waiters all confirmed the stories of rich strikes. Doubters asserted that the dust and nuggets exhibited had made the trip from San Francisco to Victoria and back. But they were silenced by the assurance that the transportation company was preparing to double the number of its vessels on that route. Commodore Wright was too smart to run his steamers on fake reports, and thus the very thing that should have caused suspicion was used to confirm the truth of the rumors. The doubters doubted no more, but packed their outfits for Frazer river. California was played out. Where could an honest miner pan out $100 a day in California now? He could do it every day in Frazer; the papers said so. The first notice of the mines was published in March, 1858. The rush began the latter part of April and in four months thirty thousand men, one-sixth of the voting population of the state, had rushed to the mines.

The effect of the craze was disastrous to business in California. Farms were abandoned and crops lost for want of hands to harvest them. Rich claims in old diggings were sold for a trifle of their value. Lots on Montgomery street that a few years later were worth $1,500 a front foot were sold for $100. Real estate in the interior towns was sacrificed at 50 to 75 per cent less than it was worth before the rush began. But a halt was called in the mad rush. The returns were not coming in satisfactorily. By the middle of July less than $100,000 in dust had reached San Francisco, only about $3 for each man who had gone to the diggings. There was gold there and plenty of it, so those interested in keeping up the excitement said: "The Frazer river is high; wait till it subsides." But it did not subside, and it has not subsided since. If the Frazer did not subside the excitement did, and that suddenly. Those who had money enough or could borrow from their friends got away at once. Those who had none hung around Victoria and New Westminster until they were shipped back at the government's expense. The Frazer river craze was the last of the mad, unreasoning "gold rushes." The Washoe excitement of '59 and the "Ho!" for Idaho of 1863-64" had some of the characteristics of the early gold rushes, but they soon settled down to steady business and the yield from these fairly recompensé those who were frugal and industrious.

Never before perhaps among civilized people was there witnessed such a universal leveling as occurred in the first years of the mining excitement in California. "As the labor required was physical instead of mental, the usual superiority of head workers over hand workers disappeared entirely. Men who had been governors and legislators and judges in the old states worked by the side of outlaws and convicts; scholars and students by the side of men who could not read or write; those who had been masters by the side of those who had been slaves; old social distinctions were obliterated; everybody did business on his own account, and not one man in ten was the employe and much less the servant of another. Social distinctions appeared to be entirely obliterated and no man was considered inferior to another. The hard-fisted, unshaven and patch-covered miner was on terms of perfect equality with the well-dressed lawyer, surgeon or merchant; and in general conferences, discussions and even conversations the most weather-beaten and strongly marked face, or, in other words, the man who had seen and experienced the most, notwithstanding his wild and tattered attire, was listened to with more attention and respectful consideration than the man of polished speech and striking antithesis. One reason of this was that in those days the roughest-looking man not infrequently knew more than anybody else of what was wanted to be known, and the raggedest man not infrequently was the most influential and sometimes the richest man in the locality."*

This independent spirit was characteristic of the men of '48 and '49. Then nearly everybody was honest and theft was almost unknown. With the advent of the criminal element in 1850 and later there came a change. Before that a pan of gold dust could be left in an open tent unguarded, but with the coming of the Sydney ducks from Australia and men of their class it became necessary to guard property with sedulous care.

CHAPTER XXVI.

SAN FRANCISCO.

IN 1835 Capt. William A. Richardson built the first house on the Yerba Buena cove.

It was a shanty of rough board, which he replaced a year later with an adobe building. He was granted a lot in 1836 and his building stood near what is now the corner of Dupont and Clay streets. Richardson had settled at Sausalito in 1822. He was an Englishman by birth and was one of the first foreigners to settle in California.

Jacob P. Leese, an American, in partnership with Spear & Hinckley, obtained a lot in 1836 and built a house and store near that of Captain Richardson. There is a tradition that Mr. Leese began his store building on the first of July and finished it at ten o'clock on the morning of July 4, and for a house warming celebrated the glorious Fourth in a style that astonished the natives up and down the coast. The house was sixty feet long and twenty-five broad, and, if completed in three days, Mr. Leese certainly deserves the credit of having eclipsed some of the remarkable feats in house building that were performed after the great fires of San Francisco in the early '50s. Mr. Leese and his neighbor, Captain Richardson, invited all the high-toned Spanish families for a hundred miles around to the celebration. The Mexican and American flags floated over the building and two six-pounders fired salutes. At five o'clock the guests sat down to a sumptuous dinner which lasted, toasts and all, till 10 o'clock, and then came dancing; and, as Mr. Leese remarks in his diary: "Our Fourth ended on the evening of the fifth." Mr. Leese was an energetic person. He built a house in three days, gave a Fourth of July celebration that lasted two days, and inside of a week had a store opened and was doing a thriving business with his late guests. He fell in love with the same energy that he did business. Among the guests at his 4th of July celebration were the Vallejos, the nabobs of Sonoma. Leese courted one of the girls and in a few months after the celebration married her. Their daughter, Rosalie Leese, was the first child born in Yerba Buena. Such was the beginning of San Francisco.

This settlement was on a crescent-shaped cove that lay between Clark's Point and the Rincon. The locality was known as Yerba Buena (good herb), a species of mint to which the native Californians attributed many medicinal virtues. The peninsula still bore the name that had been applied to it when the mission and presidio were founded, San Francisco. Yerba Buena was a local appellation and applied only to the little hamlet that had grown up on the cove. This settlement, although under the Mexican government, was not a Mexican town. The foreign element, the American predominating, had always been in the ascendancy. At the time of the conquest, among its two hundred inhabitants, were representatives of almost every civilized nation on the globe. It was a cosmopolitan town. In a very short time after the conquest it began to take on a new growth and was recognized as the coming metropolis of California. The curving beach of the cove at one point (Jackson street) crossed the present line of Montgomery street.

Richardson and Leese had built their stores and warehouses back from the beach because of a Mexican law that prohibited the building of a house on the beach where no custom house existed. All houses had to be built back a certain number of varas from high-water mark. This regulation was made to prevent smuggling. Between the shore line of the cove and anchorage there was a long stretch of shallow water. This made transportation of goods from ship to shore very inconvenient and expensive. With the advent of the Americans and the inauguration of a more progressive era it became necessary for the convenient landing of ships and for the discharging and receiving of their cargoes that the beach front of the town should be improved by building wharves and docks. The difficulty was to find the means to do this. The general government of the United States could not undertake it. The war with Mexico was still in progress. The only available way was to sell off beach lots to private parties, but who was to give title was the question. Edwin Bryant, February 22, 1847, had succeeded Washington Bartlett as alcalde. Bryant was a progressive man, and, recognizing the necessity of improvement in the shipping facilities of the town, he urged General Kearny, the acting governor, to relinquish, on the part of the general government, its claim to the beach lands in front of the town in favor of the municipality under certain conditions. General Kearny really had no authority to relinquish the claim of the general government to the land, for the simple reason that the general government had not perfected a claim. The country was held as conquered territory. Mexico had made no concession of the land by treaty. It was not certain that California would be ceded to the United States. Under Mexican law the governor of the territory, under certain conditions, had the right to make grants, and General Kearny, assuming the power given a Mexican governor, issued the following decree: "I, Brig.-Gen. S. W. Kearny, Governor of California, by virtue of authority in me vested by the President of the United States of America, do hereby grant, convey, and release unto the Town of San Francisco, the people or corporate authorities thereof, all the right, title and interest of the Government of the United States and of the Territory of California in and to the Beach and Water Lots on the East front of said Town of San Francisco included between the points known as the Rincon and Fort Montgomery, excepting such lots as may be selected for the use of the United States Government by the senior officers of the army and navy now there; provided, the said ground hereby ceded shall be divided into lots and sold by public auction to the highest bidder, after three months' notice previously given; the proceeds of said sale to be for the benefit of the town of San Francisco. Given at Monterey, capital of California, this 10th day of March, 1847, and the seventy-first year of the independence of the United States."

S. W. KEARNY,

Brig.-Gen'l & Gov. of California.

In pursuance of this decree, Alcalde Bryant advertised in the Californian that the ground described in the decree, known as Water Lots, would be surveyed and divided into convenient building lots and sold to the highest bidder on the 29th of June (1847). He then proceeds in the advertisement to boom the town. "The site of the town of San Francisco is known by all navigators and mercantile men acquainted with the subject to be the most commanding commercial position on the entire western coast of the Pacific ocean, and the Town itself is no doubt destined to become the commercial emporium of the western side of the North American continent." The alcaldes' assertions must have seemed rather extravagant to the dwellers in the little burgh on the cove of Yerba Buena. But Bryant was a far-seeing man and proved himself in this instance to be a prophet.

It will be noticed that both General Kearny and Alcalde Bryant call the town San Francisco. Alcalde Bartlett, the predecessor in office of Alcalde Bryant, had changed its name just before he was recalled to his ship. He did not like the name Yerba Buena, so he summarily changed it. He issued a proclamation setting forth that hereafter the town should be known as San Francisco. Having proclaimed a change of name, he proceeded to give his reasons: Yerba Buena was a paltry cognomen for a certain kind of mint found on an island in the bay; it was a merely local name, unknown beyond the district, while San Francisco had long been familiar on the maps. "Therefore it is hereby ordained, etc." Bartlett builded better than he knew. It would have been a sad mistake for the city to have carried the "outlandish name which Americans would mangle in pronouncing," as the alcalde said.

The change was made in the latter part of January, 1847, but it was some time before the new name was generally adopted.

The California Star, Sam Brannan's paper, which had begun to shine January 9, 1847, in its issue of March 20, alluding to the change, says: "We acquiesce in it, though we prefer the old name. When the change was first attempted we viewed it as a mere assumption of authority, without law of precedent, and therefore we adhered to the old name—Yerba Buena."

"It was asserted by the late alcalde, Washington Bartlett, that the place was called San Francisco in some old Spanish paper which he professed to have in his possession; but how could we believe a man even about that which it is said 'there is nothing in it,' who had so often evinced a total disregard for his own honor and character and the honor of the country which gave him birth and the 'rights of his fellow citizens in the district?' Evidently the editor had a grievance and was anxious to get even with the alcalde. Bartlett demanded an investigation of some charges made against his administration. He was cleared of all blame. He deserves the thanks of all Californians in summarily suppressing Yerba Buena and preventing it from being fastened on the chief city of the state.

There was at that time (on paper) a city of Francisca. The city fathers of this budding metropolis were T. O. Larkin and Robert Semple. In a half-column advertisement in the Californian of April 20, 1847, and several subsequent issues, headed "Great Sale of City Lots," they set forth the many advantages and merits of Francisca. The streets are eighty feet wide, the alleys twenty feet wide, and the lots fifty yards front and forty yards back. The whole city comprises five square miles."

"Francisca is situated on the Straits of Carquinez, on the north side of the Bay of San Francisco, about thirty miles from the mouth of the bay and at the head of ship navigation. In front of the city is a commodious bay, large enough for two hundred ships to ride at anchor, safe from any wind." * * * "The entire trade of the great Sacramento and San Joaquin valleys, a fertile country of great width and near seven hundred miles long from north to south, must of necessity pass through the narrow channel of Carquinez and the bay and country is so situated that every person who passes from one side of the bay to the other will find the nearest and best way by Francisca." Francisca, with its manifold natural advantages, ought to have been a great city, the metropolis of California, but the Fates were against it. Alcalde

Bartlett, probably without any design of doing so, dealt it a fearful blow when he dubbed the town of the good herb, San Francisco. Two cities with names so nearly alike could not live and thrive in the same state. Francisca became Benicia. The population of San Francisco (or Yerba Buena, as it was then called) at the time that Captain Montgomery raised the stars and stripes and took possession of it probably did not exceed two hundred. Its change of masters accelerated its growth. The Californian of September 4, 1847 (fourteen months after it came under the flag of the United States), gives the following statistics of its population and progress: Total white male population, 247; female, 123; Indians, male, 26; female, 8; South Sea Islanders, male, 39; female 1; negroes, male, 9; female 1; total population, 454.

Nearly every country on the globe had representatives in its population, and the various vocations by which men earn a living were well represented. Minister, one; doctors, three; lawyers, three; surveyors, two; agriculturists, eleven; bakers, seven; blacksmiths, six; brewer, one; butchers, seven; cabinetmakers, two; carpenters, twenty-six; cigarmaker, one; coopers, three; clerks, thirteen; gardener, one; grocers, five; gunsmiths, two; hotel-keepers, three; laborers, twenty; masons, four; merchants, eleven; miner, one; morocco case maker, one; navigators (inland), six; navigator (ocean), one; painter, one; printer, one; soldier, one; shoemakers, four; silversmith, one; tailors, four; tanners, two; watchmaker, one; weaver, one. Previous to April 1, 1847, according to the Californian, there had been erected in the town seventy-nine buildings, classified as follows: Shanties, twenty-two; frame buildings, thirty-one; adobe buildings, twenty-six. Since April 1, seventy-eight buildings have been erected, viz.: Shanties, twenty; frame buildings, forty-seven; adobe buildings, eleven. "Within five months last past," triumphantly adds the editor of the Californian, "as many buildings have been built as were erected in all the previous years of the town's existence."

The town continued to grow with wonderful rapidity throughout the year 1847, considering that peace had not yet been declared and the destiny of California was uncertain. According to a school census taken in March, 1848, by the Board of Trustees, the population was: Males, five hundred and seventy-five; females, one hundred and seventy-seven; and "children of age to attend school," sixty, a total of eight hundred and twelve. Building kept pace with the increase of population until the "gold fever" became epidemic. Dr. Brooks, writing in his diary May 17, says: "Walking through the town to-day, I observed that laborers were employed only upon about half a dozen of the fifty new buildings which were in the course of being run up."

The first survey of lots in the town had been made by a Frenchman named Vioget. No names had been given to the streets. This survey was made before the conquest. In 1847, Jasper O'Farrell surveyed and platted the district extending about half a mile in the different directions from the plaza. The streets were named, and, with a very few changes, still retain the names then given. In September the council appointed a committee to report upon the building of a wharf. It was decided to construct two wharves, one from the foot of Clay street and the other from the foot of Broadway. Money was appropriated to build them and they had been extended some distance seaward when the rush to the mines suspended operations. After considerable agitation by the two newspapers and canvassing for funds, the first school-house was built. It was completed December 4, 1847, but, for lack of funds, or, as the Star says, for lack of energy in the council, school was not opened on the completion of the house. In March the council appropriated $400 and April 1, 1848, Thomas Douglas, a graduate of Yale College, took charge of the school. San Francisco was rapidly developing into a progressive American city. Unlike the older towns of California, it had but a small Mexican population. Even had not gold been discovered, it would have grown into a commercial city of considerable size.

The first effect of the gold discovery and the consequent rush to the mines was to bring everything to a standstill. As Kemble, of the Star, puts it, it was "as if a curse had arrested our onward course of enterprise; everything wears a desolate and sombre look; everywhere all is dull, monotonous, dead." The return of the inhabitants in a few months and the influx of new arrivals gave the town a boom in the fall of 1848. Building was only limited by the lack of material, and every kind of a makeshift was resorted to to provide shelter against winter rains. From the many attempts at describing the town at this stage of its development, I select this from "Sights in the Gold Regions," a book long since out of print. Its author, T. T. Johnson, arrived at San Francisco April 1, 1849. "Proceeding on our survey, we found the streets, or, properly, the roads, laid out regularly, those parallel with the water being a succession of terraces, and these ascending the hills or along their sides being in some instances cut down ten or twelve feet below the surface. Except a portion of the streets fronting upon the cove, they are all of hard-beaten, sandy clay, as solid as if macadamized. About three hundred houses, stores, shanties and sheds, with a great many tents, composed the town at that period. The houses were mostly built of rough boards and unpainted; brown cottons or calico nailed against the beams and joists answered for wall and ceiling of the better class of tenements. With the exception of the brick warehouse of Howard and Mellus, the establishments of the commercial houses of which we had heard so much were inferior to the outhouses of the country seats on the Hudson; and yet it would puzzle the New York Exchange to produce merchant princes of equal importance." * * * "We strolled among the tents in the outskirts of the town. Here was 'confusion worse confounded,' chiefly among Mexicans, Peruvians and Chilians. Every kind, size, color and shape of tent pitched helter-skelter and in the most awkward manner were stowed full of everything under the sun."

In the first six months of 1849 fifteen thousand souls were added to the population of San Francisco; in the latter half of that year about four thousand arrived every month by sea alone. At first the immigrants were from Mexico, Chile, Peru and the South American ports generally; but early in the spring the Americans began to arrive, coming by way of Panama and Cape Horn, and later across the plains. Europe sent its contingent by sea via Cape Horn; and China, Australia and the Hawaiian Islands added to the city's population an undesirable element. A large majority of those who came by sea made their way to the mines, but many soon returned to San Francisco, some to take their departure for home, others to become residents. At the end of the year San Francisco had a population of twenty-five thousand. The following graphic description of life in San Francisco in the fall of '49 and spring of '50 I take from a paper, "Pioneer Days in San Francisco," written by John Williamson Palmer, and published in the Century Magazine (1890): "And how did they all live? In frame houses of one story, more commonly in board shanties and canvas tents, pitched in the midst of sand or mud and various rubbish and strange filth and fleas; and they slept on rude cots or on soft planks, under horse blankets, on tables, counters, floors, on trucks in the open air, in bunks braced against the weather-boarding, forty of them in one loft; and so they tossed and scratched and swore and laughed and sang and skylarked, those who were not tired or drunk enough to sleep. And in the working hours they bustled, and jostled, and tugged, and sweated, and made money, always made money. They labored and they lugged; they worked on lighters, drove trucks, packed mules, rang bells, carried messages, 'waited' in restaurants, 'marked' for billiard tables, served drinks in bar rooms, 'faked' on the plaza, 'cried' at auctions, toted lumber for houses, ran a game of faro or roulette in the El Dorado or the Bella Union, or manipulated three-card monte on the head of a barrel in front of the Parker House; they speculated, and, as a rule, gambled.

"Clerks in stores and offices had munificent salaries. Five dollars a day was about the smallest stipend even in the custom house, and one Baptist preacher was paid $10,000 a year. Laborers received $1 an hour; a pick or a shovel was worth $10; a tin pan or a wooden bowl $5, and a butcher knife $30. At one time carpenters who were getting $12 a day struck for $16. Lumber rose to $500 per thousand feet, and every brick in a house cost a dollar one way or another. Wheat, flour and salt pork sold at $40 a barrel; a small loaf of bread was fifty cents and a hard-boiled egg a dollar. You paid $3 to get into the circus and $55 for a private box at the theater. Forty dollars was the price for ordinary coarse boots, and a pair that came above the knees and would carry you gallantly through the quagmires brought a round hundred. When a shirt became very dirty the wearer threw it away and bought a new one. Washing cost $15 a dozen in 1849.

"Rents were simply monstrous; $3,000 a month in advance for a 'store' hurriedly built of rough boards. Wright & Co. paid $75,000 for the wretched little place on the corner of the plaza that they called the Miners' Bank, and $36,000 was asked for the use of the Old Adobe as a custom-house. The Parker House paid $120,000 a year in rents, nearly one-half of that amount being collected from gamblers who held the second floor; and the canvas tent next door used as a gambling saloon, and called the El Dorado, was good for $40,000 a year. From 10 to 15 per cent a month was paid in advance for the use of money borrowed on substantial security. The prices of real estate went up among the stars; $8,000 for a fifty-vara lot that had been bought in 1849 for $20. A lot purchased two years before for a barrel of aguardiente sold for $18,000. Yet, for all that, everybody made money.

"The aspect of the streets of San Francisco at this time was such as one may imagine of an unsightly waste of sand and mud churned by the continual grinding of heavy wagons and trucks and the tugging and floundering of horses, mules and oxen; thoroughfares irregular and uneven, ungraded, unpaved, unplanked, obstructed by lumber and goods, alternate lumps and holes, the actual dumping-places of the town, handy receptacles for the general sweepings and rubbish and indescribable offal and filth, the refuse of an indiscriminate population 'pigging' together in shanties and tents. And these conditions extended beyond the actual settlement into the chaparral and underbrush that covered the sand hills on the north and west.

"The flooding rains of winter transformed what should have been thoroughfares into treacherous quagmires set with holes and traps fit to smother horse and man. Loads of brush-wood and branches of trees cut from the hills were thrown into these swamps; but they served no more than a temporary purpose and the inmates of tents and houses made such bridges and crossings as they could with boards, boxes and barrels. Men waded through the slough and thought themselves lucky when they sank no deeper than their waists."

It is said that two horses mired down in the mud of Montgomery street were left to die of starvation, and that three drunken men were suffocated between Washington and Jackson streets. It was during the winter of '49 that the famous sidewalk of flour sacks, cooking stoves and tobacco boxes was built. It extended from Simmons, Hutchinson & Co.'s store to Adams Express office, a distance of about seventy-five yards. The first portion was built of Chilean flour in one hundred pound sacks, next came the cooking stoves in a long row, and then followed a double row of tobacco boxes of large size, and a yawning gap of the walk was bridged by a piano. Chile flour, cooking stoves, tobacco and pianos were cheaper material for building walks, owing to the excessive supply of these, than lumber at $600 a thousand.

In the summer of '49 there were more than three hundred sailing vessels lying in the harbor of San Francisco, from which the sailors had deserted to go to the mines. Some of these vessels rotted where they were moored. Some were hauled up in the sand or mud flats and used for store houses, lodging houses and saloons. As the water lots were filled in and built upon, these ships sometimes formed part of the line of buildings on the street. The brig Euphemia was the first jail owned by the city; the store ship Apollo was converted into a lodging house and saloon, and the Niantic Hotel at the corner of Sansome and Clay streets was built on the hull of the ship Niantic. As the wharves were extended out into the bay the space between was filled in from the sand hills and houses built along the wharves. In this way the cove was gradually filled in. The high price of lumber and the great scarcity of houses brought about the importation from New York, Boston, Philadelphia and London of houses ready framed to set up. For a time immense profits were made in this, but an excessive shipment like that of the articles of which the famous sidewalk was made brought down the price below cost, and the business ceased.

The first of the great fires that devastated San Francisco occurred on Christmas eve, 1849. It started in Denison's Exchange, a gambling house on the east side of the plaza. It burned the greater part of the block between Washington and Clay streets and Kearny and Montgomery streets. The loss was estimated at a million and a quarter dollars. The second great fire occurred on May 4, 1850. It burned over the three blocks between Montgomery and Dupont streets, bounded by Jackson and Clay streets, and the north and east sides of Portsmouth square. The loss was estimated at $4,000,000. It started in the United States Exchange, a gambling den, at four o'clock in the morning, and burned for seven hours. The fire was believed to be of incendiary origin and several suspicious characters were arrested, but nothing could be proved against them. A number of the lookers-on refused to assist in arresting the progress of the flames unless paid for their labor; and $3 an hour was demanded and paid to some who did.

On the 14th of June, 1850, a fire broke out in the Sacramento House, on the east side of Kearny street, between Clay and Sacramento. The entire district from Kearny street between Clay and California to the water front was burned over, causing a loss of $3,000,000. Over three hundred houses were destroyed. The fourth great fire of the fateful year of 1850 occurred September 17. It started on Jackson street and destroyed the greater part of the blocks between Dupont and Montgomery streets from Washington to Pacific streets. The loss in this was not so great from the fact that the district contained mostly one-story houses. It was estimated at half a million dollars. December 14 of the same year a fire occurred on Sacramento street below Montgomery. Although the district burned over was not extensive, the loss was heavy. The buildings were of corrugated iron, supposed to be fireproof, and were filled with valuable merchandise. The loss amounted to $1,000,000. After each fire, building was resumed almost before the embers of the fire that consumed the former buildings were extinguished. After each fire better buildings were constructed. A period of six months' exemption had encouraged the inhabitants of the fire-afflicted city to believe that on account of the better class of buildings constructed the danger of great conflagrations was past, but the worst was yet to come. At 11 p. m. May 3, 1851, a fire, started by incendiaries, broke out on the south side of the plaza. A strong northwest wind swept across Kearny street in broad sheets of flame, first southeastward, then, the wind changing, the flames veered to the north and east. All efforts to arrest them were useless; houses were blown up and torn down in attempts to cut off communication, but the engines were driven back step by step, while some of the brave firemen fell victims to the fire fiend. The flames, rising aloft in whirling volumes, swept away the frame houses and crumbled up with intense heat the supposed fireproof structures. After ten hours, when the fire abated for want of material to burn, all that remained of the city were the sparsely settled outskirts. All of the business district between Pine and Pacific streets, from Kearny to the Battery on the water front, was in ruins. Over one thousand houses had been burned. The loss of property was estimated at $10,000,000, an amount greater than the aggregate of all the preceding fires. A number of lives were lost. During the progress of the fire large quantities of goods were stolen by bands of thieves. The sixth and last of the great conflagrations that devastated the city occurred on the 22d of June, 1851. The fire started in a building on Powell street and ravaged the district between Clay and Broadway, from Powell to Sansome. Four hundred and fifty houses were burned, involving a loss of $2,500,000. An improved fire department, more stringent building regulations and a better water supply combined to put an end to the era of great fires.

After the great fires of 1851 had swept over the city there was practically nothing left of the old metropolis of the early gold rush. The hastily constructed wooden shanties were gone; the corrugated iron building imported from New York and London, and warranted to be fireproof, had proved to be worthless to withstand great heat; the historic buildings had disappeared; the new city that, Phoenix-like, arose from the ashes of the old was a very different city from its predecessor that had been wiped from the earth by successive conflagrations. Stone and brick buildings covered the former site of wooden structures. The unsightly mud flats between the wharves were filled in from the sand hills and some of the streets paved. The year 1853 was memorable for the rapid progress of the city. Assessed property values increased from $18,000,000 to $28,000,000. Real estate values went soaring upward and the city was on the high tide of prosperity; but a reaction came in 1855. The rush to the mines had ceased, immigration had fallen off, and men had begun to retrench and settle down to steady business habits. Home productions had replaced imports, and the people were abandoning mining for farms. The transition from gold mining to grain growing had begun. All these affected the city and real estate declined. Lots that sold for $8,000 to $10,000 in 1853 could be bought for half that amount in 1855. Out of one thousand business houses, three hundred were vacant. Another influence that helped to bring about a depression was the growing political corruption and the increased taxation from speculations of dishonest officials.

The defalcations and forgeries of Harry Meigs, which occurred in 1854, were a terrible blow to the city. Meigs was one of its most trusted citizens. He was regarded as the embodiment of integrity, the stern, incorruptible man, the watch-dog of the treasury. By his upright conduct he had earned the sobriquet of Honest Harry Meigs. Over-speculation and reaction from the boom of 1853 embarrassed him. He forged a large amount of city scrip and hypothecated it to raise money. His forgeries were suspected, but before the truth was known he made his escape on the barque America to Costa Rica and from there he made his way to Peru. His forgeries amounted to $1,500,000, of which $1,000,000 was in controller's warrants, to which he forged the names of Mayor Garrison and Controller Harris. The vigilance committee of 1856 cleared the political atmosphere by clearing the city, by means of hemp and deportation, of a number of bad characters. The city was just beginning to regain its former prosperity when the Frazer river excitement brought about a temporary depression. The wild rush carried away about one-sixth of its population. These all came back again, poorer and perhaps wiser; at least, their necessities compelled them to go to work and weaned them somewhat of their extravagant habits and their disinclination to work except for the large returns of earlier days. Since 1857 the growth of the city has been steady, unmarked by real estate booms; nor has it been retarded by long periods of financial depression.

CHAPTER XXVII.

CRIME, CRIMINALS AND VIGILANCE COMMITTEES.

THERE was but little crime in California among its white inhabitants during the Spanish and Mexican eras of its history. The conditions were not conducive to the development of a criminal element. The inhabitants were a pastoral people, pursuing an outdoor vocation, and there were no large towns or cities where the viciously inclined could congregate and find a place of refuge from justice. "From 1819 to 1846, that is, during the entire period of Mexican domination under the Republic," says Bancroft, "there were but six murders among the whites in all California." There were no lynchings, no mobs, unless some of the revolutionary uprisings might be called such, and but one vigilance committee.

San Francisco is credited with the origin of that form of popular tribunal known as the vigilance committee. The name "vigilance committee" originated with the uprising, in 1851, of the people of that city against the criminal element; but, years before there was a city of San Francisco, Los Angeles had originated a tribunal of the people, had taken criminals from the lawfully constituted authorities and had tried and executed them. The causes which called into existence the first vigilance committee in California were similar to those that created the later ones, namely, laxity in the administration of the laws and distrust in the integrity of those chosen to administer them. During the "decade of revolutions," that is, between 1830 and 1840, the frequent change of rulers and the struggles of the different factious for power engendered in the masses a disregard, not only for their rulers, but for law and order as well. Criminals escaped punishment through the law's delays. No court in California had power to pass sentence of death on a civilian until its findings had been approved by the superior tribunal of Mexico. In the slow and tedious processes of the different courts, a criminal stood a good show of dying of old age before his case reached final adjudication. The first committee of vigilance in California was organized at Los Angeles, in the house of Juan Temple, April 7, 1836. It was called "Junta Defensora de La Seguridad Publica," United Defenders of the Public Security (or safety). Its motto, which appears in the heading of its "acta," and is there credited as a quotation from Montesquieu's Exposition of the Laws, Book 26, Chapter 23, was, "Salus populi suprema lex est" (The safety of the people is the supreme law). There is a marked similarity between the proceedings of the Junta Defensora of 1836 and the San Francisco vigilance committee of 1856; it is not probable, however, that any of the actors in the latter committee participated in the former. Although there is quite a full account of the proceedings of the Junta Defensora in the Los Angeles city archives, no historian heretofore except Bancroft seems to have found it.

The circumstances which brought about the organization of the Junta Defensora are as follows: The wife of Domingo Feliz (part owner of the Los Feliz Rancho), who bore the poetical name of Maria del Rosario Villa, became infatuated with a handsome but disreputable Sonoran vaquero, Gervacio Alispaz by name. She abandoned her husband and lived with Alispaz as his mistress at San Gabriel. Feliz sought to reclaim his erring wife, but was met by insults and abuse from her paramour, whom he once wounded in a personal altercation. Feliz finally invoked the aid of the authorities. The woman was arrested and brought to town. A reconciliation was effected between the husband and wife. Two days later they left town for the rancho, both riding one horse. On the way they were met by Alispaz, and in a personal encounter Feliz was stabbed to death by the wife's paramour. The body was dragged into a ravine and covered with brush and leaves. Next day, March 29, the body was found and brought to the city. The murderer and the woman were arrested and imprisoned. The people were filled with horror and indignation, and there were threats of summary vengeance, but better counsel prevailed.

On the 30th the funeral of Feliz took place, and, like that of James King of William, twenty years later, was the occasion for the renewal of the outcry for vengeance. The attitude of the people became so threatening that on the 1st of April an extraordinary session of the ayuntamiento was held. A call was made upon the citizens to form an organization to preserve the peace. A considerable number responded and were formed into military patrols under the command of Don Juan B. Leandry. The illustrious ayuntamiento resolved "that whomsoever shall disturb the public tranquillity shall be punished according to law." The excitement apparently died out, but it was only the calm that precedes the storm. The beginning of the Easter ceremonies was at hand, and it was deemed a sacrilege to execute the assassins in holy week, so all further attempts at punishment were deferred until April 7, the Monday after Easter, when at dawn, by previous understanding, a number of the better class of citizens met at the house of Juan Temple, which stood on the present site of the Downey Block. An organization was effected. Victor Prudon, a native of Breton, France, but a naturalized citizen of California, was elected president; Manuel Arzaga, a native of California, was elected secretary, and Francisco Araujo, a retired army officer, was placed in command of the armed force. Speeches were made by Prudon, and by the military commandant and others, setting forth the necessity of their organization and justifying their actions. It was unanimously decided that both the man and the woman should be shot; their guilt being evident, no trial was deemed necessary.

An address to the authorities and the people was formulated. A copy of this is preserved in the city archives. It abounds in metaphors. It is too long for insertion here. I make a few extracts: " * * * Believing that immorality has reached such an extreme that public security is menaced and will be lost if the dike of a solemn example is not opposed to the torrent of atrocious perfidy, we demand of you that you execute or deliver to us for immediate execution the assassin, Gervacio Alispaz, and the unfaithful Maria del Rosario Villa, his accomplice. * * * Nature trembles at the sight of these venomous reptiles and the soil turns barren in its refusal to support their detestable existence. Let the infernal pair perish! It is the will of the people. We will not lay down our arms until our petition is granted and the murderers are executed. The proof of their guilt is so clear that justice needs no investigation. Public vengeance demands an example and it must be given. The blood of the Alvarez, of the Patinos, of the Jenkins, is not yet cold—they, too, being the unfortunate victims of the brutal passions of their murderers. Their bloody ghosts shriek for vengeance. Their terrible voices re-echo from their graves. The afflicted widow, the forsaken orphan, the aged father, the brother in mourning, the inconsolable mother, the public—all demand speedy punishment of the guilty. We swear that outraged justice shall be avenged to-day or we shall die in the attempt. The blood of the murderers shall be shed to-day or ours will be to the last drop. It will be published throughout the world that judges in Los Angeles tolerate murderers, but that there are virtuous citizens who sacrifice their lives in order to preserve those of their countrymen."

"A committee will deliver to the First Constitutional Alcalde a copy of these resolutions, that he may decide whatever he finds most convenient, and one hour's time will be given him in which to do so. If in that time no answer has been received, then the judge will be responsible before God and man for what will follow. Death to the murderers!

"God and liberty. Angeles, April 7, 1836."

Fifty-five signatures are attached to this document; fourteen of these are those of naturalized foreigners and the remainder those of native Californians. The junta was made up of the best citizens, native and foreign. An extraordinary session of the ayuntamiento was called. The members of the junta, fully armed, marched to the city hall to await the decision of the authorities. The petition was discussed in the council, and, in the language of the archives: "This Illustrious Body decided to call said Breton Prudon to appear before it and to compel him to retire with the armed citizens so that this Illustrious Body may deliberate at liberty."

"This was done, but he declined to appear before this body, as he and the armed citizens were determined to obtain Gervacio Alispaz and Maria del Rosario Villa. The ayuntamiento decided that as it had not sufficient force to compel the armed citizens to disband, they being in large numbers and composed of the best and most respectable men of the town, to send an answer saying that the judges could not accede to the demand of the armed citizens."

The members of the Junta Defensora then marched in a body to the jail and demanded the keys of the guard. These were refused. The keys were secured by force and Gervacio Alispaz taken out and shot. The following demand was then sent to the first alcalde, Manuel Requena:

"It is absolutely necessary that you deliver to this junta the key of the apartment where Maria del Rosario Villa is kept.

"God and liberty.

"VICTOR PRUDON, President.

"MANUEL ARZAGA, Secretary."

To this the alcalde replied: "Maria del Rosario Villa is incarcerated at a private dwelling, whose owner has the key, with instructions not to deliver the same to any one. The prisoner is left there at the disposition of the law only.

"God and liberty.

"MANUEL REQUENA, Alcalde."

The key was obtained. The wretched Maria was taken to the place of execution on a carreta and shot. The bodies of the guilty pair were brought back to the jail and the following communication sent to the alcalde:

"Junta of the Defenders of Public Safety.

"To the 1st Constitutional Alcalde:

"The dead bodies of Gervacio Alispaz and Maria del Rosario Villa are at your disposal. We also forward you the jail keys that you may deliver them to whomsoever is on guard. In case you are in need of men to serve as guards, we are all at your disposal.

"God and liberty. Angeles, April 7, 1836.

"VICTOR PRUDON, Pres.

"MANUEL ARZAGA, Sec."

A few days later the Junta Defensora de La Seguridad Publica disbanded; and so ended the only instance in the seventy-five years of Spanish and Mexican rule in California, of the people, by popular tribunal, taking the administration of justice out of the hands of the legally constituted authorities.

The tales of the fabulous richness of the gold fields of California were quickly spread throughout the world and drew to the territory all classes and conditions of men, the bad as well as the good, the vicious as well as the virtuous; the indolent, the profligate and the criminal came to prey upon the industrious. These conglomerate elements of society found the Land of Gold practically without law, and the vicious among them were not long in making it a land without order. With that inherent trait, which makes the Anglo-Saxon wherever he may be an organizer, the American element of the gold seekers soon adjusted a form of government to suit the exigencies of the land and the people. There may have been too much lynching, too much vigilance committee in it and too little respect for lawfully constituted authorities, but it was effective and was suited to the social conditions existing.

In 1851 the criminal element became so dominant as to seriously threaten the existence of the chief city, San Francisco. Terrible conflagrations had swept over the city in May and June of that year and destroyed the greater part of the business portion. The fires were known to be of incendiary origin. The bold and defiant attitude of the vicious classes led to the organization by the better element, of that form of popular tribunal called a committee of vigilance. The law abiding element among the citizens disregarding the legally constituted authorities, who were either too weak or too corrupt to control the law-defying, took the power in their own hands, organized a vigilance committee and tried and executed by hanging four notorious criminals, namely: Jenkins, Stuart, Whitaker and McKenzie.

During the proceedings of the vigilance committee a case of mistaken identity came near costing an innocent man his life. About 8 o'clock in the evening of February 18, two men entered the store of a Mr. Jansen on Montgomery street and asked to see some blankets. As the merchant stooped to get the blankets one of the men struck him with a sling shot and both of them beat him into insensibility. They then opened his desk and carried away all the gold they could find, about $2,000. The police arrested two men on suspicion of being the robbers. One of the men was identified as James Stuart, a noted criminal, who had murdered Sheriff Moore at Auburn. He gave the name of Thomas Burdue, but this was believed to be one of Stuart's numerous aliases. The men were identified by Mr. Jansen as his assailants. They were put on trial. When the court adjourned over to the next day a determined effort was made by the crowd to seize the men and hang them. They were finally taken out of the hands of the officers and given a trial by a jury selected by a committee of citizens. The jury failed to agree, three of the jury being convinced that the men were not Jansen's assailants. Then the mob made a rush to hang the jury, but were kept back by a show of revolvers. The prisoners were turned over to the court. One of them, Wildred, broke jail and escaped. Burdue was tried, convicted and sentenced to fourteen years' imprisonment. Before the sentence of the court was executed he was taken to Marysville and arraigned for the murder of Sheriff Moore. A number of witnesses swore positively that the man was Stuart; others swore even more positively that he was not. A close examination revealed that the prisoner bore every distinguishing mark on his person by which Stuart could be identified. He was convicted and sentenced to be hanged in thirty days. In the meantime the vigilance committee of 1856 was organized and the real Stuart accidentally fell into the hands of the vigilantes at San Francisco. He was arrested for a theft he had not committed and recognized by one of the committee's guards that he had formerly employed in the mines. By adroit questioning he was forced to confess that he was the real Stuart, the murderer of Sheriff Moore and the assailant of Jansen. His confederate in the robbery was Whitaker, one of the four hanged by the committee. Burdue was finally released, after having twice stood under the shadow of the gallows for the crimes of his double. The confessions of Stuart and Whitaker implicated a number of their pals. Some of these were convicted and sent to prison and others fled the country; about thirty were banished. Nearly all of the criminals were ex-convicts from Australia and Tasmania.

The vigorous measures adopted by the committee purified the city of the vicious class that had preyed upon it. Several of the smaller towns and some of the mining camps organized vigilance committees and a number of the knaves who had fled from San Francisco met a deserved fate in other places.

In the early '50s the better elements of San Francisco's population were so engrossed in business that they had no time to spare to look after its political affairs; and its government gradually drifted into the hands of vicious and corrupt men. Many of the city authorities had obtained their offices by fraud and ballot stuffing and "instead of protecting the community against scoundrels they protected the scoundrels against the community." James King of William, an ex-banker and a man of great courage and persistence, started a small paper called the Daily Evening Bulletin. He vigorously assailed the criminal elements and the city and county officials. His denunciations aroused public sentiment. The murder of United States Marshal Richardson by a gambler named Cora still further inflamed the public mind. It was feared that by the connivance of some of the corrupt county officials Cora would escape punishment. His trial resulted in a hung jury. There was a suspicion that some of the jurymen were bribed. King continued through the Bulletin to hurl his most bitter invectives against the corrupt officials. They determined to silence him. He published the fact that James Casey, a supervisor from the twelfth ward, was an ex-convict of Sing Sing prison. Casey waylaid King at the corner of Montgomery and Washington streets and in a cowardly manner shot him down. The shooting occurred on the 14th of May, 1856. Casey immediately surrendered himself to a deputy sheriff, Lafayette M. Byrne, who was near. King was not killed, but an examination of the wound by the physicians decided that there was no hopes of his recovery. Casey was conducted to the city prison and as a mob began to gather, for greater safety he was taken to the county jail. A crowd pursued him crying, "Hang him," "kill him." At the jail the mob was stopped by an array of deputy sheriffs, police officers and a number of Casey's friends, all armed. The excitement spread throughout the city. The old vigilance committee of 1851, or rather a new organization out of the remnant of the old, was formed. Five thousand men were enrolled in a few days. Arms were procured and headquarters established on Sacramento street between Davis and Front. The men were divided into companies. William T. Coleman, chairman of the vigilance committee of 1851, was made president or No. 1, and Isaac Bluxome, Jr., the secretary, was No. 33. Each man was known by number. Charles Doane was elected chief marshal of the military division.

The San Francisco Herald (edited by John Nugent), then the leading paper of the city, came out with a scathing editorial denouncing the vigilance committee. The merchants at once withdrew their advertising patronage. Next morning the paper appeared reduced from forty columns to a single page, but still hostile to the committee. It finally died for want of patronage.

On Sunday, May 18, 1856, the military division was ready to storm the jail if necessary to obtain possession of the prisoners, Casey and Cora. The different companies, marching from their headquarters by certain prescribed routes, all reached the jail at the same time and completely invested it. They had with them two pieces of artillery. One of these guns was planted so as to command the door of the jail. There were fifteen hundred vigilantes under arms. A demand was made on Sheriff Scannell for the prisoners, Cora and Casey. The prison guard made no resistance, the prisoners were surrendered and taken at once to the vigilantes' headquarters.

On the 20th of May the murderers were put on trial; while the trial was in progress the death of King was announced. Both men were convicted and sentenced to be hanged. King's funeral, the largest and most imposing ever seen in San Francisco, took place on the 23d. While the funeral cortege was passing through the streets Casey and Cora were hanged in front of the windows of the vigilance headquarters. About an hour before his execution Cora was married to a notorious courtesan, Arabella Ryan, but commonly called Belle Cora. A Catholic priest, Father Accolti, performed the ceremony.

Governor J. Neely Johnson, who at first seemed inclined not to interfere with the vigilantes, afterwards acting under the advice of David S. Terry, Volney E. Howard and others of dominant pro-slavery faction, issued a proclamation commanding the committee to disband, to which no attention was paid. The governor then appointed William T. Sherman major-general. Sherman called for recruits to suppress the uprising. Seventy-five or a hundred, mostly gamblers, responded to his call. General Wool, in command of the troops in the department of the Pacific, refused to loan Governor Johnson arms to equip his "law and order" recruits and General Sherman resigned. Volney E. Howard was then appointed major-general. His principal military service consisted in proclaiming what he would do to the "pork merchants" who constituted the committee. He did nothing except to bluster. A squad of the vigilance police attempted to arrest a man named Maloney. Maloney was at the time in the company of David S. Terry (then chief justice of the state) and several other members of the "law and order" party. They resisted the police and in the melee Terry stabbed the sergeant of the squad, Sterling A. Hopkins, and then he and his associates made their escape to the armory of the San Francisco Blues, one of their strongholds.

When the report of the stabbing reached headquarters the great bell sounded the alarm and the vigilantes in a very brief space of time surrounded the armory building and had their cannon planted to batter it down. Terry, Maloney, and the others of their party in the building, considering discretion the better part of valor, surrendered and were at once taken to Fort Gunnybags,* the vigilantes' headquarters. The arms of the "law and order" party at their various rendezvous were surrendered to the vigilantes and the companies disbanded.

Terry was closely confined in a cell at the headquarters of the committee; Hopkins, after lingering some time between life and death, finally recovered. Terry was tried for assault on Hopkins and upon several other persons, was found guilty, but, after being held as a prisoner for some time, was finally released. He at once joined Johnson and Howard at Sacramento, where he felt much safer than in San Francisco. He gave the vigilantes no more trouble.

On the 20th of July, Hethrington and Brace were hanged from a gallows erected on Davis street, between Sacramento and Commercial. Both of these men had committed murder. These were the last executions by the committee. The committee transported from the state thirty disreputable characters and a number deported themselves. A few, and among them the notorious Ned McGowan, managed to keep concealed until the storm was over. A few of the expatriated returned after the committee dissolved and brought suit for damages, but failed to recover anything. The committee had paid the fare of the exiles. It was only the high toned rascals who were given a cabin passage that brought the suits. The committee finished its labors and dissolved with a grand parade on the 18th of August (1856). It did a good work. For several years after, San Francisco from being one of the worst, became one of the best governed cities in the United States. The committee was made up of men from the northern and western states. The so-called "law and order" party was mostly composed of the pro-slavery office-holding faction that ruled the state at that time.

When the vigilance committees between 1851 and 1856 drove disreputable characters from San Francisco and the northern mines, many of them drifted southward and found a lodgment for a time in the southern cities and towns. Los Angeles was not far from the Mexican line, and any one who desired to escape from justice, fleet mounted, could speedily put himself beyond the reach of his pursuers. All these causes and influences combined to produce a saturnalia of crime that disgraced that city in the early '50s.

Gen. J. H. Bean, a prominent citizen of Southern California, while returning to Los Angeles from his place of business at San Gabriel late one evening in November, 1852, was attacked by two men, who had been lying in wait for him. One seized the bridle of his horse and jerked the animal back on his haunches; the other seized the general and pulled him from the saddle. Bean made a desperate resistance, but was overpowered and stabbed to death. The assassination of General Bean resulted in the organization of a vigilance committee and an effort was made to rid the country of desperadoes. A number of arrests were made. Three suspects were tried by the committee for various crimes. One, Cipiano Sandoval, a poor cobbler of San Gabriel, was charged with complicity in the murder of General Bean. He strenuously maintained that he was innocent. He, with the other two, were sentenced to be hanged. On the following Sunday morning the doomed men were conducted to the top of Fort Hill, where the gallows stood. Sandoval made a brief speech, again declaring his innocence. The others awaited their doom in silence. The trap fell and all were launched into eternity. Years afterward one of the real murderers on his deathbed revealed the truth and confessed his part in the crime. The poor cobbler was innocent.

In 1854 drunkenness, gambling, murder and all forms of immorality and crime were rampant in Los Angeles. The violent deaths, it is said, averaged one for every day in the year. It was a common question at the breakfast table, "Well, how many were killed last-night?" Little or no attention was paid to the killing of an Indian or a half breed; it was only when a gente de razon was the victim that the community was aroused to action.

The Kern river gold rush, in the winter of 1854-55, brought from the northern mines fresh relays of gamblers and desperadoes and crime increased. The Southern Californian of March 7, 1855, commenting on the general lawlessness prevailing, says: "Last Sunday night was a brisk night for killing. Four men were shot and killed and several wounded in shooting affairs."

A worthless fellow by the name of David Brown, who had, without provocation, killed a companion named Clifford, was tried and sentenced to be hanged with one Felipe Alvitre, a Mexican, who had murdered an American named Ellington, at El Monte. There was a feeling among the people that Brown, through quibbles of law, would escape the death penalty, and there was talk of lynching. Stephen C. Foster, the mayor, promised that if justice was not legally meted out to Brown by the law, then he would resign his office and head the lynching party. January 10, 1855, an order was received from Judge Murray, of the supreme court, staying the execution of Brown, but leaving Alvitre to his fate. January 12 Alvitre was hanged by the sheriff in the jail yard in the presence of an immense crowd. The gallows were taken down and the guards dismissed. The crowd gathered outside the jail yard. Speeches were made. The mayor resigned his office and headed the mob. The doors of the jail were broken down; Brown was taken across Spring street to a large gateway opening into a corral and hanged from the crossbeam. Foster was re-elected by an almost unanimous vote at a special election. The city marshal, who had opposed the action of the vigilantes, was compelled to resign.

During 1855 and 1856 lawlessness increased. There was an organized band of about one hundred Mexicans, who patrolled the highways, robbing and murdering. They threatened the extermination of the Americans and there were fears of a race war, for many who were not members of the gang sympathized with them. In 1856 a vigilance committee was organized with Myron Norton as president and H. N. Alexander as secretary. A number of disreputable characters were forced to leave town. The banditti, under their leaders, Pancho Daniel and Juan Flores, were plundering and committing outrages in the neighborhood of San Juan Capistrano.

On the night of January 22, 1857, Sheriff James R. Barton left Los Angeles with a posse, consisting of William H. Little, Charles K. Baker, Charles F. Daley, Alfred Hardy and Frank Alexander with the intention of capturing some of the robbers. At Sepulveda's ranch next morning the sheriff's party was warned that the robbers were some fifty strong, well armed and mounted, and would probably attack them. Twelve miles further the sheriff and his men encountered a detachment of the banditti. A short, sharp engagement took place. Barton, Baker, Little and Daley were killed. Hardy and Alexander made their escape by the fleetness of their horses. When the news reached Los Angeles the excitement became intense. A public meeting was held to devise plans to rid the community not only of the roving gang of murderers, but also of the criminal classes in the city, who were known to be in sympathy with the banditti. All suspicious houses were searched and some fifty persons arrested. Several companies were organized; the infantry to guard the city and the mounted men to scour the country. Companies were also formed at San Bernardino and El Monte, while the military authorities at Fort Tejon and San Diego despatched soldiers to aid in the good work of exterminating crime and criminals.

The robbers were pursued into the mountains and nearly all captured. Gen. Andres Pico, with a company of native Californians, was most efficient in the pursuit. He captured Silvas and Ardillero, two of the most noted of the gang, and hanged them where they were captured. Fifty-two were lodged in the city jail. Of these, eleven were hanged for various crimes and the remainder set free. Juan Flores, one of the leaders, was condemned by popular vote and on February 14, 1857, was hanged near the top of Fort Hill in the presence of nearly the entire population of the town. He was only twenty-one years of age. Pancho Daniel, another of the leaders, was captured on the 19th of January, 1858, near San José. He was found by the sheriff, concealed in a haystack. After his arrest he was part of the time in jail and part of the time out on bail. He had been tried three times, but through law quibbles had escaped conviction. A change of venue to Santa Barbara had been granted. The people determined to take the law in their own hands. On the morning of November 30, 1858, the body of Pancho was hanging from a beam across the gateway of the jail yard. Four of the banditti were executed by the people of San Gabriel, and Leonardo Lopez, under sentence of the court, was hanged by the sheriff. The gang was broken up and the moral atmosphere of Los Angeles somewhat purified.

November 17, 1862, John Rains of Cucamonga ranch was murdered near Azusa. December 9, 1863, the sheriff was taking Manuel Cerradel to San Quentin to serve a ten years' sentence. When the sheriff went aboard the tug boat Cricket at Wilmington, to proceed to the Senator, quite a number of other persons took passage. On the way down the harbor, the prisoner was seized by the passengers, who were vigilantes, and hanged to the rigging; after hanging twenty minutes the body was taken down, stones tied to the feet and it was thrown overboard. Cerradel was implicated in the murder of Rains.

In the fall of 1863 lawlessness had again become rampant in Los Angeles; one of the chiefs of the criminal class was a desperado by the name of Boston Dainwood. He was suspected of the murder of a miner on the desert and was loud in his threats against the lives of various citizens. He and four other well-known criminals, Wood, Chase, Ybarra and Olivas, all of whom were either murderers or horse thieves, were lodged in jail. On the 21st of November two hundred armed citizens battered down the doors of the jail, took the five wretches out and hanged them to the portico of the old court house on Spring street, which stood on the present site of the Phillips block.

On the 24th of October, 1871, occurred in Los Angeles a most disgraceful affair, known as the Chinese massacre. It grew out of one of those interminable feuds between rival tongues of highbinders, over a woman. Desultory firing had been kept up between the rival factions throughout the day. About 5:30 p. m. Policeman Bilderrain visited the seat of war, an old adobe house on the corner of Arcadia street and "Nigger alley," known as the Colonel building. Finding himself unable to quell the disturbance he called for help. Robert Thompson, an old resident of the city, was among the first to reach the porch of the house in answer to the police call for help. He received a mortal wound from a bullet fired through the door of a Chinese store. He died an hour later in Wollweber's drug store. The Chinese in the meantime barricaded the doors and windows of the old adobe and prepared for battle. The news of the fight and of the killing of Thompson spread throughout the city and an immense crowd gathered in the streets around the building with the intention of wreaking vengeance on the Chinese.

The first attempt by the mob to dislodge the Chinamen was by cutting holes through the flat brea covered roof and firing pistol shots into the interior of the building. One of the besieged crawled out of the building and attempted to escape, but was shot down before half way across Negro alley. Another attempted to escape into Los Angeles street; he was seized, dragged to the gate of Tomlinson's corral on New High street, and hanged.

About 9 o'clock a part of the mob had succeeded in battering a hole in the eastern end of the building; through this the rioters, with demoniac howlings, rushed in, firing pistols to the right and left. Huddled in corners and hidden behind boxes they found eight terror-stricken Chinamen, who begged piteously for their lives. These were brutally dragged out and turned over to the fiendish mob. One was dragged to death by a rope around his neck; three, more dead than alive from kicking and beating, were hanged to a wagon on Los Angeles street; and four were hanged to the gateway of Tomlinson's corral. Two of the victims were mere boys. While the shootings and hangings were going on thieves were looting the other houses in the Chinese quarters. The houses were broken into, trunks, boxes and other receptacles rifled of their contents, and any Chinamen found in the buildings were dragged forth to slaughter. Among the victims was a doctor, Gene Tung, a quiet, inoffensive old man. He pleaded for his life in good English, offering his captors all his money, some $2,000 to $3,000. He was hanged, his money stolen and one of his fingers cut off to obtain a ring he wore. The amount of money stolen by the mob from the Chinese quarters was variously estimated at from $40,000 to $50,000.

About 9:30 p. m. the law abiding citizens, under the leadership of Henry Hazard, R. M. Widney, H. C. Austin, Sheriff Burns and others, had rallied in sufficient force to make an attempt to quell the mob. Proceeding to Chinatown they rescued several Chinamen from the rioters. The mob finding armed opposition quickly dispersed.

The results of the mob's murderous work were ten men hanged on Los Angeles street, some to wagons and some to awnings; five hanged at Tomlinson's corral and four shot to death in Negro alley, nineteen in all. Of all the Chinamen murdered, the only one known to be implicated in the highbinder war was Ah Choy. All the other leaders escaped to the country before the attack was made by the mob. The grand jury, after weeks of investigation, found indictments against one hundred and fifty persons alleged to have been actively engaged in the massacre. The jury's report severely censured "the officers of this county, as well as of this city, whose duty it is to preserve peace," and declared that they "were deplorably inefficient in the performance of their duty during the scenes of confusion and bloodshed which disgraced our city, and has cast a reproach upon the people of Los Angeles county." Of all those indicted but six were convicted. These were sentenced to from four to six years in the state's prison, but through some legal technicality they were all released after serving a part of their sentence.

The last execution in Los Angeles by a vigilance committee was that of Michael Lachenias, a French desperado, who had killed five or six men. The offense for which he was hanged was the murder of Jacob Bell, a little inoffensive man, who owned a small farm near that of Lachenias, south of the city. There had been a slight difference between them in regard to the use of water from a zanja. Lachenias, without a word of warning, rode up to Bell, where he was at work in his field, drew a revolver and shot him dead. The murderer then rode into town and boastfully informed the people of what he had done and told them where they would find Bell's body. He then surrendered himself to the officers and was locked up in jail.

Public indignation was aroused. A meeting was held in Stearns' hall on Los Angeles street. A vigilance committee was formed and the details of the execution planned. On the morning of the 17th of December, 1870, a body of three hundred armed men marched to the jail, took Lachenias out and proceeded with him to Tomlinson's corral on Temple and New High streets, and hanged him. The crowd then quietly dispersed.

A strange metamorphosis took place in the character of the lower classes of the native Californians after the conquest. (The better classes were not changed in character by the changed conditions of the country, but throughout were true gentlemen and most worthy and honorable citizens.) Before the conquest by the Americans they were a peaceful and contented people. There were no organized bands of outlaws among them. After the discovery of gold the evolution of a banditti began and they produced some of the boldest robbers and most daring highwaymen the world has seen.

The injustice of their conquerors had much to do with producing this change. The Americans not only took possession of their country and its government, but in many cases they despoiled them of their ancestral acres and their personal property. Injustice rankles; and it is not strange that the more lawless among the native population sought revenge and retaliation. They were often treated by the rougher American element as aliens and intruders, who had no right in the land of their birth. Such treatment embittered them more than loss of property. There were those, however, among the natives, who, once entered upon a career of crime, found robbery and murder congenial occupations. The plea of injustice was no extenuation for their crimes.

Joaquin Murieta was the most noted of the Mexican and Californian desperadoes of the early '50s. He was born in Sonora of good family and received some education. He came to California with the Sonoran migration of 1849, and secured a rich claim on the Stanislaus. He was dispossessed of this by half a dozen American desperadoes, his wife abused and both driven from the diggings. He next took up a ranch on the Calaveras, but from this he was driven by two Americans. He next tried mining in the Murphy diggings, but was unsuccessful. His next occupation was that of a monte player. While riding into town on a horse borrowed from his half-brother he was stopped by an American, who claimed that the horse was stolen from him. Joaquin protested that the horse was a borrowed one from his half-brother and offered to procure witnesses to prove it. He was dragged from the saddle amid cries of "hang the greaser." He was taken to the ranch of his brother. The brother was hanged to the limb of a tree, no other proof of his crime being needed than the assertion of the American that the horse was his. Joaquin was stripped, bound to the same tree and flogged. The demon was aroused within him, and no wonder, he vowed revenge on the men who had murdered his brother and beaten him. Faithfully he carried out his vow of vengeance. Had he doomed only these to slaughter it would have been but little loss, but the implacable foe of every American, he made the innocent suffer with the guilty. He was soon at the head of a band of desperadoes, varying in numbers from twenty to forty. For three years he and his band were the terror of the state. From the northern mines to the Mexican border they committed robberies and murders. Claudio and some of his subordinates were killed, but the robber chief seemed to bear a charmed life. Large rewards were offered for him dead or alive and numerous attempts were made to take him. Capt. Harry Love at the head of a band of rangers August, 1853, came upon Joaquin and six of his gang in a camp near the Tejon Pass. In the fight that ensued Joaquin and Three Fingered Jack were killed. With the loss of their leaders the organization was broken up.

The last organized band of robbers which terrorized the southern part of the state was that of Vasquez. Tiburcio Vasquez was born in Monterey county, of Mexican parents, in 1837. Early in life he began a career of crime. After committing a number of robberies and thefts he was captured and sent to San Quentin for horse stealing. He was discharged in 1863, but continued his disreputable career. He united with Procopio and Soto, two noted bandits. Soto was killed by Sheriff Morse of Alameda county in a desperate encounter. Vasquez and his gang of outlaws committed robberies throughout the southern part of the state, ranging from Santa Clara and Alameda counties to the Mexican line. Early in May, 1874, Sheriff William Rowland of Los Angeles county, who had repeatedly tried to capture Vasquez, but whose plans had been foiled by the bandit's spies, learned that the robber chief was making his headquarters at the house of Greek George, about ten miles due west of Los Angeles, toward Santa Monica, in a cañon of the Cahuenga mountains. The morning of May 15 was set for the attack. To avert suspicion Sheriff Rowland remained in the city. The attacking force, eight in number, were under command of Under-Sheriff Albert Johnson, the other members of the force were Major H. M. Mitchell, attorney-at-law; J. S. Bryant, city constable; E. Harris, policeman; W. E. Rogers, citizen; B. F. Hartley, chief of police; and D. K. Smith, citizen, all of Los Angeles, and a Mr. Beers, of San Francisco, special correspondent of the San Francisco Chronicle.

At 4 a. m. on the morning of the 15th of May the posse reached Major Mitchell's bee ranch in a small cañon not far from Greek George's. From this point the party reconnoitered the bandit's hiding place and planned an attack. As the deputy sheriff and his men were about to move against the house a high box wagon drove up the cañon from the direction of Greek George's place. In this were two natives; the sheriff's party climbed into the high wagon box and, lying down, compelled the driver to drive up to the back of Greek George's house, threatening him and his companion with death on the least sign of treachery. Reaching the house they surrounded it and burst in the door. Vasquez, who had been eating his breakfast, attempted to escape through a small window. The party opened fire on him. Being wounded and finding himself surrounded on all sides, he surrendered. He was taken to the Los Angeles jail. His injuries proved to be mere flesh wounds. He received a great deal of maudlin sympathy from silly women, who magnified him into a hero. He was taken to San José, tried for murder, found guilty and hanged, March 19, 1875. His band was thereupon broken up and dispersed.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

FILIBUSTERS AND FILIBUSTERING.

THE rush of immigration to California in the early '50s had brought to the state a class of adventurers who were too lazy or too proud to work. They were ready to engage in almost any lawless undertaking that promised plunder and adventure. The defeat of the pro-slavery politicians in their attempts to fasten their "peculiar institution" upon any part of the territory acquired from Mexico had embittered them. The more unscrupulous among them began to look around for new fields, over which slavery might be extended. As it could be made profitable only in southern lands, Cuba, Mexico and Central America became the arenas for enacting that form of piracy called "filibustering." The object of these forays, when organized by Americans, was to seize upon territory as had been done in Texas and erect it into an independent government that ultimately would be annexed to the United States and become slave territory. Although the armed invasion of countries with which the United States was at peace was a direct violation of its neutrality laws, yet the federal office-holders in the southern states and in California, all of whom belonged to the pro-slavery faction, not only made no attempt to prevent these invasions, but secretly aided them or at least sympathized with them to the extent of allowing them to recruit men and depart without molestation. There was a glamour of romance about these expeditions that influenced unthinking young men of no fixed principles to join them; these were to be pitied. But the leaders of them and their abettors were cold, selfish, scheming politicians, willing, if need be, to overthrow the government of the nation and build on its ruins an oligarchy of slave holders.

The first to organize a filibuster expedition in California was a Frenchman. Race prejudices were strong in early mining days. The United States had recently been at war with Mexico. The easy conquest of that country had bred a contempt for its peoples. The Sonoran migration, that begun soon after the discovery of gold in California, brought a very undesirable class of immigrants to the state. Sailing vessels had brought from the west coast of South America another despised class of mongrel Spanish. It exasperated the Americans to see these people digging gold and carrying it out of the country. This antagonism extended, more or less, to all foreigners, but was strongest against men of the Latin races. Many Frenchmen, through emigration schemes gotten up in Paris, had been induced to come to California. Some of these were men of education and good standing, but they fell under the ban of prejudices and by petty persecutions were driven out of the mines and forced to earn a precarious living in the cities. There was a great deal of dissatisfaction among the Frenchmen with existing conditions in California, and they were ready to embark in any scheme that promised greater rewards. Among the French population of San Francisco was a man of noble family, Count Gaston Roaul de Raousset-Boulbon. He had lost his ancestral lands and was in reduced circumstances. He was a man of education and ability, but visionary. He conceived the idea of establishing a French colony on the Sonora border and opening the mines that had been abandoned on account of Apache depredations. By colonizing the border he hoped to put a stop to American encroachments. He divulged his scheme to the French consul, Dillon, at San Francisco, who entered heartily into it. Raousset was sent to the City of Mexico, where he obtained from President Arista the desired concession of land and the promise of financial assistance from a leading banking house there on condition that he proceed at once to Sonora with an armed company of Frenchmen. Returning to San Francisco he quickly recruited from among the French residents two hundred and fifty men and with these he sailed for Guaymas, where he arrived early in June, 1852. He was well received at first, but soon found himself regarded with suspicion. He was required by the authorities to remain at Guaymas. After a month's detention he was allowed to proceed through Hermosilla to the Arizona border.

When about one hundred miles from Arispe he received an order from General Blanco, then at Hermosilla, to report to him. While halting at El Caric to consider his next move he received a reinforcement of about eighty French colonists, who had come to the country the year before under command of Pindray. Pindray had met his death in a mysterious manner. It was supposed that he was poisoned. The colonist had remained in the country. Raousset sent one of his men, Garnier, to interview Blanco. General Blanco gave his ultimatum—First, that the Frenchmen should become naturalized citizens of Mexico; or, secondly, they should wait until letters of security could be procured from the capital, when they might proceed to Arizona and take possession of any mines they found; or, lastly, they might put themselves under the leadership of a Mexican officer and then proceed. Raousset and his followers refused to accede to any of these propositions. Blanco began collecting men and munitions of war to oppose the French. Raousset raised the flag of revolt and invited the inhabitants to join him in gaining the independence of Sonora. After drilling his men a few weeks and preparing for hostilities he began his march against Hermosilla, distant one hundred and fifty miles. He met with no opposition, the people along his route welcoming the French. General Blanco had twelve hundred men to defend the city. But instead of preparing to resist the advancing army he sent delegates to Raousset to offer him money to let the city alone. Raousset sent back word that at 8 o'clock he would begin the attack; and at 11 would be master of the city. He was as good as his word. The Frenchmen charged the Mexicans and although the opposing force numbered four to one of the assailants, Raousset's men captured the town and drove Blanco's troops out of it. The Mexican loss was two hundred killed and wounded. The French loss seventeen killed and twenty-three wounded. Raousset's men were mere adventurers and were in the country without any definite purpose. Could he have relied on them, he might have captured all of Sonora.

He abandoned Hermosilla. Blanco, glad to get rid of the filibusters on any terms, raised $11,000 and chartered a vessel to carry them back to San Francisco. A few elected to remain. Raousset went to Mazatlan and a few months later he reached San Francisco, where he was lionized as a hero. Upon an invitation from Santa Ana, who had succeeded Arista as president, he again visited the Mexican capital in June, 1853. Santa Ana was profuse in promises. He wanted Raousset to recruit five hundred Frenchmen to protect the Sonora frontier against the Indians, promising ample remuneration and good pay for their services. Raousset, finding that Santa Ana's promises could not be relied upon, and that the wily schemer was about to have him arrested, made his escape to Acapulco, riding several horses to death to reach there ahead of his pursuers. He embarked immediately for San Francisco.

In the meantime another filibuster, William Walker, with forty-one followers had landed at La Paz November 3, 1853, and proclaimed a new nation, the Republic of Lower California. Santa Ana, frightened by this new invasion, began making overtures through the Mexican consul, Luis del Valle, at San Francisco to secure French recruits for military service on the Mexican frontier. Del Valle applied to the French consul, Dillon, and Dillon applied to Raousset. Raousset soon secured eight hundred recruits and chartered the British ship Challenge to take them to Guaymas. Then the pro-slavery federal officials at San Francisco were aroused to action. The neutrality laws were being violated. It was not that they cared for the laws, but they feared that this new filibustering scheme might interfere with their pet, Walker, who had, in addition to the Republic of Lower California, founded another nation, the Republic of Sonora, in both of which he had decreed slavery. The ship was seized, but after a short detention was allowed to sail with three hundred Frenchmen.

Del Valle was vigorously prosecuted by the federal authorities for violation of a section of the neutrality laws, which forbade the enlistment within the United States of soldiers to serve under a foreign power. Dillon, the French consul, was implicated and on his refusal to testify in court he was arrested. He fell back on his dignity and asserted that his nation had been insulted through him and closed his consulate. For a time there were fears of international trouble.

Del Valle was found guilty of violating the neutrality laws, but was never punished. The pro-slavery pet, Walker, and his gang were driven out of Mexico and the federal officials had no more interest in enforcing neutrality laws. Meanwhile Raousset, after great difficulties, had joined the three hundred Frenchmen at Guaymas. A strip of northern Sonora had been sold under what is known as the Gadsden purchase to the United States. There was no longer any opportunity to secure mines there from Mexico, but Raousset thought he could erect a barrier to any further encroachments of the United States and eventually secure Mexico for France. His first orders on reaching Guaymas to the commander of the French, Desmaris, was to attack the Mexican troops and capture the city. His order did not reach Desmaris. His messenger was arrested and the Mexican authorities began collecting forces to oppose Raousset. Having failed to receive reinforcements, and his condition becoming unendurable, he made an attack on the Mexican forces, twelve hundred strong. After a brave assault he was defeated. He surrendered to the French consul on the assurance that his life and that of his men would be spared. He was treacherously surrendered by the French consul to the Mexican general. He was tried by a court-martial, found guilty and sentenced to be shot. On the morning of August 12, 1854, he was executed. His misguided followers were shipped back to San Francisco. So ended the first California filibuster.

The first American born filibuster who organized one of these piratical expeditions was William Walker, a native of Tennessee. He came to California with the rush of 1850. He had started out in life to be a doctor, had studied law and finally drifted into journalism. He belonged to the extreme pro-slavery faction. He located in San Francisco and found employment on the Herald. His bitter invective against the courts for their laxity in punishing crime raised the ire of Judge Levi Parsons, who fined Walker $500 for contempt of court and ordered him imprisoned until the fine was paid. Walker refused to pay the fine and went to jail. He at once bounded into notoriety. He was a martyr to the freedom of the press. A public indignation meeting was called. An immense crowd of sympathizers called on Walker in jail. A writ of habeas corpus was sued out and he was released from jail and discharged. In the legislature of 1852 he tried to have Parson impeached, but failed. He next opened a law office in Marysville.

The success of Raousset-Boulbon in his first expedition to Sonora had aroused the ambition of Walker to become the founder of a new government. His first efforts were directed towards procuring from Mexico a grant on the Sonora border; this was to be colonized with Americans, who would protect the Mexican frontier from Apache incursion. This was a mere subterfuge and the Mexican authorities were not deceived by it—he got no grant. To forestall Raousset-Boulbon, who was again in the field with his revolutionary scheme, Walker opened a recruiting office. Each man was to receive a square league of land and plunder galore. The bait took, meetings were held, scrip sold and recruits flocked to Walker. The brig Arrow was chartered to carry the liberators to their destination. The pro-slavery officials, who held all the offices, winked at this violation of the neutrality laws. There was but one man, General Hitchcock, who dared to do his duty. He seized the vessel; it was released, and Hitchcock removed from command. Jefferson Davis was secretary of war and Hitchcock was made to feel his wrath for interfering with one of Davis' pet projects, the extension of slavery. Walker sailed in another vessel, the Caroline, taking with him forty-one of his followers, well armed with rifles and revolvers to develop the resources of the country.

The vessel with Walker and his gang sneaked into La Paz under cover of a Mexican flag. He seized the unsuspecting governor and other officials and then proclaimed the Republic of Lower California. He appointed from his following a number of officials with high sounding titles. He adopted the code of Louisiana as the law of the land. This, as far as he was able, introduced into the country human slavery, which indeed was about the sole purpose of his filibustering schemes. Fearing that the Mexican government might send an expedition across the gulf to stop his marauding, he slipped out of the harbor and sailed up to Todas Santos, so as to be near the United States in case the Mexican government should make it uncomfortable for him. With this as headquarters he began preparations for an invasion of Sonora. His delectable followers appropriated to their own use whatever they could find in the poverty-stricken country. The news of the great victory at La Paz reached San Francisco and created great enthusiasm among Walker's sympathizers. His vice-president, Watkins, enrolled three hundred recruits and sent them to him, "greatly to the relief of the criminal calendar."

Walker began to drill his recruits for the conquest of Sonora. These patriots, who had rallied to the support of the new republic, under the promise of rich churches to pillage and well-stocked ranches to plunder, did not take kindly to a diet of jerked beef and beans and hard drilling under a torrid sun. Some rebelled and it became necessary for Walker to use the lash and even to shoot two of them for the good of the cause. The natives rebelled when they found their cattle and frijoles disappearing and the so-called battle of La Gualla was fought between the natives and a detachment of Walker's foragers, several of whom were killed. The news of this battle reached San Francisco and was magnified into a great victory. The new republic had been baptized in the blood of its martyrs.

After three months spent in drilling, Walker began his march to Sonora with but one hundred men, and a small herd of cattle for food. Most of the others had deserted. In his journey across the desert the Indians stole some of his cattle and more of his men deserted. On reaching the Colorado river about half of his force abandoned the expedition and marched to Fort Yuma, where Major Heintzelman relieved their necessities. Walker with thirty-five men had started back for Santa Tomas. They brought up at Tia Juana, where they crossed the American line, surrendered and gave their paroles to Major McKinstry of the United States army. When Walker and his Falstaffian army reached San Francisco they were lionized as heroes. All they had done was to kill a few inoffensive natives on the peninsula and steal their cattle. Their valiant leader had proclaimed two republics and decreed (on paper) that slavery should prevail in them. He had had several of his dupes whipped and two of them shot, which was probably the most commendable thing he had done. His proclamations were ridiculous and his officers with their high sounding titles had returned from their burlesque conquest with scarcely rags enough on them to cover their nakedness. Yet, despite all this, the attempt to enlarge the area of slave territory covered him with glory and his rooms were the resort of all the pro-slavery officials of California.

The federal officials made a show of prosecuting the filibusters. Watkins, the vice-president of the Republic of Lower California and Sonora, was put on trial in the United States district court. The evidence was so plain and the proof so convincing that the judge was compelled to convict against his will. This delightful specimen of a pro-slavery justice expressed from the bench his sympathy for "those spirited men who had gone forth to upbuild the broken altars and rekindle the extinguished fires of liberty in Mexico and Lower California." With such men to enforce the laws, it was not strange that vigilance committees were needed in California. Watkins and Emory, the so-called secretary of state, were fined each $1,500. The fines were never paid and no effort was ever made to compel their payment. The secretary of war and the secretary of the navy were put on trial and acquitted. This ended the shameful farce.

Walker's next expedition was to Nicaragua in 1855. A revolution was in progress there. He joined forces with the Democratic party or anti-legitimists. He took but fifty-six men with him. These were called the American phalanx. His first engagement was an attack upon the fortified town of Rivas. Although his men fought bravely, they were defeated and two of his best officers, Kewen and Crocker, killed. His next fight was the battle of Virgin Bay, in which, with fifty Americans and one hundred and twenty natives, he defeated six hundred legitimists. He received reinforcements from California and reorganized his force. He seized the Accessory Transit Company's lake steamer La Virgin against the protest of the company, embarked his troops on board of it and by an adroit movement captured the capital city, Granada. His exploits were heralded abroad and recruits flocked to his support. The legitimist had fired upon a steamer bringing passengers up the San Juan river and killed several. Walker in retaliation ordered Mateo Mazorga, the legitimist secretary of state, whom he had taken prisoner at Granada, shot. Peace was declared between the two parties and Patricio Rivas made president. Rivas was president only in name; Walker was the real head of the government and virtually dictator.

He was now at the zenith of his power. By a series of arbitrary acts he confiscated the Accessory Transit Company's vessels and charter. This company had become a power in California travel and had secured the exclusive transit of passengers by the Nicaragua route, then the most popular route to California.

By this action he incurred the enmity of Vanderbilt, who henceforth worked for his downfall. The confiscation of the transit company's right destroyed confidence in the route, and travel virtually ceased by it. This was a blow to the prosperity of the country. To add to Walker's misfortunes, the other Central American states combined to drive the hated foreigners out of the country. He had gotten rid of Rivas and had secured the presidency for himself. He had secured the repeal of the Nicaragua laws against slavery and thus paved the way for the introduction of his revered institution. His army now amounted to about twelve hundred men, mostly recruited from California and the slave states. The cholera broke out among his forces and in the armies of the allies and numbers died. His cause was rapidly waning. Many of his dupes deserted. A series of disasters arising from his blundering and incapacity, resulted in his overthrow. He and sixteen of his officers were taken out of the country on the United States sloop of war, St. Mary's. The governor of Panama refused to allow him to land in that city. He was sent across the isthmus under guard to Aspinwall and from there with his staff took passage to New Orleans. His misguided followers were transported to Panama and found their way back to the United States.

Upon arriving at New Orleans he began recruiting for a new expedition. One hundred and fifty of his "emigrants" sailed from Mobile; the pro-slavery federal officials allowing them to depart. They were wrecked on Glover's reef, about seventy miles from Balize. They were rescued by a British vessel and returned to Mobile. Walker, with one hundred and thirty-two armed emigrants, landed at Punta Arenas, November 25, 1857, and hoisted his Nicaraguan flag and called himself commander-in-chief of the army of Nicaragua. He and his men began a career of plunder; seized the fort of Castillo on the San Juan river; captured steamers, killed several inhabitants and made prisoners of others. Commander Paulding, of the United States flagship Wabash, then on that coast, regarded these acts as rapine and murder, and Walker and his men as outlaws and pirates. He broke up their camp, disarmed Walker and his emigrants and sent them to the United States for trial. But instead of Walker and his followers being tried for piracy their pro-slavery abettors made heroes of them.

Walker's last effort to regain his lost prestige in Nicaragua was made in 1860. With two hundred men, recruited in New Orleans, he landed near Truxillo, in Honduras. His intention was to make his way by land to Nicaragua. He very soon found armed opposition. His new recruits were not inclined to sacrifice themselves to make him dictator of some country that they had no interest in. So they refused to stand up against the heavy odds they encountered in every fight. Finding his situation growing desperate, he was induced to surrender himself to the captain of the British man-of-war Icarus. The authorities of Honduras made a demand on the captain for Walker. That British officer promptly turned the filibuster over to them. He was tried by a court-martial, hastily convened, found guilty of the offenses charged, and condemned to die. September 25, 1860, he was marched out and, in accordance with his sentence, shot to death.

Walker's career is an anomaly in the history of mankind. Devoid of all the characteristics of a great leader, without a commanding presence, puny in size, homely to the point of ugliness, in disposition, cold, cruel, selfish, heartless, stolidly indifferent to the suffering of others, living only to gratify the cravings of his inordinate ambition—it is strange that such a man could attract thousands to offer their lives for his aggrandizement and sacrifice themselves for a cause of which he was the exponent, a cause the most ignoble, the extension of human slavery, that for such a man and for such a cause thousands did offer up their lives is a sad commentary on the political morality of that time. It is said that over ten thousand men joined Walker in his filibustering schemes and that fifty-seven hundred of these found graves in Nicaragua. Of the number of natives killed in battle or who died of disease, there is no record, but it greatly exceeded Walker's losses.

While Walker was attaining some success in Nicaragua, another California filibuster entered the arena. This was Henry A. Crabb, a Stockton lawyer. Like Walker, he was a native of Tennessee, and, like him, too, he was a rabid pro-slavery advocate. He had served in the assembly and one term in the state senate. It is said he was the author of a bill to allow slaveholders who brought their slaves into California before its admission to take their human chattels back into bondage. He was originally a Whig, but had joined the Know-Nothing party and was a candidate of that party for United States senator in 1856; but his extreme southern principles prevented his election. He had married a Spanish wife, who had numerous and influential relatives in Sonora. It was claimed that Crabb had received an invitation from some of these to bring down an armed force of Americans to overthrow the government and make himself master of the country. Whether he did or did not receive such an invitation, he did recruit a body of men for some kind of service in Sonora. With a force of one hundred men, well armed with rifles and revolvers, he sailed, in January, 1857, on the steamer Sea Bird, from San Francisco to San Pedro and from there marched overland. As usual, no attempt was made by the federal authorities to prevent him from invading a neighboring country with an armed force.

He entered Sonora at Sonita, a small town one hundred miles from Yuma. His men helped themselves to what they could find. When approaching the town of Cavorca they were fired upon by a force of men lying in ambush. The fire was kept up from all quarters. They made a rush and gained the shelter of the houses. In the charge two of their men had been killed and eighteen wounded. In the house they had taken possession of they were exposed to shots from a church. Crabb and fifteen of his men attempted to blow open the doors of the church with gunpowder, but in the attempt, which failed, five of the men were killed, and seven, including Crabb, wounded. After holding out for five days they surrendered to the Mexicans, Gabilondo, the Mexican commander, promising to spare their lives. Next morning they were marched out in squads of five to ten and shot. Crabb was tied to a post and a hundred balls fired into him; his head was cut off and placed in a jar of mescal. The only one spared was a boy of fifteen, Charles E. Evans. A party of sixteen men whom Crabb had left at Sonita was surprised and all massacred. The boy Evans was the only one left to tell the fate of the ill-starred expedition. This put an end to filibustering expeditions into Sonora.

These armed forays on the neighboring countries to the south of the United States ceased with the beginning of the war of secession. They had all been made for the purpose of acquiring slave territory. The leaders of them were southern men and the rank and file were mostly recruited from natives of the slave states. Bancroft truthfully says of these filibustering expeditions: "They were foul robberies, covered by the flimsiest of political and social pretenses, gilded by false aphorisms and profane distortion of sacred formulæ. Liberty dragged in the mud for purposes of theft and human enslavement; the cause of humanity bandied in filthy mouths to promote atrocious butcheries; peaceful, blooming valleys given over to devastation and ruin; happy families torn asunder, and widows and orphans cast adrift to nurse affliction; and finally, the peace of nations imperiled, and the morality of right insulted. The thought of such results should obliterate all romance, and turn pride to shame. They remain an ineffaceable stain upon the government of the most progressive of nations, and veil in dismal irony the dream of manifest destiny."

CHAPTER XXIX.

FROM GOLD TO GRAIN AND FRUITS.

UNDER the Spanish and Mexican jurisdictions there was but little cultivation of the soil in California. While the gardens of some of the missions, and particularly those of Santa Barbara and San Buenaventura, presented a most appetizing display of fruit and vegetables, at the ranchos there were but meager products. Gilroy says that when he came to the country, in 1814, potatoes were not cultivated and it was a rare thing outside of the mission gardens to find any onions or cabbages. A few acres of wheat and a small patch of maize or corn furnished bread, or, rather, tortillas for a family. At the missions a thick soup made of boiled wheat or maize and meat was the standard article of diet for the neophytes. This was portioned out to them in the quantity of about three pints to each person. Langsdorff, who witnessed the distribution of soup rations to the Indians at Santa Clara, says: "It appeared incomprehensible how any one could three times a day eat so large a portion of such nourishing food." The neophytes evidently had healthy appetites. Frijoles (beans) were the staple vegetable dish in Spanish families. These were served up at almost every meal. The bill of fare for a native Californian family was very simple.

A considerable amount of wheat was raised at the more favorably located missions. It was not raised for export, but to feed the neophytes.

The wheat fields had to be fenced in, or perhaps it would be more in accordance with the facts to say that the cattle had to be fenced out. As timber was scarce, adobe brick did duty for fencing as well as for house building. Sometimes the low adobe walls were made high and safe by placing on top of them a row of the skulls of Spanish cattle with the long, curving horns attached to them pointing outward. These were brought from the matanzas or slaughter corrals where there were thousands of them lying around. It was almost impossible for man or beast to scale such a fence.

The agricultural implements of the early Californians were few and simple. The Mexican plow was a forked stick with an iron point fastened to the fork or branch that penetrated the ground. It turned no furrow, but merely scratched the surface of the ground. After sowing it was a race between the weeds and the grain. It depended on the season which won. If the season was cold and backward, so that the seed did not sprout readily, the weeds got the start and won out easily. And yet with such primitive cultivation the yield was sometimes astonishing. At the Mission San Diego the crop of wheat one year produced one hundred and ninety-five fold. As the agriculturist had a large area from which to select his arable land, only the richest soils were chosen. Before the discovery of gold there was little or no market for grain, and each ranchero raised only enough for his own use. For a time there was some trade with the Russians in grain to supply their settlements in Alaska, but this did not continue long.

When some of the Americans who came in the gold rush began to turn their attention to agriculture they greatly underrated the productiveness of the country. To men raised where the summer rains were needed to raise a crop it seemed impossible to produce a crop in a country that was rainless for six or eight months of the year. All attempts at agriculture hitherto had been along the rivers, and it was generally believed that the plains back from the water courses could never be used for any other purpose than cattle raising.

The mining rush of '49 found California without vegetables and fresh fruit. The distance was too great for the slow transportation of that day to ship these into the country. Those who first turned their attention to market gardening made fortunes. The story is told of an old German named Schwartz who had a small ranch a few miles below Sacramento. In 1848, when everybody was rushing to the mines, he remained on his farm, unmoved by the stories of the wonderful finds of gold. Anticipating a greater rush in 1849, he planted several acres in watermelons. As they ripened he took them up to the city and disposed of them at prices ranging from $1 to $5, according to size. He realized that season from his melons alone $30,000. The first field of cabbages was grown by George H. Peck and a partner in 1850. From defective seed or some other cause the cabbage failed to come to a head. Supposing that the defect was in the climate and not in the cabbage, the honest rancher marketed his crop in San Francisco, carrying a cabbage in each hand along the streets until he found a customer. To the query why there were no heads to them the reply was, "That's the way cabbages grow in California." He got rid of his crop at the rate of $1 apiece for each headless cabbage. But all the vegetable growing experiments were not a financial success. The high price of potatoes in 1849 started a tuber-growing epidemic in 1850. Hundreds of acres were planted to

"spuds" in the counties contiguous to San Francisco, the agriculturists paying as high as fifteen cents per pound for seed. The yield was enormous and the market was soon overstocked. The growers who could not dispose of their potatoes stacked them up in huge piles in the fields; and there they rotted, filling the country around with their effluvia. The next year nobody planted potatoes, and prices went up to the figures of '49 and the spring of '50.

The size to which vegetables grew astonished the amateur agriculturists. Beets, when allowed to grow to maturity, resembled the trunks of trees; onions looked like squash, while a patch of pumpkins resembled a tented field; and corn grew so tall that the stalks had to be felled to get at the ears. Onions were a favorite vegetable in the mining camps on account of their anti-scorbutic properties as a preventive of scurvy. The honest miner was not fastidious about the aroma. They were a profitable crop, too. One ranchero in the Napa valley was reported to have cleared $8,000 off two acres of onions.

With the decline of gold mining wheat became the staple product of central California. The nearness to shipping ports and the large yields made wheat growing very profitable. In the years immediately following the Civil war the price ranged high and a fortune was sometimes made from the products of a single field. It may be necessary to explain that the field might contain anywhere from five hundred to a thousand acres. The grain area was largely extended by the discovery that land in the upper mesas, which had been regarded as only fit for pasture land, was good for cereals. The land in the southern part of the state, which was held in large grants, continued to be devoted to cattle raising for at least two decades after the American conquest. After the discovery of gold cattle raising became immensely profitable. Under the Mexican régime a steer was worth what his hide and tallow would bring or about $2 or $3. The rush of immigration in 1849 sent the price of cattle up until a fat bullock sold for from $30 to $35. The profit to a ranchero who had a thousand or more marketable cattle was a fortune. A good, well-stocked cattle ranch was more valuable than a gold mine.

The enormous profits in cattle raising dazed the Californians. Had they been thrifty and economical, they might have grown rich. But the sudden influx of wealth engendered extravagant habits and when the price of cattle fell, as it did in a few years, the spendthrift customs were continued. When the cattle market was dull it was easy to raise money by mortgaging the ranch. With interest at the rate of 5 per cent per month, compounded monthly, it did not take long for land and cattle both to change hands. It is related of the former owner of the Santa Gertrudes rancho that he borrowed $500 from a money lender, at 5 per cent a month, to beat a poker game, but did not succeed. Then he borrowed more money to pay the interest on the first and kept on doing so until interest and principal amounted to $100,000; then the mortgage was foreclosed and property 10-day worth $1,000,000 was lost for a paltry $500 staked on a poker game.

Gold mining continued to be the prevailing industry of northern California. The gold production reached its acme in 1853, when the total yield was $65,000,000. From that time there was a gradual decline in production and in the number of men employed. Many had given up the hopes of striking it rich and quit the business for something more certain and less illusive. The production of gold in 1852 was $60,000,000, yet the average yield to each man of the one hundred thousand engaged in it was only about $600, or a little over $2 per day to the man, scarcely living wages as prices were then. It has been claimed that the cost of producing the gold, counting all expenditures, was three times the value of that produced. Even if it did, the development of the country and impulse given to trade throughout the world would more than counterbalance the loss.

At the time of the discovery of gold nearly all of the fruit raised in California was produced at Santa Barbara and Los Angeles. In Spanish and Mexican days, Los Angeles had been the principal wine-producing district of California. Although wine, as well as other spirituous liquors, were in demand, the vineyardists found it more profitable to ship their grapes to San Francisco than to manufacture them into wine. Grapes retailed in the city of San Francisco at from twelve and one-half to twenty-five cents a pound. The vineyards were as profitable as the cattle ranches. The mission Indians did the labor in the vineyards and were paid in aguardiente on Saturday night. By Sunday morning they were all drunk; then they were gathered up and put into a corral. On Monday morning they were sold to pay the cost of their dissipation. It did not take many years to kill off the Indians. The city has grown over the former sites of the vineyards.

The first orange trees were planted at the Mission San Gabriel about the year 1815 and a few at Los Angeles about the same time. But little attention was given to the industry by the Californians. The first extensive grove was planted by William Wolfskill in 1840. The impression then prevailed that oranges could be grown only on the low lands near the river. The idea of attempting to grow them on the mesa lands was scouted at by the Californians and the Americans. The success that attended the Riverside experiment demonstrated that they could be grown on the mesas, and that the fruit produced was superior to that grown on the river bottoms. This gave such an impetus to the industry in the south that it has distanced all others. The yearly shipment to the eastern markets is twenty thousand car loads. The citrus belt is extending every year.

The Californians paid but little attention to the quality of the fruit they raised. The seed fell in the ground and sprouted. If the twig survived and grew to be a tree, they ate the fruit, asking no question whether the quality might be improved. The pears grown at the missions and at some of the ranch houses were hard and tasteless. It was said they never ripened. A small black fig was cultivated in a few places, but the quantity of fruit grown outside of the mission gardens was very small.

The high price of all kinds of fruit in the early '50s induced the importation of apple, peach, pear, plum and prune trees. These thrived and soon supplied the demand. Before the advent of the railroads and the shipment east the quantity of deciduous fruit produced had outgrown the demand, and there was no profit in its production. All this has been changed by eastern shipment.

Sheep were brought to the country with the first missionary expeditions. The Indian in his primitive condition did not use clothing. A coat of mud was his only garment and he was not at all particular about the fit of that. After his conversion the missionaries put clothing on him, or, rather, on part of him. He was given a shirt, which was a shirt of Nessus, being made of the coarse woolen cloth manufactured at the mission. It was irritating to the skin and compelled the poor wretches to keep up a continual scratching; at least, that is what Hugo Reid tells us. During the Civil war and for several years after, the sheep industry was very profitable. The subdivision of the great ranchos and the absorption of the land for grain growing and fruit culture have contracted the sheep ranges until there is but little left for pasture except the foothills that are too rough for cultivation.

Up to 1863 the great Spanish grants that covered the southern part of the state had, with a few exceptions, been held intact and cattle raising had continued to be the principal industry. For several seasons previous to the famine years of 1863 and 1864 there had been heavy rainfalls and consequently abundant feed. With that careless indifference that marked the business management of the native Californian, the ranges had become overstocked. When the dry year of 1863 set in, the feed on ranches was soon exhausted and the cattle starving. The second famine year following, the cattle industry was virtually wiped out of existence and the cattle-owners ruined. In Santa Barbara, where the cattle barons held almost imperial sway, and, with their army of retainers, controlled the political affairs of the county, of the two hundred thousand cattle listed on the assessment roll of 1862, only five thousand were alive when grass grew in 1865. On the Stearns' ranchos in Los Angeles county, one hundred thousand head of cattle and horses perished, and the owner of a quarter million acres and a large amount of city property could not raise money enough to pay $1,000 taxes.

Many of the rancheros were in debt when the hard times came, and others mortgaged their land at usurious rates of interest to carry them through the famine years. Their cattle dead, they had no income to meet the interest on the cancerous mortgage that was eating up their patrimony. The result was that they were compelled either to sell their land or the mortgage was foreclosed and they lost it. This led to the subdivision of the large grants into small holdings, the new proprietors finding that there was more profit in selling them off in small tracts than in large ones. This brought in an intelligent and progressive population, and in a few years entirely revolutionized the agricultural conditions of the south. Grain growing and fruit raising became the prevailing industries. The adobe ranch house with its matanzas and its Golgotha of cattle skulls and bones gave place to the tasty farm house with its flower garden, lawn and orange grove.

The Californians paid but little attention to improving the breed of their cattle. When the only value in an animal was the hide and tallow, it did not pay to improve the breed. The hide of a long-horned, mouse-colored Spanish steer would sell for as much as that of a high-bred Durham or Holstein, and, besides, the first could exist where the latter would starve to death. After the conquest there was for some time but little improvement. Cattle were brought across the plains, but for the most part these were the mongrel breeds of the western states and were but little improvement on the Spanish stock. It was not until the famine years virtually exterminated the Spanish cattle that better breeds were introduced.

As with cattle, so also it was with horses. Little attention was given to improving the breed. While there were a few fine race horses and saddle horses in the country before its American occupation, the prevailing equine was the mustang. He was a vicious beast, nor was it strange that his temper was bad. He had to endure starvation and abuse that would have killed a more aristocratic animal. He took care of himself, subsisted on what he could pick up and to the best of his ability resented ill treatment. Horses during the Mexican régime were used only for riding. Oxen were the draft animals. The mustang had one inherent trait that did not endear him to an American, and that was his propensity to "buck." With his nose between his knees, his back arched and his legs stiffened, by a series of short, quick jumps, he could dismount an inexperienced rider with neatness and dispatch. The Californian took delight in urging the bronco to "buck" so that he (the rider) might exhibit his skillful horsemanship. The mustang had some commendable traits as well. He was sure-footed as a goat and could climb the steep hillsides almost equal to that animal. He had an easy gait under the saddle and could measure off mile after mile without a halt. His power of endurance was wonderful. He could live off the country when apparently there was nothing to subsist on except the bare ground. He owed mankind a debt of ingratitude which he always stood ready to pay when an opportunity offered. The passing of the mustang began with the advent of the American farmer.

The founding of agricultural colonies began in the '50s. One of the first, if not the first, was the German colony of Anaheim, located thirty miles south of Los Angeles. A company of Germans organized in San Francisco in 1857 for the purpose of buying land for the cultivation of the wine grape and the manufacture of wine. The organization was a stock company. Eleven hundred acres were purchased in a Spanish grant. This was subdivided into twenty and forty acre tracts; an irrigating ditch brought in from the Santa Ana river. A portion of each subdivision was planted in vines and these were cultivated by the company until they came into bearing, when the tracts were divided among the stockholders by lot, a certain valuation being fixed on each tract. The man obtaining a choice lot paid into the fund a certain amount and the one receiving an inferior tract received a certain amount, so that each received the same value in the distribution. The colony proved quite a success, and for thirty years Anaheim was one of the largest wine-producing districts in the United States. In 1887 a mysterious disease destroyed all the vines and the vineyardists turned their attention to the cultivation of oranges and English walnuts.

The Riverside colony, then in San Bernardino county, now in Riverside county, was founded in 1870. The projectors of the colony were eastern gentlemen. At the head of the organization was Judge J. W. North. They purchased four thousand acres of the Roubidoux or Jurupa rancho and fourteen hundred and sixty acres of government land from the California Silk Center Association. This association had been organized in 1869 for the purpose of founding a colony to cultivate mulberry trees and manufacture silk. It had met with reverses, first in the death of its president, Louis Prevost, a man skilled in the silk business, next in the revocation by the legislature of the bounty for mulberry plantations, and lastly in the subsidence of the sericulture craze. To encourage silk culture in California, the legislature, in 1866, passed an act authorizing the payment of a bounty of $250 for every plantation of five thousand mulberry trees two years old. This greatly stimulated the planting of mulberry trees, if it did not greatly increase the production of silk. In 1869 it was estimated that in the central and southern portions of the state there were ten millions of mulberry trees in various stages of growth. Demands for the bounty poured in upon the commissioners in such numbers that the state treasury was threatened with bankruptcy. The revocation of the bounty killed the silk worms and the mulberry trees; and those who had been attacked with the sericulture craze quickly recovered. The Silk Center Association, having fallen into hard lines, offered its lands for sale at advantageous terms, and in September, 1870, they were purchased by the Southern California Colony Association. The land was bought at $3.50 per acre. It was mesa or table land that had never been cultivated. It was considered by old-timers indifferent sheep pasture, and Roubidoux, it is said, had it struck from the tax roll because it was not worth taxing.

The company had the land subdivided and laid off a town which was first named Jurupa, but afterwards the name was changed to Riverside. The river, the Santa Ana, did not flow past the town, but the colonists hoped to make a goodly portion of its waters do so. The lands were put on sale at reasonable prices, a ditch at a cost of $50,000 was constructed. Experiments were made with oranges, raisin grapes and deciduous fruits, but the colony finally settled down to orange producing. In 1877 the introduction of the Bahia or navel orange gave an additional impetus to orange growing in the colony, the fruit of that species being greatly superior to any other. This fruit was propagated by budding from two trees received from Washington, D. C., by J. A. Tibbetts, of Riverside.

The Indiana colony, which later became Pasadena, was founded in 1873 by some gentlemen from Indiana. Its purpose was the growing of citrus fruits and raisin grapes, but it has grown into a city, and the orange groves, once the pride of the colony, have given place to business blocks and stately residences.

During the early '70s a number of agricultural colonies were founded in Fresno county. These were all fruit-growing and raisin-producing enterprises. They proved successful and Fresno has become the largest raisin-producing district in the state.

CHAPTER XXX.

THE CIVIL WAR—LOYALTY AND DISLOYALTY.

THE admission of California into the Union as a free state did not, in the opinion of the ultra pro-slavery faction, preclude the possibility of securing a part of its territory for the "peculiar institution" of the south. The question of state division which had come up in the constitutional convention was again agitated. The advocates of division hoped to cut off from the southern part, territory enough for a new state. The ostensible purpose of division was kept concealed. The plea of unjust taxation was made prominent. The native Californians who under Mexican rule paid no taxes on their land were given to understand that they were bearing an undue proportion of the cost of government, while the mining counties, paying less tax, had the greater representation. The native Californians were opposed to slavery, an open advocacy of the real purpose would defeat the division scheme.

The leading men in the southern part of the state were from the slave states. If the state were divided, the influence of these men would carry the new state into the Union with a constitution authorizing slave-holding and thus the south would gain two senators. The division question came up in some form in nearly every session of the legislature for a decade after California became a state.

In the legislature of 1854-55, Jefferson Hunt, of San Bernardino county, introduced a bill in the assembly to create and establish, "out of the territory embraced within the limits of the state of California, a new state, to be called the state of Columbia." The territory embraced within the counties of Santa Cruz, Santa Clara, San Joaquin, Calaveras, Amador, Tuolumne, Stanislaus, Mariposa, Tulare, Monterey, Santa Barbara, San Luis Obispo, Los Angeles, San Bernardino and San Diego, with the islands on the coast, were to constitute the new state. "The people residing within the above mentioned territory shall be and they are hereby authorized, so soon as the consent of the congress of the United States shall be obtained thereto, to proceed to organize a state government under such rules as are prescribed by the constitution of the United States." The bill met with opposition. It took in some of the mining counties whose interests were not coincident with the agricultural counties of the south. It died on the files.

At a subsequent session, a bill was introduced in the legislature to divide the state into three parts, southern, central and northern, the central state to retain the name of California. This was referred to a committee and got no farther. It was not satisfactory to the pro-slavery element because the gain to the south would be overbalanced by the gain to the north.

The success of border ruffianism, backed by the Buchanan administration, in forcing the detestable Lecompton pro-slavery constitution on the people of Kansas, encouraged the divisionists to make another effort to divide the state. While California was a free state it had throughout its existence, up to 1857, when Broderick was elected to the senate, been represented in both houses either by slave-holders from the south or by northern "dough faces"—men of northern birth with southern principles. Most of the state offices had been filled by southern men who had come to the state to obtain office or men who had been imported by their friends or relatives to fill positions by appointment. Indeed, so notorious had this importation of office-holders become that California was often referred to as the "Virginia poorhouse." Scarcely a legislature had convened in which there was not some legislation against free negroes. A free colored man was as terrible to the chivalrous legislators as an army with banners.

The legislature of 1859 was intensely pro-slavery. The divisionists saw in it an opportunity to carry out their long-deferred scheme. The so-called Pico law, an act granting the consent of the legislature to the formation of a different government for the southern counties of this state, was introduced early in the session, passed in both houses and approved by the governor April 18, 1859. The boundaries of the proposed state were as follows: "All of that part or portion of the present territory of this state lying all south of a line drawn eastward from the west boundary of the state along the sixth standard parallel south of the Mount Diablo meridian, east to the summit of the coast range; thence southerly following said summit to the seventh standard parallel; thence due east on said standard, parallel to its intersection with the northwest boundary of Los Angeles county; thence northeast along said boundary to the eastern boundary of the state, including the counties of San Luis Obispo, Santa Barbara, Los Angeles, San Diego, San Bernardino and a part of Buena Vista, shall be segregated from the remaining portion of the state for the purpose of the formation by congress, with the concurrent action of said portion (the consent for the segregation of which is hereby granted), of a territorial or other government under the name of the "Territory of Colorado," or such other name as may be deemed meet and proper."

Section second provided for the submitting the question of "For a Territory" or "Against a Territory" to the people of the portion sought to be segregated at the next general election; "and in case two-thirds of the whole number of voters voting thereon shall vote for a change of government, the consent hereby given shall be deemed consummated." In case the vote was favorable the secretary of state was to send a certified copy of the result of the election and a copy of the act annexed to the president of the United States and to the senators and representatives of California in congress. At the general election in September, 1859, the question was submitted to a vote of the people of the southern counties, with the following result:

	For.	Against.
Los Angeles county.....	1,407	441
San Bernardino	441	29
San Diego	207	24
San Luis Obispo.....	10	283
Santa Barbara	395	51
Tulare	17	...
Total	2,477	828

The bill to create the county of Buena Vista from the southern portion of Tulare failed to pass the legislature, hence the name of that county does not appear in the returns. The result of the vote showed that considerably more than two-thirds were in favor of a new state.

The results of this movement for division and the act were sent to the president and to congress, but nothing came of it. The pro-slavery faction that with the assistance of the dough-faces of the north had so long dominated congress had lost its power. The southern senators and congressmen were preparing for secession and had weightier matters to think of than the division of the state of California. Of late years, a few feeble attempts have been made to stir up the old question of state division and even to resurrect the old "Pico law."

For more than a decade after its admission into the Union, California was a Democratic state and controlled by the pro-slavery wing of that party. John C. Fremont and William H. Gwin, its first senators, were southern born, Fremont in South Carolina and Gwin in Mississippi. Politics had not entered into their election, but the lines were soon drawn. Fremont drew the short term and his services in the senate were very brief. He confidently expected a re-election, but in this he was doomed to disappointment. The legislature of 1851, after balloting one hundred and forty-two times, adjourned without electing, leaving California with but one senator in the session of 1850-51. In the legislature of 1852 John B. Willer was elected. He was a northern man with southern principles. His chief opponent for the place was David Colbert Broderick, a man destined to fill an important place in the political history of California. He was an Irishman by birth, but had come to America in his boyhood. He had learned the stone cutters' trade with his father. His early associations were with the rougher element of New York City. Aspiring to a higher position than that of a stone cutter he entered the political field and soon arose to prominence. At the age of 26 he was nominated for Congress, but was defeated by a small majority through a split in the party. In 1849 he came to California, where he arrived sick and penniless. With F. D. Kohler, an assayer, he engaged in coining gold. The profit from buying gold dust at $14 an ounce and making it into $5 and $10 pieces put him in affluent circumstances.

His first entry into politics in California was his election to fill a vacancy in the senate of the first legislature. In 1851 he became president of the senate. He studied law, history and literature and was admitted to the bar. He was appointed clerk of the supreme court and had aspirations for still higher positions. Although Senator Gwin was a Democrat, he had managed to control all the federal appointments of Fillmore, the Whig president, and he had filled the offices with pro-slavery Democrats.

No other free state in the Union had such odious laws against negroes as had California. The legislature of 1852 enacted a law "respecting fugitives from labor and slaves brought to this state prior to her admission to the Union." "Under this law a colored man or woman could be brought before a magistrate, claimed as a slave, and the person so seized not being permitted to testify, the judge had no alternative but to issue a certificate to the claimant, which certificate was conclusive of the right of the person or persons in whose favor granted, and prevented all molestation of such person or persons, by any process issued by any court, judge, justice or magistrate or other person whomsoever."* Any one who rendered assistance to a fugitive was liable to a fine of $500 or imprisonment for two months. Slaves who had been brought into California by their masters before it became a state, but who were freed by the adoption of a constitution prohibiting slavery, were held to be fugitives and were liable to arrest, although they had been free for several years and some of them had accumulated considerable property. By limitation the law should have become inoperative in 1853, but the legislature of that year re-enacted it, and the succeeding legislatures of 1854 and 1855 continued it in force. The intention of the legislators who enacted the law was to legalize the kidnapping of free negroes, as well as the arrest of fugitives. Broderick vigorously opposed the prosecution of the colored people and by so doing called down upon his head the wrath of the pro-slavery chivalry. From that time on he was an object of their hatred. While successive legislatures were passing laws to punish black men for daring to assert their freedom and their right to the products of their honest toil, white villains were rewarded with political preferment, provided always that they belonged to the dominant wing of the Democratic party. The Whig party was but little better than the other, for the same element ruled in both. The finances of the state were in a deplorable condition and continually growing worse. The people's money was recklessly squandered. Incompetency was the rule in office and honesty the exception. Ballot box stuffing had been reduced to a mechanical science, jury bribing was one of the fine arts and suborning perjury was a recognized profession. During one election in San Francisco it was estimated that $1,500,000 was spent in one way or another to influence voters. Such was the state of affairs just preceding the uprising of the people that evolved in San Francisco the vigilance committee of 1856.

At the state election in the fall of 1855 the Know Nothings carried the state. The native American or Know Nothing party was a party of few principles. Opposition to Catholics and foreigners was about the only plank in its platform. There was a strong opposition to foreign miners in the mining districts and the pro-slavery faction saw in the increased foreign immigration danger to the extension of their beloved institution into new territory. The most potent cause of the success of the new party in California was the hope that it might bring reform to relieve the tax burdened people. But in this they were disappointed. It was made up from the same element that had so long misgoverned the state.

The leaders of the party were either pro-slavery men of the south or northern men with southern principles. Of the latter class was J. Neely Johnson, the governor-elect. In the legislature of 1855 the contest between Gwin and Broderick, which had been waged at the polls the previous year, culminated after thirty-eight ballots in no choice and Gwin's place in the senate became vacant at the expiration of his term. In the legislature of 1856 the Know Nothings had a majority in both houses. It was supposed that they would elect a senator to succeed Gwin. There were three aspirants: H. A. Crabb, formerly a Whig; E. C. Marshall and Henry S. Foote, formerly Democrats. All were southerners and were in the new party for office. The Gwin and Broderick influence was strong enough to prevent the Know Nothing legislature from electing a senator and California was left with but one representative in the upper house of Congress.

The Know Nothing party was short lived. At the general election in 1856 the Democrats swept the state. Broderick, by his ability in organizing and his superior leadership, had secured a majority in the legislature and was in a position to dictate terms to his opponents. Weller's senatorial term would soon expire and Gwin's already two years vacant left two places to be filled. Broderick, who had heretofore been contending for Gwin's place, changed his tactics and aspired to fill the long term. According to established custom, the filling of the vacancy would come up first, but Broderick, by superior finesse, succeeded in having the caucus nominate the successor to Weller first. Ex-Congressman Latham's friends were induced to favor the arrangement on the expectation that their candidate would be given the short term. Broderick was elected to the long term on the first ballot, January 9, 1857, and his commission was immediately made out and signed by the governor. For years he had bent his energies to securing the senatorship and at last he had obtained the coveted honor. But he was not satisfied yet. He aspired to control the federal patronage of the state; in this way he could reward his friends. He could dictate the election of his colleague for the short term. Both Gwin and Latham were willing to concede to him that privilege for the sake of an election. Latham tried to make a few reservations for some of his friends to whom he had promised places. Gwin offered to surrender it all without reservation. He had had enough of it. Gwin was elected and next day published an address, announcing his obligation to Broderick and renouncing any claim to the distribution of the federal patronage.

Then a wail long and loud went up from the chivalry, who for years had monopolized all the offices. That they, southern gentlemen of aristocratic antecedents, should be compelled to ask favors of a mudsill of the north was too humiliating to be borne. Latham, too, was indignant and Broderick found that his triumph was but a hollow mockery. But the worst was to come. He who had done so much to unite the warring Democracy and give the party a glorious victory in California at the presidential election of 1856 fully expected the approbation of President Buchanan, but when he called on that old gentleman he was received coldly and during Buchanan's administration he was ignored and Gwin's advice taken and followed in making federal appointments. He returned to California in April, 1857, to secure the nomination of his friends on the state ticket, but in this he was disappointed. The Gwin element was in the ascendency and John B. Weller received the nomination for governor. He was regarded as a martyr, having been tricked out of a re-election to the senate by Broderick. There were other martyrs of the Democracy, who received balm for their wounds and sympathy for their sufferings at that convention. In discussing a resolution denouncing the vigilance committee, O'Meara in his "History of Early Politics in California," says: "Col. Joseph P. Hoge, the acknowledged leader of the convention, stated that the committee had hanged four men, banished twenty-eight and arrested two hundred and eighty; and that these were nearly all Democrats.

On Broderick's return to the senate in the session of 1857-58, he cast his lot with Senator Douglas and opposed the admission of Kansas under the infamous Lecompton constitution. This cut him loose from the administration wing of the party.

In the state campaign of 1859 Broderick rallied his followers under the Anti-Lecompton standard and Gwin his in support of the Buchanan administration. The party was hopelessly divided. Two Democratic tickets were placed in the field. The Broderick ticket, with John Currey as governor, and the Gwin, with Milton Latham, the campaign was bitter. Broderick took the stump and although not an orator his denunciations of Gwin were scathing and merciless and in his fearful earnestness he became almost eloquent. Gwin in turn loosed the vials of his wrath upon Broderick and criminations and recriminations flew thick and fast during the campaign. It was a campaign of vituperation, but the first aggressor was Gwin.

Judge Terry, in a speech before the Lecompton convention at Sacramento in June, 1859, after flinging out sneers at the Republican party, characterized Broderick's party as sailing "under the flag of Douglas, but it is the banner of the black Douglass, whose name is Frederick, not Stephen." This taunt was intended to arouse the wrath of Broderick. He read Terry's speech while seated at breakfast in the International hotel at San Francisco. Broderick denounced Terry's utterance in forcible language and closed by saying: "I have hitherto spoken of him as an honest man, as the only honest man on the bench of a miserable, corrupt supreme court, but now I find I was mistaken. I take it all back." A lawyer by the name of Perley, a friend of Terry's, to whom the remark was directed, to obtain a little reputation, challenged Broderick. Broderick refused to consider Perley's challenge on the ground that he was not his (Broderick's) equal in standing and beside that he had declared himself a few days before a British subject. Perley did not stand very high in the community. Terry had acted as a second for him in a duel a few years before.

Broderick, in his reply to Perley, said: "I have determined to take no notice of attacks from any source during the canvass. If I were to accept your challenge, there are probably many other gentlemen who would seek similar opportunities for hostile meetings for the purpose of accomplishing a political object or to obtain public notoriety. I cannot afford at the present time to descend to a violation of the Constitution and state laws to subserve either their or your purposes."

Terry a few days after the close of the campaign sent a letter to Broderick demanding a retraction of the offensive remarks. Broderick, well knowing that he would have to fight some representative of the chivalry if not several of them in succession, did not retract his remarks. He had for several years, in expectation of such a result in a contest with them, practiced himself in the use of fire arms until he had become quite expert.

A challenge followed, a meeting was arranged to take place in San Mateo county, ten miles from San Francisco, on the 12th of September. Chief of Police Burke appeared on the scene and arrested the principals. They were released by the court, no crime having been committed. They met next morning at the same place; ex-

Congressman McKibben and David D. Colton were Broderick's seconds. Calhoun Benham and Thomas Hayes were Terry's. The pistols selected belonged to a friend of Terry's. Broderick was ill, weak and nervous, and it was said that his pistol was quicker on the trigger than Terry's. When the word was given it was discharged before it reached a level and the ball struck the earth, nine feet from where he stood. Terry fired, striking Broderick in the breast. He sank to the earth mortally wounded and died three days afterwards. Broderick dead was a greater man than Broderick living. For years he had waged a contest against the representatives of the slave oligarchy in California and the great mass of the people had looked on with indifference, even urging on his pursuers to the tragic end. Now that he was killed, the cry went up for vengeance on his murderers. Terry was arrested and admitted to bail in the sum of $10,000. The trial was put off on some pretext and some ten months later he obtained a change of venue to Marin county on the plea that he could not obtain a fair and impartial trial in San Francisco. His case was afterwards dismissed without trial by a pro-slavery judge named Hardy. Although freed by the courts he was found guilty and condemned by public opinion. He went south and joined the Confederates at the breaking out of the Civil war. He some time after the close of the war returned to California. In 1880 he was a presidential elector on the Democratic ticket. His colleagues on the ticket were elected, but he was defeated. He was killed at Lathrop by a deputy United States marshal while attempting an assault on United States Supreme Judge Field.

In the hue and cry that was raised on the death of Broderick, the chivalry read the doom of their ascendancy. Gwin, as he was about to take the steamer on his return to Washington, "had flaunted in his face a large canvas frame, on which was painted a portrait of Broderick and this: 'It is the will of the people that the murderers of Broderick do not return again to California,' and below were also these words attributed to Mr. Broderick: 'They have killed me because I was opposed to the extension of slavery, and a corrupt administration.'"

Throughout his political career Broderick was a consistent anti-slavery man and a friend of the common people. Of all the politicians of the ante-bellum period, that is, before the Civil war, he stands to-day the highest in the estimation of the people of California. Like Lincoln, he was a self-made man. From a humble origin, unaided, he had fought his way up to a lofty position. Had he been living during the war against the perpetuity of human slavery, he would have been a power in the senate or possibly a commander on the field of battle. As it was, during that struggle in his adopted state, his name became a synonym of patriotism and love for the Union.

Milton S. Latham, who succeeded John B. Weller as governor in 1860, was, like his predecessor, a northern man with southern principles. Almost from the date of his arrival in California he had been an office-holder. He was a man of mediocre ability. He was a state divisionist and would have aided in that scheme by advocating in the senate of the United States (to which body he had been elected three days after his inauguration) the segregation of the southern counties and their formation into a new state with the hopes of restoring the equilibrium between the north and the south. But the time had passed for such projects. The lieutenant-governor, John G. Downey, succeeded Latham. Downey gained great popularity by his veto of the "bulkhead bill." This was a scheme of the San Francisco Dock and Wharf Company to build a stone bulkhead around the city water front in consideration of having the exclusive privilege of collecting wharfage and tolls for fifty years. Downey lost much of his popularity, particularly with the Union men, during the Civil war on account of his sympathy with the Confederates.

At the state election in September, 1861, Le-lan Stanford was chosen governor. He was the first Republican chosen to that office. He received fifty-six thousand votes. Two years before he had been a candidate for that office and received only ten thousand votes, so rapidly had public sentiment changed. The news of the firing upon Fort Sumter reached San Francisco April 24, twelve days after its occurrence. It came by pony express. The beginning of hostilities between the north and the south stirred up a strong Union sentiment. The great Union mass meeting held in San Francisco May 11, 1861, was the largest and most enthusiastic public demonstration ever held on the Pacific coast. The lines were sharply drawn between the friends of the government and its enemies. Former political alliances were forgotten. Most of the Anti-Lecompton or Douglas Democrats arrayed themselves on the side of the Union. The chivalry wing of the Democratic party were either open or secret sympathizers with the Confederates. Some of them were bold and outspoken in their disloyalty. The speech of Edmund Randolph at the Democratic convention July 24, 1861, is a sample of such utterances. * * * "To me it seems a waste of time to talk. For God's sake, tell me of battles fought and won. Tell me of usurpers overthrown; that Missouri is, again a free state, no longer crushed under the armed heel of a reckless and odious despot. Tell me that the state of Maryland lives again; and, oh! gentlemen, let us read, let us hear, at the first moment, that not one hostile foot now treads the soil of Virginia! (Applause and cheers.) If this be rebellion, I am a rebel. Do you want a traitor, then I am a traitor. For God's sake, speed the ball; may the lead go quick to his heart, and may our country be free from the despot usurper that now claims the name of the president of the United States."* (Cheers.) Some of the chivalry Democrats, most of whom had been holding office in California for years, went south at the breaking out of the war to fight in the armies of the Confederacy, and among these was Gen. Albert Sidney Johnston, who had been superseded in the command of the Pacific Department by Gen. Edwin V. Sumner. Johnston, with a number of fellow sympathizers, went south by the overland route and was killed a year later, at the battle of Shiloh, while in command of the Confederate army.

One form of disloyalty among the class known as "copperheads" (northern men with southern principles) was the advocacy of a Pacific republic. Most prominent among these was ex-Governor John B. Weller. The movement was a thinly disguised method of aiding the southern Confederacy. The flag of the inchoate Pacific republic was raised in Stockton January 16, 1861. It is thus described by the Stockton Argus: "The flag is of silk of the medium size of the national ensign and with the exception of the Union (evidently a misnomer in this case) which contains a lone star upon a blue ground, is covered by a painting representing a wild mountain scene, a huge grizzly bear standing in the foreground and the words 'Pacific Republic' near the upper border." The flag raising was not a success. At first it was intended to raise it in the city. But as it became evident this would not be allowed, it was raised to the mast head of a vessel in the slough. It was not allowed to float there long. The halcyards were cut and a boy was sent up the mast to pull it down. The owner of the flag was convinced that it was not safe to trifle with the loyal sentiment of the people.

At the gubernatorial election in September, 1863, Frederick F. Low, Republican, was chosen over John G. Downey, Democrat, by a majority of over twenty thousand. In some parts of the state Confederate sympathizers were largely in the majority. This was the case in Los Angeles and in some places in the San Joaquin valley. Several of the most outspoken were arrested and sent to Fort Alcatraz, where they soon became convinced of the error of their ways and took the oath of allegiance. When the news of the assassination of Lincoln reached San Francisco, a mob destroyed the newspaper plants of the Democratic Press, edited by Beriah Brown; the Occidental, edited by Zach. Montgomery; the News Letter, edited by F. Marriott, and the Monitor, a Catholic paper, edited by Thomas A. Brady. These were virulent copperhead sheets that had heaped abuse upon the martyred president. Had the proprietors of these journals been found the mob would, in the excitement that prevailed, have treated them with violence. After this demonstration Confederate sympathizers kept silent.

CHAPTER XXXI.

TRADE, TRAVEL AND TRANSPORTATION.

THE beginning of the ocean commerce of California was the two mission transport ships that came every year to bring supplies for the missions and presidios and take back what few products there were to send. The government fixed a price upon each and every article of import and export. There was no cornering the market, no bulls or bears in the wheat pit, no rise or fall in prices except when ordered by royal authority. An Arancel de Precios (fixed rate of prices) was issued at certain intervals, and all buying and selling was governed accordingly. These arancels included everything in the range of human needs—physical, spiritual or mental. According to a tariff of prices promulgated by Governor Fages in 1788, which had been approved by the audencia and had received the royal sanction, the price of a Holy Christ in California was fixed at $1.75, a wooden spoon six cents, a horse $9, a deerskin twenty-five cents, red pepper eighteen cents a pound, a dozen of quail twenty-five cents, brandy seventy-five cents per pint, and so on throughout the list.

In 1785 an attempt was made to open up trade between California and China, the commodities for exchange being seal and otter skins for quicksilver. The trade in peltries was to be a government monopoly. The skins were to be collected from the natives by the mission friars, who were to sell them to a government agent at prices ranging from $2.50 to $10 each. The neophytes must give up to the friars all the skins in their possession. All trade by citizens or soldiers was prohibited and any one attempting to deal in peltries otherwise than the regularly ordained authorities was liable, if found out, to have his goods confiscated. Spain's attempt to engage in the fur trade was not a success. The blighting monopoly of church and state nipped it in the bud. It died out, and the government bought quicksilver, on which also it had a monopoly, with coin instead of otter skins.

After the government abandoned the fur trade the American smugglers began to gather up the peltries, and the California producer received better prices for his furs than the missionaries paid.

The Yankee smuggler had no arancel of prices fixed by royal edict. His price list varied according to circumstances. As his trade was illicit and his vessel and her cargo were in danger of confiscation if he was caught, his scale of prices ranged high. But he paid a higher price for the peltries than the government, and that was a consolation to the seller. The commerce with the Russian settlements of the northwest in the early years of the century furnished a limited market for the grain produced at some of the missions, but the Russians helped themselves to the otter and the seal of California without saying "By your leave" and they were not welcome visitors.

During the Mexican revolution, as has been previously mentioned, trade sprang up between Lima and California in tallow, but it was of short duration. During the Spanish era it can hardly be said that California had any commerce. Foreign vessels were not allowed to enter her ports except when in distress, and their stay was limited to the shortest time possible required to make repairs and take on supplies.

It was not until Mexico gained her independence and removed the proscriptive regulations with which Spain had hampered commerce that the hide droghers opened up trade between New England and California. This trade, which began in 1822, grew to considerable proportions. The hide droghers were emigrant ships as well as mercantile vessels. By these came most of the Americans who settled in California previous to 1840. The hide and tallow trade, the most important item of commerce in the Mexican era, reached its maximum in 1834, when the great mission herds were, by order of the padres, slaughtered to prevent them from falling into the hands of the government commissioners. Thirty-two vessels came to the coast that year, nearly all of which were engaged in the hide and tallow trade.

During the year 1845, the last of Mexican rule, sixty vessels visited the coast. These were not all trading vessels; eight were men-of-war, twelve were whalers and thirteen came on miscellaneous business. The total amount received at the custom house for revenue during that year was $140,000. The majority of the vessels trading on the California coast during the Mexican era sailed under the stars and stripes. Mexico was kinder to California than Spain, and under her administration commercial relations were established to a limited extent with foreign nations. Her commerce at best was feeble and uncertain. The revenue laws and their administration were frequently changed, and the shipping merchant was never sure what kind of a reception his cargo would receive from the custom house officers. The duties on imports from foreign countries were exorbitant and there was always more or less smuggling carried on. The people and the padres, when they were a power, gladly welcomed the arrival of a trading vessel on the coast and were not averse to buying goods that had escaped the tariff if they could do so with safety. As there was no land tax, the revenue on goods supported the expenses of the government.

Never in the world's history did any country develop an ocean commerce so quickly as did California after the discovery of gold. When the news spread abroad, the first ships to arrive came from Peru, Chile and the South Sea islands. The earliest published notice of the gold discovery appeared in the Baltimore Sun, September 20, 1848, eight months after it was made. At first the story was ridiculed, but as confirmatory reports came thick and fast, preparations began for a grand rush for the gold mines. Vessels of all kinds, seaworthy and unseaworthy, were overhauled and fitted out for California. The American trade with California had gone by way of Cape Horn or the Straits of Magellan, and this was the route that was taken by the pioneers. Then there were short cuts by the way of the Isthmus of Panama, across Mexico and by Nicaragua. The first vessels left the Atlantic seaports in November, 1848. By the middle of the winter one hundred vessels had sailed from Atlantic and Gulf seaports, and by spring one hundred and fifty more had taken their departure, all of them loaded with human freight and with supplies of every description. Five hundred and forty-nine vessels arrived in San Francisco in nine months, forty-five reaching that port in one day.

April 12, 1848, before the treaty of peace with Mexico had been proclaimed by the President, the Pacific Mail Steamship Company was incorporated with a capital of $500,000. Astoria, Ore., was to have been the Pacific terminus of the company's line, but it never got there. The discovery of gold in California made San Francisco the end of its route. The contract with the government gave the company a subsidy of $200,000 for maintaining three steamers on the Pacific side between Panama and Astoria. The first of these vessels, the California, sailed from New York October 6, 1848, for San Francisco and Astoria via Cape Horn. She was followed in the two succeeding months by the Oregon and the Panama. On the Atlantic side the vessels of the line for several years were the Ohio, Illinois and Georgia. The vessels on the Atlantic side were fifteen hundred tons burden, while those on the Pacific were a thousand tons. Freight and passengers by the Panama route were transported across the isthmus by boats up the Chagres river to Gorgona, and then by mule-back to Panama. In 1855 the Panama railroad was completed. This greatly facilitated travel and transportation. The Atlantic terminus of the road was Aspinwall, now called Colon.

Another line of travel and commerce between the states and California in early days was the Nicaragua route. By that route passengers on the Atlantic side landed at San Juan del Norte or Greytown. From there they took a river steamer and ascended the Rio San Juan to Lake Nicaragua, then in a larger vessel they crossed the lake to La Virgin. From there a distance of about twelve miles was made on foot or on mule-back to San Juan del Sur, where they re-embarked on board the ocean steamer for San Francisco.

The necessity for the speedy shipment of merchandise to California before the days of trans-continental railroads at a minimum cost evolved the clipper ship. These vessels entered quite early into the California trade and soon displaced the short, clumsy vessels of a few hundred tons burden that took from six to ten months to make a voyage around the Horn. The clipper ship Flying Cloud, which arrived at San Francisco in August, 1851, made the voyage from New York in eighty-nine days. These vessels were built long and narrow and carried heavy sail. Their capacity ranged from one to two thousand tons burden. The overland railroads took away a large amount of their business.

Capt. Jedediah S. Smith, as previously stated, was the real pathfinder of the western mountains and plains. He marked out the route from Salt Lake by way of the Rio Virgin, the Colorado and the Cajon Pass to Los Angeles in 1826. This route was extensively traveled by the belated immigrants of the early '50s. Those reaching Salt Lake City too late in the season to cross the Sierra Nevadas turned southward and entered California by Smith's trail.

The early immigration to California came by way of Fort Hall. From there it turned south-erly. At Fort Hall the Oregon and California immigrants separated. The disasters that befell the Donner party were brought upon them by their taking the Hastings cut-off, which was represented to them as saving two hundred and fifty miles. It was shorter, but the time spent in making a wagon road through a rough country delayed them until they were caught by the snows in the mountains. Lassen's cut-off was another route that brought disaster and delays to many of the immigrants who were induced to take it. The route up the Platte through the South Pass of the Rocky mountains and down the Humboldt received by far the larger amount of travel.

The old Santa Fe trail from Independence to Santa Fe, and from there by the old Spanish trail around the north bank of the Colorado across the Rio Virgin down the Mojave river and through the Cajon Pass to Los Angeles, was next in importance. Another route by which much of the southern emigration came was what was known as the Gila route. It started at Fort Smith, Ark., thence via El Paso and Tucson and down the Gila to Yuma, thence across the desert through the San Gorgono Pass to Los Angeles. In 1852 it was estimated one thousand wagons came by this route. There was another route still further south than this which passed through the northern states of Mexico, but it was not popular on account of the hostility of the Mexicans and the Apaches.

The first overland stage line was established in 1857. The route extended from San Antonio de Bexar, Tex., to San Diego, via El Paso, Mes-sillo, Tucson and Colorado City (now Yuma). The service was twice a month. The contract was let to James E. Burch, the Postal Department reserving "the right to curtail or discontinue the service should any route subsequently put under contract cover the whole or any portion of the route." The San Diego Herald, August 12, 1857, thus notes the departure of the first mail by that route: "The pioneer mail train from San Diego to San Antonio, Tex., under the contract entered into by the govern-ment with Mr. James Burch, left here on the 9th inst. (August 9, 1857) at an early hour in the morning, and is now pushing its way for the east at a rapid rate. The mail was of course carried on pack animals, as will be the case until wagons which are being pushed across will have been put on the line. * * * The first mail from the other side has not yet arrived, although somewhat overdue, and conjecture is rife as to the cause of the delay." The eastern mail arrived a few days later.

The service continued to improve, and the fifth trip from the eastern terminus to San Diego "was made in the extraordinary short time of twenty-six days and twelve hours," and the San Diego Herald on this arrival, October 6, 1857, rushed out an extra "announcing the very gratifying fact of the complete triumph of the southern route notwithstanding the croakings of many of the opponents of the administration in this state." But the "triumph of the southern route" was of short duration. In September, 1858, the stages of the Butterfield line began making their semi-weekly trips. This route from its western terminus, San Francisco, came down the coast to Gilroy, thence through Pacheco Pass to the San Joaquin valley, up the valley and by way of Fort Tejon to Los Angeles; from there eastward by Temecula and Warner's to Yuma, thence following very nearly what is now the route of the Southern Pacific Railroad through Arizona and New Mexico to El Paso, thence turning northward to Fort Smith, Ark. There the route divided, one branch going to St. Louis and the other to Memphis. The mail route from San Antonio to San Diego was discontinued.

The Butterfield stage line was one of the longest continuous lines ever organized. Its length was two thousand eight hundred and eighty miles. It began operation in September, 1858. The first stage from the east reached Los Angeles October 7 and San Francisco October 10. A mass-meeting was held at San Francisco the evening of October 11 "for the purpose of expressing the sense entertained by the people of the city of the great benefits she is to receive from the establishment of the overland mail." Col. J. B. Crocket acted as president and Frank M. Pixley as secretary. The speaker of the evening in his enthusiasm said: "In my opinion one of the greatest blessings that could befall California would be to discontinue at once all communication by steamer between San Francisco and New York. On yesterday we received advices from New York, New Orleans and St. Louis in less than twenty-four days via El Paso. Next to the discovery of gold this is the most important fact yet developed in the history of California." W. L. Ormsby, special correspondent of the New York Herald, the first and only through passenger by the overland mail coming in three hours less than twenty-four days, was introduced to the audience and was greeted with terrific applause. He gave a description of the route and some incidents of the journey.

The government gave the Butterfield company a subsidy of $600,000 a year for a service of two mail coaches each way a week. In 1859 the postal revenue from this route was only $27,000, leaving Uncle Sam more than half a million dollars out of pocket. At the breaking out of the Civil war the southern overland mail route was discontinued and a contract was made with Butterfield for a six-times-a-week mail by the central route via Salt Lake City, with a branch line to Denver. The eastern terminus was at first St. Joseph, but on account of the war it was changed to Omaha. The western terminus was Placerville, Cal., time twenty days for eight months, and twenty-three days for the remaining four months. The contract was for three years at an annual subsidy of $1,000,000. The last overland stage contract for carrying the mails was awarded to Wells, Fargo & Co., October 1, 1868, for $1,750,000 per annum, with deductions for carriage by railway. The railway was rapidly reducing the distance of stage travel.

The only inland commerce during the Mexican era was a few bands of mules sold to New Mexican traders and driven overland to Santa Fe by the old Spanish trail and one band of cattle sold to the Oregon settlers in 1837 and driven by the coast route to Oregon City. The Californians had no desire to open up an inland trade with their neighbors and the traders and trappers who came overland were not welcome.

After the discovery of gold, freighting to the mines became an important business. Supplies had to be taken by pack trains and wagons. Freight charges were excessively high at first. In 1848, "it cost $5 to carry a hundred pounds of goods from Sutter's Fort to the lower mines, a distance of twenty miles, and $10 per hundred weight for freight to the upper mines, a distance of forty miles. Two horses can draw one thousand five hundred pounds." In December, 1849, the roads were almost impassable and teamsters were charging from $40 to $50 a hundred pounds for hauling freight from Sacramento to Mormon Island.

In 1855 an inland trade was opened up between Los Angeles and Salt Lake City. The first shipment was made by Banning and Alexander. The wagon train consisted of fifteen ten-mule teams heavily freighted with merchandise. The venture was a success financially. The train left Los Angeles in May and returned in September, consuming four months in the journey. The trade increased and became quite an important factor in the business of the southern part of the state. In 1859 sixty wagons were loaded for Salt Lake in the month of January, and in March of the same year one hundred and fifty loaded with goods were sent to the Mormon capital. In 1865 and 1866 there was a considerable shipment of goods from Los Angeles to Idaho and Montana by wagon trains. These trains went by way of Salt Lake. This trade was carried on during the winter months when the roads over the Sierras and the Rocky mountains were blocked with snow.

Freighting by wagon train to Washoe formed a very important part of the inland commerce of California between 1859 and 1869. The immense freight wagons called "prairie schooners" carried almost as much as a freight car. The old-time teamster, like the old-time stage driver, was a unique character. Both have disappeared. Their occupation is gone. We shall never look on their like again.

The pony express rider came early in the history of California. Away back in 1775, when the continental congress made Benjamin Franklin postmaster-general of the United Colonies, on the Pacific coast soldier couriers, fleet mounted, were carrying their monthly budgets of mail between Monterey in Alta California, and Loreto, near the southern extremity of the peninsula of Lower California, a distance of one thousand five hundred miles.

In the winter of 1859-60 a Wall street lobby was in Washington trying to get an appropriation of $5,000,000 for carrying the mails one year between New York and San Francisco. William H. Russell, of the firm of Russell, Majors & Waddell, then engaged in running a daily stage line between the Missouri river and Salt Lake City, hearing of the lobby's efforts, offered to bet $200,000 that he could put on a mail line between San Francisco and St. Joseph that could make the distance, one thousand nine hundred and fifty miles, in ten days. The wager was accepted. Russell and his business manager, A. B. Miller, an old plains man, bought the fleetest horses they could find in the west and employed one hundred and twenty-five riders selected with reference to their light weight and courage. It was essential that the horses should be loaded as lightly as possible. The horses were stationed from ten to twenty miles apart and each rider was required to ride seventy-five miles. For change of horses and mail bag two minutes were allowed, at each station. One man took care of the two horses kept there. Everything being arranged a start was made from St. Joseph, April 3, 1860. The bet was to be decided on the race eastward. At meridian on April 3, 1860, a signal gun on a steamer at Sacramento proclaimed the hour of starting. At that signal Mr. Miller's private saddle horse, Border Rufian, with his rider bounded away toward the foothills of the Sierra Nevadas. The first twenty miles were covered in forty-nine minutes. All went well till the Platte river was reached. The river was swollen by recent rain. Rider and horse plunged boldly into it, but the horse mired in the quicksands and was drowned. The rider carrying the mail bag footed it ten miles to the next relay station. When the courier arrived at the sixty-mile station out from St. Joseph he was one hour behind time. The last one had just three hours and thirty minutes in which to make the sixty miles and win the race. A heavy rain was falling and the roads were slippery, but with six horses to make the distance he won with five minutes and a fraction to spare. And thus was finished the longest race for the largest stake ever run in America.

The pony express required to do its work nearly five hundred horses, about one hundred and ninety stations, two hundred station keepers and over a hundred riders. Each rider usually rode the horses on about seventy-five miles, but sometimes much greater distances were made. Robert H. Haslam, Pony Bob, made on one occasion a continuous ride of three hundred and eighty miles and William F. Cody, now famous as Buffalo Bill, in one continuous trip rode three hundred and eighty-four miles, stopping only for meals, and to change horses.

The pony express was a semi-weekly service. Fifteen pounds was the limit of the weight of the waterproof mail bag and its contents. The postage or charge was $5 on a letter of half an ounce. The limit was two hundred letters, but sometimes there were not more than twenty in a bag. The line never paid. The shortest time ever made by the pony express was seven days and seventeen hours. This was in March, 1861, when it carried President Lincoln's message. At first telegraphic messages were received at St. Joseph up to five o'clock p. m. of the day of starting and sent to San Francisco on the express, arriving at Placerville, which was then the eastern terminus of the line. The pony express was suspended October 27, 1861, on the completion of the telegraph.

The first stage line was established between Sacramento and Mormon Island in September, 1849, fare $16 to $32, according to times. Sacramento was the great distributing point for the mines and was also the center from which radiated numerous stage lines. In 1853 a dozen lines were owned there and the total capital invested in staging was estimated at $335,000. There were lines running to Coloma, Nevada, Placerville, Georgetown, Yankee Jim's, Jackson, Stockton, Shasta and Auburn. In 1851 Stockton had seven daily stages. The first stage line between San Francisco and San José was established in April, 1850, fare $32. A number of lines were consolidated. In 1860 the California stage company controlled eight lines northward, the longest extending seven hundred and ten miles to Portland with sixty stations, thirty-five drivers and five hundred horses, eleven drivers and one hundred and fifty horses pertaining to the rest. There were seven independent lines covering four hundred and sixty-four miles, chiefly east and south, the longest to Virginia City.* These lines disappeared with the advent of the railroad.

The pack train was a characteristic feature of early mining days. Many of the mountain camps were inaccessible to wagons and the only means of shipping in goods was by pack train. A pack train consisted of from ten to twenty mules each, laden with from two hundred to four hundred pounds. The load was fastened on the animal by means of a pack saddle which was held in its place by a cinch tightly laced around the animal's body. The sure-footed mules could climb steep grades and wind round narrow trails on the side of steep mountains without slipping or tumbling over the cliffs. Mexicans were the most expert packers.

The scheme to utilize camels and dromedaries as beasts of burden on the arid plains of the southwest was agitated in the early fifties. The chief promoter if not the originator of the project was Jefferson Davis, afterwards president of the Southern Confederacy. During the last days of the congress of 1851, Mr. Davis offered an amendment to the army appropriation bill appropriating $30,000 for the purchase of thirty camels and twenty dromedaries. The bill was defeated. When Davis was secretary of war in 1854, congress appropriated $30,000 for the purchase and importation of camels and in December of that year Major C. Wayne was sent to Egypt and Arabia to buy seventy-five. He secured the required number and shipped them on the naval store ship Supply. They were landed at Indianola, Tex., February 10, 1857. Three had died on the voyage. About half of the herd were taken to Albuquerque, where an expedition was fitted out under the command of Lieutenant Beale for Fort Tejon, Cal.; the other half was employed in packing on the plains of Texas and in the Gadsen Purchase, as Southern Arizona was then called.

It very soon became evident that the camel experiment would not be a success. The American teamster could not be converted into an Arabian camel driver. From the very first meeting there was a mutual antipathy between the

* Sacramento Union, January 1, 1861.

American mule whacker and the beast of the prophet. The teamsters when transformed into camel drivers deserted and the troopers refused to have anything to do with the misshapen beasts. So because there was no one to load and navigate these ships of the desert their voyages became less and less frequent, until finally they ceased altogether; and these desert ships were anchored at the different forts in the southwest. After the breaking out of the Civil war the camels at the forts in Texas and New Mexico were turned loose to shift for themselves. Those in Arizona and California were condemned and sold by the government to two Frenchmen who used them for packing, first in Nevada and later in Arizona, but tiring of the animals they turned them out on the desert. Some of these camels or possibly their descendants are still roaming over the arid plains of southern Arizona and Sonora.

The first telegraph was completed September 11, 1853. It extended from the business quarter of San Francisco to the Golden Gate and was used for signalling vessels. The first long line connected Marysville, Sacramento, Stockton and San José. This was completed October 24, 1853. Another line about the same time was built from San Francisco to Placerville by way of Sacramento. A line was built southward from San José along the Butterfield overland mail route to Los Angeles in 1860. The Overland Telegraph, begun in 1858, was completed November 7, 1861.

The first express for the States was sent under the auspices of the California Star (newspaper). The Star of March 1, 1848, contained the announcement that "We are about to send letters by express to the States at fifty cents each, papers twelve and a half cents; to start April 15; any mail arriving after that time will be returned to the writers. The Star refused to send copies of its rival, The Californian, in its express.

The first local express was started by Charles L. Cady in August, 1847. It left San Francisco every Monday and Fort Sacramento, its other terminus, every Thursday. Letters twenty-five cents. Its route was by way of Saucelito, Napa and Petaluma to Sacramento.

Weld & Co.'s express was established in October, 1849. This express ran from San Francisco to Marysville, having its principal offices in San Francisco, Benicia and Sacramento. It was the first express of any consequence established in California. Its name was changed to Hawley & Co.'s express. The first trip was made in the Mint, a sailing vessel, and took six days. Afterward it was transferred to the steamers Hartford and McKim. The company paid these boats $800 per month for the use of one state room; later for the same accommodation it paid $1,500 per month. The Alta California of January 7, 1850, says: "There are so many new express companies daily starting that we can scarcely keep the run of them."

The following named were the principal companies at that time: Hawley & Co., Angel, Young & Co., Todd, Bryan, Stockton Express, Henly, McKnight & Co., Brown, Knowlton & Co. The business of these express companies consisted largely in carrying letters to the mines. The letters came through the postoffice in San Francisco, but the parties to whom they were addressed were in the mines. While the miner would gladly give an ounce to hear from home he could not make the trip to the Bay at a loss of several hundred dollars in time and money. The express companies obviated this difficulty. The Alta of July 27, 1850, says: "We scarcely know what we should do if it were not for the various express lines established which enable us to hold communication with the mines. With the present defective mail communication we should scarcely ever be able to hear from the towns throughout California or from the remote portions of the Placers north or south. Hawley & Co., Todd & Bryan and Besford & Co. are three lines holding communication with different sections of the country. Adams & Co. occupy the whole of a large building on Montgomery street."

Adams & Co., established in 1850, soon became the leading express company of the coast. It absorbed a number of minor companies. It established relays of the fastest horses to carry the express to the mining towns. As early as 1852 the company's lines had penetrated the remote mining camps. Some of its riders performed feats in riding that exceeded the famous pony express riders. Isaac W. Elwell made the trip between Placerville and Sacramento in two hours and fifty minutes, distance sixty-four miles; Frank Ryan made seventy-five miles in four hours and twenty minutes. On his favorite horse, Colonel, he made twenty miles in fifty-five minutes. Adams & Co. carried on a banking business and had branch banks in all the leading mining towns. They also became a political power. In the great financial crash of 1855 they failed and in their failure ruined thousands of their depositors. Wells, Fargo & Co. express was organized in 1851. It weathered the financial storm that carried down Adams & Co. It gained the confidence of the people of the Pacific coast and has never betrayed it. Its business has grown to immense proportions. It is one of the leading express companies of the world.

CHAPTER XXXII.

RAILROADS.

THE agitation of the Pacific railroad question began only two years after the first passenger railway was put in operation in the United States. The originator of the scheme to secure the commerce of Asia by a transcontinental railway from the Atlantic to the Pacific was Hartwell Carver, grandson of the famous explorer, Jonathan Carver. He published articles in the New York Courier and Inquirer in 1832 elaborating his idea, and memorialized congress on the subject. The western terminus was to be on the Columbia river. His road was to be made of stone. There were to be sleeping cars and dining cars attached to each train. In 1836, John Plumbe, then a resident of Dubuque, Iowa, advocated the building of a railroad from Lake Michigan to Oregon. At a public meeting held in Dubuque, March 26, 1838, which Plumbe addressed, a memorial to congress was drafted "praying for an appropriation to defray the expense of the survey and location of the first link in the great Atlantic and Pacific railroad, namely, from the lakes to the Mississippi." Their application was favorably received and an appropriation being made the same year, which was expended under the direction of the secretary of war, the report being of a very favorable character.*

Plumbe received the indorsement of the Wisconsin legislature of 1839-40 and a memorial was drafted to congress urging the continuance of the work. Plumbe went to Washington to urge his project. But the times were out of joint for great undertakings. The financial panic of 1837 had left the government revenues in a demoralized condition. Plumbe's plan was to issue stock to the amount of $100,000,000 divided in shares of $5 each. The government was to appropriate alternate sections of the public lands along the line of the road. Five million dollars were to be called in for the first installment. After this was expended in building, the receipts from the sale of the lands was to continue the building of the road. One hundred miles were to be built each year and twenty years was the time set for the completion of the road. A bill granting the subsidy and authorizing the building of the road was introduced in congress, but was defeated by the southern members who feared that it would foster the growth of free states.

The man best known in connection with the early agitation of the Pacific railroad scheme is Asa Whitney, of New York. For a time he acted with Carver in promulgating the project, but took up a plan of his own. Whitney wanted a strip of land sixty miles wide along the whole length of the road, which would have given about one hundred million acres of the public domain. Whitney's scheme called forth a great deal of discussion. It was feared by some timorous souls that such a monopoly would endanger the government and by others that it would bankrupt the public treasury. The agitation was kept up for several years. The acquisition of California and New Mexico threw the project into politics. The question of depleting the treasury or giving away the public domain no longer worried the pro-slavery politicians in congress. The question that agitated them now was how far south could the road be deflected so that it would enhance the value of the lands over which they hoped to spread their pet institution—human slavery.

Another question that agitated the members of congress was whether the road should be built by the government—should be a national road. The route which the road should take was fought over year after year in congress. The south would not permit the north to have the road for fear that freemen would absorb the public lands and build up free states. It was the old dog-in-the-manger policy so characteristic of the southern proslavery politicians.

The California newspapers early took up the discussion and routes were thick as leaves in Valambrosa. In the Star of May 13, 1848, Dr. John Marsh outlines a route which was among the best proposed: "From the highest point on the Bay of San Francisco to which seagoing vessels can ascend; thence up the valley of the San Joaquin two hundred and fifty miles; thence through a low pass (Walker's) to the valley of the Colorado and thence through Arizona and New Mexico by the Santa Fe trail to Independence, Mo."

Routes were surveyed and the reports of the engineers laid before congress; memorials were received from the people of California praying for a road; bills were introduced and discussed, but the years passed and the Pacific railroad was not begun. Slavery, that "sum of all villainies," was an obstruction more impassable than the mountains and deserts that intervened between the Missouri and the Pacific. Southern politicians, aided and abetted by Gwin of California neutralized every attempt.

One of the first of several local railroad projects that resulted in something more than resolutions, public meetings and the election of a board of directors that never directed anything was the building of a railroad from San Francisco to San José. The agitation was begun early in 1850 and by February, 1851, $100,000 had been subscribed. September 6 of that year a company was organized and the projected road given the high sounding title of the Pacific & Atlantic railroad. Attempts were made to secure subscriptions for its stock in New York and in Europe, but without success. Congress was appealed to, but gave no assistance and all that there was to the road for ten years was its name. In 1859 a new organization was effected under the name of the San Francisco & San José railroad company. An attempt was made to secure a subsidy of $900,000 from the three counties through which the road was to pass, but this failed and the corporation dissolved. Another organization, the fourth, was effected with a capital stock of $2,000,000. The construction of the road was begun in October, 1860, and completed to San José January 16, 1864.

The first railroad completed and put into successful operation in California was the Sacramento Valley road. It was originally intended to extend the road from Sacramento through Placer and Sutter counties to Mountain City, in Yuba county, a distance of about forty miles. It came to a final stop at a little over half that distance. Like the San José road the question of building was agitated several years before anything was really done. In 1853 the company was reorganized under the railroad act of that year. Under the previous organization subscriptions had been obtained. The Sacramento Union of September 19, 1852, says: "The books of the Sacramento Valley railroad company were to have been opened in San Francisco Wednesday. Upwards of $200,000 of the necessary stock has been subscribed from here." The Union of September 24 announces, "That over $600,000 had already been subscribed at San Francisco and Sacramento." Under the reorganization a new board was elected November 12, 1853. C. L. Wilson was made president; F. W. Page, treasurer, and W. H. Watson, secretary. Theodore D. Judah, afterwards famous in California railroad building, was employed as engineer and the construction of the road began in February, 1855. It was completed to Folsom a distance of twenty-two miles from Sacramento and the formal opening of the road for business took place February 22, 1856. According to the secretary's report for 1857 the earnings of that year averaged $18,000 per month. The total earnings for the year amounted to $216,000; the expenses $84,000, leaving a profit of $132,000. The cost of the road and its equipment was estimated at $700,000. From this showing it would seem that California's first railroad ought to have been a paying investment, but it was not. Money then was worth 5 per cent a month and the dividends from the road about 18 per cent a year. The difference between one and a half per cent and 5 per cent a month brought the road to a standstill.

Ten years had passed since California had become a state and had its representatives in congress. In all these years the question of a railroad had come up in some form in that body, yet the railroad seemingly was as far from a consummation as it had been a decade before. In 1859 the silver mines of the Washoe were discovered and in the winter of 1859-60 the great silver rush began. An almost continuous stream of wagons, pack trains, horsemen and footmen poured over the Sierra Nevadas into Carson Valley and up the slopes of Mount Davidson to Virginia City. The main line of travel was by way of Placerville, through Johnson's Pass to Carson City. An expensive toll road was built over the mountains and monster freight wagons hauled great loads of merchandise and mill machinery to the mines. "In 1863 the tolls on the new road amounted to $300,000 and the freight bills on mills and merchandise summed up $13,000,000.*"

The rush to Washoe gave a new impetus to railroad projecting. A convention of the whole coast had been held at San Francisco in September, 1859, but nothing came of it beyond propositions and resolutions. Early in 1861, Theodore P. Judah called a railroad meeting at the St. Charles hotel in Sacramento. The feasibility of a road over the mountains, the large amount of business that would come to that road from the Washoe mines and the necessity of Sacramento moving at once to secure that trade were pointed out. This road would be the beginning of a transcontinental line and Sacramento had the opportunity of becoming its terminus. Judah urged upon some of the leading business men the project of organizing a company to begin the building of a transcontinental road. The Washoe trade and travel would be a very important item in the business of the road.

On the 28th of June, 1861, the Central Pacific Railroad company was organized under the general incorporation law of the state. Leland Stanford was chosen president, C. P. Huntington, vice-president, Mark Hopkins, treasurer, James Bailey, secretary, and T. D. Judah, chief engineer. The directors were those just named and E. B. Crocker, John F. Morse, D. W. Strong and Charles Marsh. The capital stock of the company was $8,500,000 divided into eighty-five thousand shares of $100 each. The shares taken by individuals were few, Stanford, Huntington, Hopkins, Judah and Charles Crocker subscribing for one hundred and fifty each; Glidden & Williams, one hundred and twenty-five shares; Charles A. Lombard and Orville D. Lombard, three hundred and twenty shares; Samuel Hooper, Benjamin J. Reed, Samuel P. Shaw, fifty shares each; R. O. Ives, twenty-five shares; Edwin B. Crocker, ten shares; Samuel Brannan, two hundred shares; cash subscriptions of which 10 per cent was required by law to be paid down realizing but a few thousand dollars with which to begin so important a work as a railroad across the Sierra Nevada.*

The total amount subscribed was $158,000, scarcely enough to build five miles of road on the level plains if it had all been paid up. None of the men in the enterprise was rich. Indeed, as fortunes go now, none of them had more than a competence. Charles Crocker, who was one of the best off, in his sworn statement, placed the value of his property at $25,000; C. P. Huntington placed the value of his individual possessions at $7,222, while Leland Stanford and his brother together owned property worth $32,950. The incubus that so long had prevented building a Pacific railroad was removed. The war of secession had begun. The southern senators and representatives were no longer in congress to obstruct legislation. The thirty-second and the thirty-fifth parallel roads southern schemes, were out of the way or rather the termini of these roads were inside the confederate lines.

A bill 'to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean and to secure to the government the use of the same for postal, military and other purposes passed both houses and became a law July 1, 1862. The bill provided for the building of the road by two companies. The Union Pacific (which was to be a union of several roads already projected) was given the construction of the road to the eastern boundary of California, where it would connect with the Central Pacific. Government bonds were to be given to the companies to the amount of $16,000 per mile to the foot of the mountains and $48,000 per mile through the mountains when forty miles of road had been built and approved by the government commissioners. In addition to the bonds the companies were to receive "every alternate section of public land designated by odd numbers to the amount of five alternate sections per mile on each side of the railroad on the line thereof and within the limits of ten miles on each side of the road not sold, reserved or otherwise disposed of by the United States." Mineral lands were exempted and any lands unsold three years after the completion of the entire road were subject to a preemption like other public lands at a price not exceeding $1.25 per acre, payable to the company.

The government bonds were a first mortgage on the road. The ceremony of breaking ground for the beginning of the enterprise took place at Sacramento, February 22, 1863, Governor Stanford throwing the first shovelful of earth, and work was begun on the first eighteen miles of the road which was let by contract to be finished by August, 1863. The Central Pacific company was in hard lines. Its means were not sufficient to build forty miles which must be completed before the subsidy could be received. In October, 1863, Judah who had been instrumental in securing the first favorable legislation set out a second time for Washington to ask further assistance from congress. At New York he was stricken with a fever and died there. To him more than any other man is due the credit of securing for the Pacific coast its first transcontinental railroad. In July, 1864, an amended act was passed increasing the land grant from six thousand four hundred acres to twelve thousand eight hundred per mile and reducing the number of miles to be built annually from fifty to twenty-five. The company was allowed to bond its road to the same amount per mile as the government subsidy.

The Western Pacific, which was virtually a continuation of the Central Pacific, was organized in December, 1862, for the purpose of building a railroad from Sacramento via Stockton to San José. A branch of this line was constructed from Niles to Oakland, which was made the terminus of the Central Pacific. The Union Pacific did not begin construction until 1865, while the Central Pacific had forty-four miles constructed. In 1867 the Central Pacific had reached the state line. It had met with many obstacles in the shape of lawsuits and unfavorable comments by the press. From the state line it pushed out through Nevada and on the 28th of April, 1869, the two companies met with their completed roads at Promontory Point in Utah, fifty-three miles west of Ogden. The ceremony of joining the two roads took place May 10. The last tie, a handsomely finished piece of California laurel, was laid and Governor Stanford with a silver hammer drove a golden spike. The two locomotives, one from the east and one from the west, bumped noses and the first transcontinental railroad was completed.

The Southern Pacific Railroad company of California was incorporated in December, 1865. It was incorporated to build a railroad from some point on the bay of San Francisco through the counties of Santa Clara, Monterey, San Luis Obispo, Tulare, Los Angeles to San Diego and thence easterly through San Diego to the eastern boundary of the state there to connect with a railroad from the Mississippi river.

"In July, 1866, congress granted to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad company to aid in the construction of its road and telegraph line from Springfield, Mo., by the most eligible route to Albuquerque in New Mexico and thence by the thirty-fifth parallel route to the Pacific, an amount of land equal to that granted to the Central Pacific. By this act the Southern Pacific Railroad was authorized to connect with the Atlantic and Pacific near the boundary line of California, at such point as should be deemed most suitable by the companies and should have therefore the same amount of land per mile as the Atlantic and Pacific."*

In 1867 the Southern Pacific company decided to change its route and instead of building down through the coast counties to go eastward from Gilroy through Pacheco's pass into the upper San Joaquin valley through Fresno, Kern and San Bernardino to the Colorado river near Fort Mojave. This contemplated change left the lower coast counties out in the cold and caused considerable dissatisfaction, and an attempt was made to prevent it from getting a land subsidy. Congress, however, authorized the change, as did the California legislature of 1870, and the road secured the land.

The San Francisco and San José Railroad came into possession of the Southern Pacific company, San Francisco donating three thousand shares of stock in that road on condition that the Southern Pacific company, after it secured the San José road, should extend it to the southeastern boundary of the state. In 1869 a proposition was made to the supervisors of San Francisco to donate $1,000,000 in bonds of the city to the Southern Pacific company, on condition that it build two hundred miles south from Gilroy, the bonds to be delivered on the completion and stocking of each section of fifty miles of road. The bonds were voted by the people of the city. The road was built to Soledad, seventy miles from Gilroy, and then stopped. The different branch roads in the San José and Salinas valley were all consolidated under the name of the Southern Pacific. The Central Pacific and the Southern Pacific, although apparently different organizations, were really one company.

The Southern Pacific built southward from Lathrop, a station on the Central Pacific's line, a railroad up the valley by way of Tehachapi Pass to Los Angeles. While this road was in course of construction in 1872 a proposition was made to the people of Los Angeles through the county board of supervisors to vote a subsidy equal to 5 per cent of the entire amount of the taxable property of the county on condition that the Southern Pacific build fifty miles of its main line to Yuma in the county. Part of the subsidy was to be paid in bonds of the Los Angeles & San Pedro Railroad, amounting to $377,000 and sixty acres of land for depot purposes. The total amount of subsidy to be given was $610,000. The proposition was accepted by the people, the railroad company in addition to its original offer agreeing to build a branch road twenty-seven miles long to Anaheim. This was done to head off the Tom Scott road which had made a proposition to build a branch road from San Diego to Los Angeles to connect with the Texas Pacific road which the year before had been granted a right of way from Marshall, Tex., to San Diego, and was preparing to build its road. The Southern Pacific completed its road to Los Angeles in September, 1876, and reached the Colorado river on its way east in April, 1877. It obtained the old franchise of the Texas Pacific and continued its road eastward to El Paso, Tex., where it made connections with roads to New Orleans and other points south and east, thus giving California its second transcontinental railroad. This road was completed to El Paso in 1881.

The Atlantic & Pacific road with which the Southern Pacific was to connect originally, suffered from the financial crash of 1873 and suspended operations for a time. Later it entered into a combination with the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe and St. Louis & San Francisco railroad companies. This gave the Atchison road a half interest in the charter of the Atlantic & Pacific. The two companies built a main line jointly from Albuquerque (where the Atchison road ended) west to the Colorado river at the Needles. Their intention was to continue the road to Los Angeles and San Francisco.

The California Southern and the California Southern Extension companies were organized to extend the Atlantic & Pacific from Barstow to San Diego. These companies consolidated and completed a road from San Diego to San Bernardino September 13, 1883. The Southern Pacific interfered. It attempted to prevent the California Southern from crossing its tracks at Colton by placing a heavy engine at the point of crossing, but was compelled to move the engine to save it from demolition. It built a branch from Mojave station to connect with the Atlantic & Pacific in which it had an interest. This gave connection for the Atlantic & Pacific over the Southern Pacific lines with both Los Angeles and San Francisco. This was a serious blow to the California Southern, but disasters never come singly. The great flood of January, 1884, swept down through the Temecula Cañon and carried about thirty miles of its track out to sea. It was doubtful under the circumstances whether it would pay to rebuild it. Finally the Southern Pacific agreed to sell its extension from Barstow to the Needles to the California Southern, reserving its road from Barstow to Mojave. Construction was begun at once on the California Southern line from Barstow to San Bernardino and in November, 1885, the road was completed from Barstow to San Diego. In October, 1886, the road passed under control of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe. In the spring of 1887 the road was extended westerly from San Bernardino to meet the San Gabriel valley road which had been built eastward from Los Angeles through Pasadena. The completed line reached Los Angeles in May, 1887, thus giving California a third transcontinental line.

After many delays the gap in the Southern Pacific coast line was closed and the first trains from the north and the south passed over its entire length between Los Angeles and San Francisco on the 31st of March, 1901, nearly thirty years after the first section of the road was built.

The Oregon & California and the Central Pacific were consolidated in 1870. The two ends of the road were united at Ashland, Ore., in 1887. The entire line is now controlled by the Southern Pacific, and, in connection with the Northern Pacific and the Oregon Railway & Navigation Road at Portland, forms a fourth transcontinental line for California.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

THE INDIAN QUESTION.

IT IS quite the fashion now with a certain school of writers, who take their history of California from "Ramona" and their information on the "Indian question" under the rule of the mission padres from sources equally fictitious, to draw invidious comparisons between the treatment of the Indian by Spain and Mexico when mission rule was dominant in California and his treatment by the United States after the conquest.

That the Indian was brutally treated and unmercifully slaughtered by the American miners and rancheros in the early '50s none will deny; that he had fared but little better under the rule of Spain and Mexico is equally true. The tame and submissive Indians of the sea coast with whom the mission had to deal were a very different people from the mountain tribes with whom the Americans came in conflict.

We know but little of the conquistas or gentile hunts that were occasionally sent out from the mission to capture subjects for conversion. The history of these was not recorded. From "The narrative of a voyage to the Pacific and Berings strait with the Polar expedition; performed in his majesty's ship Blossom, under command of Capt. F. W. Beechey, R. N., in the years 1825-26-27-28, we have the story of one of these conquistas or convert raids. Captain Beechey visited California in 1828. While in California he studied the missions, or at least those he visited, and after his return to England published his observations. His observations have great value. He was a disinterested observer and gave a plain, straightforward, truthful account of what he saw, without prejudice or partiality. His narrative dispels much of the romance that some modern writers throw around mission life. This conquista set out from the Mission San José.

"At a particular period of the year also, when the Indians can be spared from agricultural concerns of the establishment, many are permitted to take the launch of the mission and make excursions to the Indian territory. All are anxious to go on such occasions. Some to visit friends, some to procure the manufactures of their barbarian countrymen (which, by the by, are often better than their own) and some with a secret determination never to return. On these occasions the padres desire them to induce as many of their unconverted brethren as possible to accompany them back to the mission; of course, implying that this is to be done only by persuasion; but the boat being furnished with a cannon and musketry and in every respect equipped for war, it too often happens that the neophytes and the gente de razon, who superintend the direction of the boat, avail themselves of their superiority with the desire of ingratiating themselves with their master and receiving a reward. There are besides repeated acts of aggression, which it is necessary to punish, all of which furnish proselytes. Women and children are generally the first objects of capture, as their husbands and parents sometimes voluntarily follow them into captivity. These misunderstandings and captivities keep up a perpetual enmity amongst the tribes whose thirst for revenge is insatiable."

We had an opportunity of witnessing the tragical issue of one of these holiday excursions of the neophytes of the Mission San José. The launch was armed, as usual, and placed under the superintendence of an alcalde of the mission, who appears from one statement (for there are several), converted the party of pleasure either into an attack for procuring proselytes or of revenge upon a particular tribe for some aggression in which they were concerned. They proceeded up the Rio San Joachin until they came to the territory of a particular tribe named Consemenes, when they disembarked with the gun and encamped for the night near the village of Los Gentiles, intending to make an attack upon them next morning, but before they were prepared the gentiles, who had been apprised of their intention and had collected a large body of their friends, became the assailants and pressed so hard upon the party that, notwithstanding they dealt death in every direction with their cannon and musketry and were inspired with confidence by the contempt in which they held the valor and tactics of their unconverted countrymen, they were overpowered by numbers and obliged to seek their safety in flight and to leave the gun in the woods. Some regained the launch and were saved and others found their way overland to the mission, but thirty-four of the party never returned to tell their tale.

"There were other accounts of the unfortunate affair, one of which accused the padre of authorizing the attack. The padre was greatly displeased at the result of the excursion, as the loss of so many Indians to the mission was of great consequence and the confidence with which the victory would inspire the Indians was equally alarming.

"He therefore joined with the converted Indians in a determination to chastise and strike terror into the victorious tribe and in concert with the governor planned an expedition against them. The mission furnished money, arms, Indians and horses and the presidio troops, headed by Alferes Sanches, a veteran, who had been frequently engaged with the Indians and was acquainted with that part of the country. The expedition set out November 19, and we heard nothing of it until the 27th, but two days after the troops had taken to the field some immense columns of smoke rising above the mountains in the direction of the Cosemmes bespoke the conflagration of the village of the persecuted gentiles; and on the day above mentioned the veteran Sanches made a triumphant entry into the Mission of San José, escorting forty miserable women and children. The gun which had been lost in the first battle was retaken and other trophies captured.

"This victory, so glorious according to the ideas of the conquerors, was achieved with the loss of only one man on the part of the Christians, who was mortally wounded by the bursting of his own gun; but on the part of the enemy it was considerable, as Sanches the morning after the battle counted forty-one men, women and children dead. It is remarkable that none of the prisoners was wounded and it is greatly to be feared that the Christians, who could scarcely be prevented from revenging the death of their relatives upon those who were brought to the mission, glutted their brutal passions on all who fell into their hands.

"The prisoners they had captured were immediately enrolled in the list of the mission, except a nice little boy whose mother was shot while running away with him in her arms, and he was sent to the presidio and, as I heard, given to the Alferes as a reward for his services. The poor little orphan had received a slight wound in his forehead; he wept bitterly at first and refused to eat, but in time became reconciled to his fate.

"Those who were taken to the mission were immediately converted and were daily taught by the neophytes to repeat the Lord's prayer and certain hymns in the Spanish language. I happened to visit the mission about this time and saw these unfortunate beings under tuition. They were clothed in blankets and arranged in a row before a blind Indian, who understood their dialect and was assisted by an alcalde to keep order. Their tutor began by desiring them to kneel, informing them that he was going to teach them the names of the persons composing the trinity and they were to repeat in Spanish what he dictated. The neophytes being arranged, the speaker began: 'Santísima Trinidad, Dios, Jesu Christo, Espiritu Santo,' pausing between each name to listen if the simple Indians, who had never before spoken a word of Spanish, pronounced it correctly or anything near the mark. After they had repeated these names satisfactorily, their blind tutor, after a pause, added 'Santos' and recapitulated the names of a great many saints, which finished the morning's lesson.

"They did not appear to me to pay much attention to what was going forward and I observed to the padre that I thought their teachers had an arduous task, but he said they had never found any difficulty; that the Indians were accustomed to change their own gods and that their conversion was in a measure habitual to them.

"The expenses of the late expedition fell heavily upon the mission and I was glad to find the padre thought it was paying very dear for so few converts, as in all probability it will lessen his desire to undertake another expedition and the poor Indians will be spared the horrors of being butchered by their own countrymen or dragged from their homes into captivity."

This conquista and the results that followed were very similar to some of the so-called Indian wars that took place after the American occupation. The Indians were provoked to hostilities by outrage and injustice. Then the military came down on them and wiped them out of existence.

The unsanitary condition of the Indian villages at some of the missions was as fatal as an Indian war. The Indian was naturally filthy, but in his native state he had the whole country to roam over. If his village became too filthy and the vermin in it too aggressive, he purified it by fire—burned up his wigwam. The adobe houses that took the place of the brush hovel, which made up the early mission villages, could not be burned to purify them. No doubt the heavy death rate at the missions was due largely to the uncleanly habits of the neophytes. The statistics given in the chapter on the Franciscan missions show that in all the missionary establishments a steady decline, a gradual extinction of the neophyte population, had been in progress for two to three decades before the missions were secularized. Had secularization been delayed or had it not taken place in the course of a few decades, at the rate the neophytes were dying off the missions would have become depopulated. The death rate was greater than the birth rate in all of them and the mortality among the children was greater even than among the adults. After secularization the neophytes drifted to the cities and towns where they could more readily gratify their passion for strong drink. Their mission training and their Christianity had no restraining influence upon them. Their vicious habits, which were about the only thing they had acquired by their contact with the whites, soon put an end to them.

During the Spanish and Mexican eras Northern California remained practically a terra incognita. Two missions, San Rafael and San Francisco Solano, and the castillo at Sonora, had been established as a sort of protection to the northern frontier. A few armed incursions had been made into the country beyond these to punish Indian horse and cattle thieves. General Vallejo, who was in command of the troops on the frontera del norte, had always endeavored to cultivate friendly relations with the gentiles, but the padres disliked to have these near the missions on account of their influence on the neophytes. Near the Mission San Rafael, in 1833, occurred one of those Indian massacres not uncommon under Spanish and Mexican rule. A body of gentiles from the rancherias of Pulia, encouraged by Figueroa and Vallejo, came to the Mission San Rafael with a view to establishing friendly relations. The padre put off the interview until next day. During the night a theft was committed, which was charged to the gentiles. Fifteen of them were seized and sent as prisoners to San Francisco. Padre Mercado, fearing that their countrymen might retaliate, sent out his major doma Molina with thirty-seven armed neophytes, who surprised the gentiles in their rancheria, killed twenty-one, wounded many more and captured twenty men, women and children. Vallejo was indignant at the shameful violation of his promises of protection to the Indians. He released the prisoners at San Francisco and the captives at the mission and tried to pacify the wrathful gentiles. Padre Mercado was suspended from his ministry for a short time, but was afterward freed and returned to San Rafael.*

There was a system of Indian slavery in existence in California under the rule of Spain and Mexico. Most of the wealthier Spanish and Mexican families had Indian servants. In the raids upon the gentiles the children taken by the soldiers were sometimes sold or disposed of to families for servants. Expeditions were gotten up upon false pretexts, while the main purpose was to steal Indian children and sell them to families for servants. This practice was carried on by the Americans, too, after the conquest.

For a time after the discovery of gold the Indians and the miners got along amicably. The first miners were mainly old Californians, used to the Indians, but with the rush of '49 came many rough characters who, by their injustice, soon stirred up trouble. Sutter had employed a large number of Indians on his ranches and in various capacities. These were faithful and honest. Some of them were employed at his mill in Coloma and in the diggings. In the spring of '49 a band of desperadoes known as the Mountain Hounds murdered eight of these at the mill. Marshall, in trying to defend them, came near being lynched by the drunken brutes.

The injustice done the Indians soon brought on a number of so-called Indian wars. These were costly affairs to the state and in less than two years had plunged the young commonwealth into a debt of nearly $1,000,000. In a copy of the Los Angeles Star for February 28, 1852, I find this enumeration of the wars and the estimated cost of each: The Morehead expedition, $120,000; General Bean's first expedition, $66,000; General Bean's second expedition, $50,000; the Mariposa war, $230,000; the El Dorado war, $300,000. The Morehead war originated out of an injustice done the Yuma Indians. These Indians, in the summer of 1849, had obtained an old scow and established a ferry across the Colorado river near the mouth of the Gila, and were making quite a paying business out of it by ferrying emigrants across the river. A party of Americans, headed by a Dr. Langdon of Louisiana, and a desperado named Jack Glanton, dispossessed the Indians of their boat, and having obtained a liberal supply of whiskey from San Diego set up in business for themselves. The Indians, watching their opportunity, while the whites were asleep or stupefied with drink, fell upon and massacred the whole party, twelve or fifteen in all, and secured some $15,000 or $20,000 in money. On receipt of the news, Governor Burnett ordered Major-General Bean of the state militia to march against the Yumas. Bean sent his quartermaster-general, Joseph C. Morehead. Morehead, on Bean's orders, provided necessaries for a three months' campaign at most extravagant prices, paying for them in drafts on the state treasury. Morehead started out from Los Angeles with forty men, but by the time he reached the Colorado river he had recruited his force to one hundred and twenty-five men. The liquid supplies taken along doubtless stimulated recruiting. They reached the Colorado in the summer of 1850, camped there and attacked their rations. After a month's siege (of their rations) they were ordered back and disbanded. The only loss was one man wounded (accidentally). He was sent back to Los Angeles for treatment. The doctor who treated him charged the state $500. The man who boarded him put in a bill of $120; and the patriot who housed him wanted $45 for house rent. Bean's first and second expeditions were very similar in results to the Morehead campaign. The El Dorado expedition or Rogers' war, as it was sometimes called, was another of Governor Burnett's fiascos. He ordered William Rogers, sheriff of El Dorado county, to call out two hundred men at the state's expense to punish the Indians for killing some whites who had, in all probability, been the aggressors and the Indians had retaliated. It was well known that there were men in that part of the country who had wantonly killed Indians for the pleasure of boasting of their exploits.

Nor were the whites always the aggressors. There were bad Indians, savages, who killed without provocation and stole whenever an opportunity offered. In their attempts at retaliation the Indians slaughtered indiscriminately and the innocent more often were their victims than the guilty. On the side of the whites it was a war of extermination waged in many instances without regard to age or sex; on the part of the Indian it was a war of retaliation waged with as little distinction.

The extermination of the aborigines was fearfully rapid. Of over ten thousand Indians in Yuba, Placer, Nevada and Sierra counties in 1849 not more than thirty-eight hundred remained in 1854. Much of this decrease had been brought about by dissipation and disease engendered by contact with the whites. Reservations were established in various parts of the state, where Indians abounded, but the large salaries paid to agents and the numerous opportunities for speculation made these positions attractive to politicians, who were both incompetent and dishonest. The Indians, badly treated at the reservations, deserted them whenever an opportunity offered.

A recital of the atrocities committed upon each other in the northwestern part of the state during a period of nearly twenty years would fill a volume. The Indian with all his fiendishness was often outmatched in cruelty by his pale faced brother. The Indian Island massacre was scarcely ever equaled in the annals of Indian cruelties. Indian Island lies nearly opposite the city of Eureka in Humboldt Bay. On this island, fifty years ago, was a large rancheria of inoffensive Indians, who lived chiefly by fishing. They had not been implicated in any of the wars or raids that had disturbed that part of the country. They maintained many of their old customs and had an annual gathering, at which they performed various rites and ceremonies, accompanied by dancing. A number of the Indians from the mainland joined them at these times. Near midnight of February 25, 1860, a number of boats filled with white men sped silently out to the island. The whites landed and quietly surrounded the Indians, who were resting after their orgies, and began the slaughter with axes, knives and clubs, splitting skulls, knocking out brains and cutting the throats of men, women and children. Of the two hundred Indians on the island only four or five men escaped by swimming to the mainland. The same night a rancheria at the entrance of Humboldt Bay and another at the mouth of Eel river were attacked and about one hundred Indians slaughtered. The fiends who committed these atrocities belonged to a secret organization. No rigid investigation was ever made to find out who they were. The grand jury mildly condemned the outrage and there the matter ended.

The Indians kept up hostilities, rendering travel and traffic unsafe on the borders of Humboldt, Klamath and Trinity counties. Governor Stanford in 1863 issued a proclamation for the enlistment of six companies of volunteers from the six northwestern counties of the state. These recruits were organized into what was known as the Mountaineer battalion with Lieut.-Col. Stephen G. Whipple in command. A number of Indian tribes united and a desultory warfare began. The Indians were worsted in nearly every engagement. Their power was broken and in February, 1865, fragments of the different tribes were gathered into the Hoopa Valley reservation. The Mountaineer battalion in what was known as the "Two Years' War" settled the Indian question from Shasta to the sea for all time.

The Modoc war was the last of the Indian disturbances in the state. The Modocs inhabited the country about Rhett Lake and Lost river in the northeast part of the state, bordering on Oregon. Their history begins with the massacre of an immigrant train of sixty-five persons, men, women and children, on their way from Oregon to California. This brought upon them a reprisal by the whites in which forty-one out of forty-six Indians who had been invited by Benjamin Wright to a pow wow after they had laid aside their arms were set upon by Wright and his companions with revolvers and all killed but five. In 1864 a treaty had been made with the Modocs by which they were to reside on the Klamath reservation. But tiring of reservation life, under their leader, Captain Jack, they returned to their old homes on Lost river. A company of United States troops and several volunteers who went along to see the fun were sent to bring them back to the reservation. They refused to go and a fight ensued in which four of the volunteers and one of the regulars were killed, and the troops retreated. The Modocs after killing several settlers gathered at the lava beds near Rhett Lake and prepared for war.

beds January 17, 1873. Captain Jack had but fifty-one men. When Wheaton retreated he had lost thirty-five men killed and a number wounded, but not an Indian had been hurt. A few days after the battle a peace commission was proposed at Washington. A. B. Meacham, Jesse Applegate and Samuel Case were appointed. Elijah Steele of Yreka, who was on friendly terms with the Indians, was sent for. He visited the lava beds with the interpreter, Fairchild, and had a big talk. He proposed to them to surrender and they would be sent to Angel Island near San Francisco, fed and cared for and allowed to select any reservation they wished. Steele, on his return to camp, reported that the Indians accepted the terms, but Fairchild said they had not and next day on his return Steele found out his mistake and barely escaped with his life. Interviews continued without obtaining any definite results, some of the commission became disgusted and returned home. General Canby, commanding the department, had arrived and taken charge of affairs. Commissioner Case resigned and Judge Rosborough was appointed in his place and the Rev. E. Thomas, a doctor of divinity in the Methodist church, was added to the commission. A man by the name of Riddle and his wife Toby, a Modoc, acted as go-betweens and negotiations continued.

A pow wow was arranged at the council tent at which all parties were to meet unarmed, but Toby was secretly informed that it was the intention of the Modocs to massacre the commissioners as had been done to the Indian commissioners twenty years before by Benjamin Wright and his gang. On April 10, while Meacham and Dyer, the superintendent of the Klamath reservation, who had joined the commissioners, were away from camp, the Rev. Dr. Thomas made an agreement with a delegation from Captain Jack for the commission and General Canby to meet the Indians at the council tent. Meacham on his return opposed the arrangement, fearing treachery. The doctor insisted that God had done a wonderful work in the Modoc camp, but Meacham shocked the pious doctor by saying "God had not been in the Modoc camp this winter."

Two of the Indian leaders, Boston Charley and Bogus Charley, came to headquarters to accompany the commission. Riddle and his wife, Toby, bitterly opposed the commissioners' going, telling them they would be killed, and Toby going so far as to seize Meacham's horse to prevent him from going, telling him, "You get kill." Canby and the doctor insisted upon going, despite all protests, the doctor saying, "Let us go as we agreed and trust in God." Meacham and Dyer secured derringers in their side pockets before going. When the commissioners, the interpreters, Riddle and his wife, reached the council tent they found Captain Jack, Schonchin John, Black Jim, Shancknasty Jim, Ellen's Man and Hooker Jim sitting around a fire at the council tent. Concealed behind some rocks a short distance away were two young Indians with a number of rifles. The two Charleys, Bogus and Boston, who had come with the commissioners from headquarters, informed the Indians that the commissioners were not armed. The interview began. The Indians were very insolent. Suddenly, at a given signal, the Indians uttered a war whoop, and Captain Jack drew a revolver from under his coat and shot General Canby. Boston Charley shot Dr. Thomas, who fell, rose again, but was shot down while begging for his life. The young Indians had brought up the rifles and a fusillade was begun upon the others. All escaped without injury except Meacham, who, after running some distance, was felled by a bullet fired by Hooker Jim, and left for dead. He was saved from being scalped by the bravery of Toby. He recovered, however, although badly disfigured. While this was going on, Curly Haired Doctor and several other Modocs, with a white flag, inveigled Lieutenants Boyle and Sherwood beyond the lines. Seeing the Indians were armed, the officers turned to flee, when Curly Haired Jack fired and broke Lieutenant Sherwood's thigh. He died a few days later. The troops were called to arms when the firing began, but the Indians escaped to the lava beds. After a few days' preparation, Colonel Gillem, who was in command, began an attack on the Indian stronghold. Their position was shelled by mountain howitzers. In the fighting, which lasted four days, sixteen soldiers were killed and thirteen wounded. In a reconnoissance under Captain Thomas a few days later, a body of seventy troops and fourteen Warm Spring Indians ran into an ambush of the Indians and thirteen soldiers, including Thomas, were killed. Gen. Jefferson C. Davis was placed in command. The Indians were forced out of the lava beds, their water supply having been cut off. They quarreled among themselves, broke up into parties, were chased down and all captured. Captain Jack and Schonchin John, the two leaders, were shackled together. General Davis made preparations to hang these and six or eight others, but orders from Washington stopped him. The leading Indians were tried by court-martial. Captain Jack, Schonchin John, Black Jim and Boston Charley were hung, two others were sentenced to imprisonment for life. The other Modocs, men, women and children, were sent to a fort in Nebraska and afterwards transferred to the Quaw Paw Agency in Indian Territory. This ended the Modoc war and virtually put an end to the Modoc Indians.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

SOME POLITICAL HISTORY.

THE first Chinese emigrants to California arrived in the brig Eagle, from Hong Kong, in the month of February, 1848. They were two men and one woman. This was before the discovery of gold was known abroad. What brought these waifs from the Flowery Kingdom to California does not appear in the record. February 1, 1849, there were fifty-four Chinamen and one Chinawoman in the territory. January 1, 1850, seven hundred and eighty-nine men and two women had arrived. January 1, 1851, four thousand and eighteen men and seven women; a year later their numbers had increased to eight thousand one hundred and twenty-one men and eight women; May 7, 1852, eleven thousand seven hundred and eighty men and seven women had found their way to the land of gold. The Alta California, from which I take these figures, estimated that between seven and ten thousand more would arrive in the state before January 1, 1853. The editor sagely remarks: "No one fears danger or misfortune from their excessive numbers." There was no opposition to their coming; on the contrary, they were welcomed and almost lionized. The Alta of April 27, 1851, remarks: "An American barque yesterday brought eighty worshippers of the sun, moon and many stars. These Celestials make excellent citizens and we are pleased to notice their daily arrival in large numbers." The Alta describes a Great Chinese meeting on Portsmouth Square, which took place in 1851. It seems to have been held for the purpose of welcoming the Chinese to California and at the same time doing missionary work and distributing religious tracts among them. The report says: "A large assemblage of citizens and several ladies collected on the plaza to witness the ceremonies. Ah Hee assembled his division and Ah Sing marched his into Kearny street, where the two divisions united and then marched to the square. Many carried fans. There were several peculiar looking Chinamen among them. One, a very tall, old Celestial with an extensive tail, excited universal attention. He had a huge pair of spectacles upon his nose, the glasses of which were about the size of a telescope lens. He also had a singularly colored fur mantle or cape upon his shoulders and a long sort of robe. We presume he must be a mandarin at least.

"Vice Consul F. A. Woodworth, His Honor, Major J. W. Geary, Rev. Albert Williams, Rev. A. Fitch and Rev. F. D. Hunt were present. Ah Hee acted as interpreter. The Rev. Hunt gave them some orthodox instruction in which they were informed of the existence of a country where the China boys would never die; this made them laugh quite heartily. Tracts, scriptural documents, astronomical works, almanacs and other useful religious and instructive documents printed in Chinese characters were distributed among them."

I give the report of another meeting of "The Chinese residents of San Francisco," taken from the Alta of December 10, 1849. I quote it to show how the Chinese were regarded when they first came to California and how they were flattered and complimented by the presence of distinguished citizens at their meetings. Their treatment a few years later, when they were mobbed and beaten in the streets for no fault of theirs except for coming to a Christian country, must have given them a very poor opinion of the white man's consistency. "A public meeting of the Chinese residents of the town was held on the evening of Monday, November 19, at the Canton Restaurant on Jackson street. The following preamble and resolutions were presented and adopted:

"Whereas, It becomes necessary for us, strangers as we are in a strange land, unacquainted with the language and customs of our adopted country, to have some recognized counselor and advisor to whom we may all appeal with confidence for wholesome instruction, and,

"Whereas, We should be at a loss as to what course of action might be necessary for us to pursue therefore,

"Resolved, That a committee of four be appointed to wait upon Selim E. Woodworth, Esq., and request him in behalf of the Chinese residents of San Francisco to act in the capacity of arbiter and advisor for them."

"Mr. Woodworth was waited upon by Ah Hee, Jon Ling, Ah Ting and Ah Toon and kindly consented to act. The whole affair passed off in the happiest manner. Many distinguished guests were present, Hon. J. W. Geary, alcalde; E. H. Harrison, ex-collector of the port, and others."

At the celebration of the admission of California into the Union the "China Boys" were a prominent feature. One report says: "The Celestials had a banner of crimson satin on which were some Chinese characters and the inscription 'China Boys.' They numbered about fifty and were arrayed in the richest stuff and commanded by their chief, Ah Sing."

While the "China Boys" were feted and flattered in San Francisco they were not so enthusiastically welcomed by the miners. The legislature in 1850 passed a law fixing the rate of license for a foreign miner at $20 per month. This was intended to drive out and keep out of the mines all foreigners, but the rate was so excessively high that it practically nullified the enforcement of the law and it was repealed in 1851. As the Chinese were only allowed peaceable possession of mines that would not pay white man's wages they did not make fortunes in the diggings. If by chance the Asiatics should happen to strike it rich in ground abandoned by white men there was a class among the white miners who did not hesitate to rob the Chinamen of their ground.

As a result of their persecution in the mines the Chinese flocked to San Francisco and it was not long until that city had more "China Boys" than it needed in its business. The legislature of 1855 enacted a law that masters, owners or consignors of vessels bringing to California persons incompetent to become citizens under the laws of the state should pay a fine of $50 for every such person landed. A suit was brought to test the validity of the act; it was declared unconstitutional. In 1858 the foreign miner's tax was $10 per month and as most of the other foreigners who had arrived in California in the early '50s had by this time become citizens by naturalization the foreigners upon whom the tax bore most heavily were the Chinese who could not become citizens. As a consequence many of them were driven out of the mines and this again decreased the revenue of the mining counties, a large part of which was made up of poll tax and license.

The classes most bitterly opposed to the Chinese in the mines were the saloon-keepers, the gamblers and their constituents. While the Chinaman himself is a most inveterate gambler and not averse to strong drink he did not divest himself of his frugal earnings in the white man's saloon or gambling den, and the gentry who kept these institutions were the first, like Bill Nye in Bret Harte's poem, to raise the cry, "We are ruined by Chinese cheap labor." While the southern politicians who were the rulers of the state before the Civil war were opposed to the Chinese and legislated against them, it was not done in the interest of the white laborer, for at one time they had made an attempt to introduce the coolie system, which was to have been a substitute for their beloved institution—slavery. They could not endure the presence of an inferior race not in bondage. The most intolerant and the most bitter opponents of the Chinese then and later when opposition had intensified were certain servile classes of Europeans who in their native countries had always been kept in a state of servility to the aristocracy, but when raised to the dignity of American citizens by naturalization proceeded to celebrate their release from their former serfdom by persecuting the Chinese, whom they regarded as their inferiors. The outcry these people made influenced politicians, who pandered to them for the sake of their votes to make laws and ordinances that were often burlesques on legislation.

In 1870 the legislature enacted a law imposing a penalty of not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000 or imprisonment upon any one bringing to California any subject of China or Japan without first presenting evidence of his or her good character to the commissioner of immigration. The supreme court decided the law unconstitutional. Laws were passed prohibiting the employment of Chinese on the public works; prohibiting them from owning real estate and from obtaining licenses for certain kinds of business. The supervisors of San Francisco passed an ordinance requiring that the hair of any male prisoner convicted of an offense should be cut within one inch of his head. This, of course, was aimed at Chinese convicts and intended to deprive them of their queues and degrade them in the estimation of their people. It was known as the Pig Tail Ordinance; the mayor vetoed it. Another piece of class legislation by the San Francisco supervisors imposed a license of $15 a quarter on laundries using no horses, while a laundry using a one-horse wagon paid but $2 per quarter. The Chinese at this time (1876) did not use horses in their laundry business. The courts decided against this ordinance.

Notwithstanding the laws and ordinances against them the Chinese continued to come and they found employment of some kind to keep them from starving. They were industrious and economical; there were no Chinese tramps. Although they filled a want in the state, cheap and reliable labor, at the beginning of its railroad and agricultural development, they were not desirable citizens. Their habits and morals were bad. Their quarters in the cities reeked with filth and immorality. They maintained their Asiatic customs and despised the "white devils" among whom they lived, which, by the way, was not strange considering the mobbing and maltreatment they received from the other aliens. They made merchandise of their women and carried on a revolting system of female slavery.

The Burlingame treaty guaranteed mutual protection to the citizens of China and the United States on each other's soil; to freedom in religious opinions; to the right to reside in either country at will and other privileges accorded to civilized nations. Under this treaty the Chinese could not be kept out of California and agitation was begun for the modification or entire abrogation of the treaty.

For a number of years there had been a steady decline in the price of labor. Various causes had contributed to this. The productiveness of the mines had decreased; railroad communication with the east had brought in a number of workmen and increased competition; the efforts of the labor unions to decrease the hours of labor and still keep up the wages at the old standard had resulted in closing up some of the manufacturing establishments, the proprietors finding it impossible to compete with eastern factories. All these and other causes brought about a depression in business and brought on in 1877-78 a labor agitation that shook the foundations of our social fabric. The hard times and decline in wages was charged against the Chinese. No doubt the presence of the Mongolians in California had considerable to do with it and particularly in the lower grades of employment but the depression was mainly caused from over-production and the financial crisis of 1873, which had affected the whole United States. Another cause local to California was the wild mania for stock gambling that had prevailed in California for a number of years. The bonanza kings of the Washoe by getting up corners in stocks running up fraudulent values and then unloading on outside buyers had impoverished thousands of people of small means and enriched themselves without any return to their dupes.

Hard times always brings to the front a class of noisy demagogues who with no remedy to prescribe increase the discontent by vituperative abuse of everybody outside of their sympathizers. The first of the famous sand lot mass meetings of San Francisco was held July 23, 1877, on a vacant lot on the Market street side of the city hall. Harangues were made and resolutions passed denouncing capitalists, declaring against subsidies to steamship and railroad lines, declaring that the reduction of wages was part of a conspiracy for the destruction of the republic and that the military should not be employed against strikers. An anti-coolie club was formed and on that and the two succeeding evenings a number of Chinese laundries were destroyed. In a fight between the police (aided by the committee of safety) and the rioters several of the latter were killed. Threats were made to destroy the railroad property and burn the vessels of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company unless the Chinese in their employ were immediately discharged.

Among the agitators that this ebullition of discontent threw to the front was an Irish drayman named Dennis Kearney. He was shrewd enough to see that some notoriety and political capital could be made by the organization of a Workingmen's party.

On the 5th of October a permanent organization of the Workingmen's party of California was effected. Dennis Kearney was chosen president, J. G. Day, vice-president, and H. L. Knight, secretary. The principles of the party were the condensed essence of selfishness. The working classes were to be elevated at the expense of every other. "We propose to elect none but competent workmen and their friends to any office whatever." "The rich have ruled us till they have ruined us." "The republic must and shall be preserved, and only workmen will do it." "This party will exhaust all peaceable means of attaining its ends, but it will not be denied justice when it has the power to enforce it." "It will encourage no riot or outrage, but it will not volunteer to repress or put down or arrest, or prosecute the hungry and impatient who manifest their hatred of the Chinamen by a crusade against John or those who employ him." These and others as irrelevant and immaterial were the principles of the Workingmen's party that was to bring the millennium. The movement spread rapidly, clubs were formed in every ward in San Francisco and there were organizations in all the cities of the state. The original leaders were all of foreign birth, but when the movement became popular native born demagogues, perceiving in it an opportunity to obtain office, abandoned the old parties and joined the new.

Kearney now devoted his whole time to agitation, and the applause he received from his followers pampered his inordinate conceit. His language was highly incendiary. He advised every workman to own a musket and one hundred rounds of ammunition and urged the formation of military companies. He posed as a reformer and even hoped for martyrdom. In one of his harangues he said: "If I don't get killed I will do more than any reformer in the history of the world. I hope I will be assassinated, for the success of the movement depends on that." The incendiary rant of Kearney and his fellows became alarming. It was a tame meeting, at which no "thieving millionaire, scoundrelly official or extortionate railroad magnate" escaped lynching by the tongues of laborite reformers. The charitable people of the city had raised by subscription $20,000 to alleviate the prevailing distress among the poor. It was not comforting to a rich man to hear himself doomed to "hemp! hemp! hemp!" simply because by industry, economy and enterprise he had made a fortune. It became evident that if Kearney and his associates were allowed to talk of hanging men and burning the city some of their dupes would put in practice the teachings of their leaders. The supervisors, urged on by the better class of citizens, passed an ordinance called by the sand-lotters "Gibbs' gag law." On the 29th of October, Kearney and his fellow agitators, with a mob of two or three thousand followers, held a meeting on Nob Hill, where Stanford, Crocker, Hopkins and other railroad magnates had built palatial residences. He roundly denounced as thieves the nabobs of Nob Hill and declared that they would soon feel the power of the workingmen. When his party was thoroughly organized they would march through the city and compel the thieves to give up their plunder; that he would lead them to the city hall, clear out the police, hang the prosecuting attorney, burn every book that had a particle of law in it, and then enact new laws for the workingmen. These and other utterances equally inflammatory caused his arrest while addressing a meeting on the borders of the Barbary coast. Trouble was expected, but he quietly submitted and was taken to jail and a few days later Day, Knight, C. C. O'Donnell and Charles E. Pickett were arrested on charges of inciting riot and taken to jail. A few days in jail cooled them off and they began to "squeal." They addressed a letter to the mayor, saying their utterances had been incorrectly reported by the press and that if released they were willing to submit to any wise measure to allay the excitement. They were turned loose after two weeks' imprisonment and their release was celebrated on Thanksgiving Day, November 29, by a grand demonstration of sand lotters—seven thousand of whom paraded the streets.

It was not long before Kearney and his fellows were back on the sand lots hurling out threats of lynching, burning and blowing up. On January 5 the grand jury presented indictments against Kearney, Wellock, Knight, O'Donnell and Pickett. They were all released on the rulings of the judge of the criminal court on the grounds that no actual riot had taken place.

The first victory of the so-called Workingmen's party was the election of a state senator in Alameda county to fill a vacancy caused by the death of Senator Porter. An individual by the name of John W. Bones was elected. On account of his being long and lean he was known as Barebones and sometimes Praise God Barebones. His only services in the senate were the perpetration of some doggerel verses and a speech or two on Kearney's theme, "The Chinese Must Go." At the election held June 19, 1878, to choose delegates to a constitutional convention of the one hundred and fifty-two delegates the Workingmen elected fifty-seven, thirty-one of whom were from San Francisco. The convention met at Sacramento, September 28, 1878, and continued to sit in all one hundred and fifty-seven days. It was a mixed assemblage. There were some of the ablest men in the state in it, and there were some of the most narrow minded and intolerant bigots there. The Workingmen flocked by themselves, while the non-partisans, the Republicans and Democrats, for the most part, acted in unison. Opposition to the Chinese, which was a fundamental principle of the Workingmen's creed, was not confined to them alone; some of the non-partisans were as bitter in their hatred of the Mongolians as the Kearneyites. Some of the crudities proposed for insertion in the new constitution were laughable for their absurdity. One sand lotter proposed to amend the bill of rights, that all men are by nature free and independent, to read, "All men who are capable of becoming citizens of the United States are by nature free and independent." One non-partisan wanted to incorporate into the fundamental law of the state Kearney's slogan, "The Chinese Must Go."

After months of discussion the convention evolved a constitution that the ablest men in that body repudiated, some of them going so far as to take the stump against it. But at the election it carried by a large majority. Kearney continued his sand lot harangues. In the summer of 1879 he made a trip through the southern counties of the state, delivering his diatribes against the railroad magnates, the land monopolists and the Chinese. At the town of Santa Ana, now the county seat of Orange county, in his harangue he made a vituperative attack upon the McFadden Brothers, who a year or two before had built a steamer and run it in opposition to the regular coast line steamers until forced to sell it on account of losses incurred by the competition. Kearney made a number of false and libelous statements in regard to the transaction. While he was waiting for the stage to San Diego in front of the hotel he was confronted by Rule, an employee of the McFadden's, with an imperious demand for the name of Kearney's informant. Kearney turned white with fear and blubbered out something about not giving away his friends. Rule struck him a blow that sent him reeling against the building. Gathering himself together he made a rush into the hotel, drawing a pistol as he ran. Rule pursued him through the dining room and out across a vacant lot and into a drug store, where he downed him and, holding him down with his knee on his breast, demanded the name of his informer. One of the slandered men pulled Rule off the "martyr" and Kearney, with a face resembling a beefsteak, took his departure to San Diego. From that day on he ceased his vituperative attacks on individuals. He had met the only argument that could convince him of the error of his ways. He lost caste with his fellows. This braggadocio, who had boasted of leading armies to conquer the enemies of the Workingmen, with a pistol in his hand had ignominiously fled from an unarmed man and had taken a humiliating punishment without a show of resistance. His following began to desert him and Kearney went if the Chinese did not. The Workingmen's party put up a state ticket in 1879, but it was beaten at the polls and went to pieces. In 1880 James Angell of Michigan, John F. Swift of California, and William H. Trescott of South Carolina were appointed commissioners to proceed to China for the purpose of forming new treaties. An agreement was reached with the Chinese authorities by which laborers could be debarred for a certain period from entering the United States. Those in the country were all allowed the rights that aliens of other countries had. The senate ratified the treaty May 5th, 1881.

CHAPTER XXXV.

EDUCATION AND EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS.

THE Franciscans, unlike the Jesuits, were not the patrons of education. They bent all their energies towards proselyting. Their object was to fit their converts for the next world. An ignorant soul might be as happy in paradise as the most learned. Why educate the neophyte? He was converted, baptized and when granted absolution had his passport to heaven. There were no public schools at the missions. A few of the brightest of the neophytes, who were trained to sing in the church choirs, were taught to read, but the great mass of them, even those of the third generation, born and reared at the missions, were as ignorant of book learning as were their great-grandfathers, who ran naked among the oak trees of the mesas and fed on acorns.

Nor was there much attention paid to education among the gente de razon of the presidios and pueblos. But few of the common people could read and write. Their ancestors had made their way in the world without book learning. Why should the child know more than the parent? And trained to have great filial regard for his parent, it was not often that the progeny aspired to rise higher in the scale of intelligence than his progenitor. Of the eleven heads of families who founded Los Angeles, not one could sign his name to the title deed of his house lot. Nor were these an exceptionally ignorant collection of hombres. Out of fifty men comprising the Monterey company in 1785, but fourteen could write. In the company stationed at San Francisco in 1794 not a soldier among them could read or write; and forty years later of one hundred men at Sonoma not one could write his name.

The first community want the American pioneers supplied was the school house. Whenever the immigrants from the New England and the middle states planted a settlement, there, at the same time, they planted a school house. The first community want that the Spanish pabladores (colonists) supplied was a church. The school house was not wanted or if wanted it was a long felt want that was rarely or never satisfied. At the time of the acquisition of California by the Americans, seventy-seven years from the date of its first settlement, there was not a public school house owned by any presidio, pueblo or city in all its territory.

The first public school in California was opened in San José in December, 1794, seventeen years after the founding of that pueblo. The pioneer teacher of California was Manuel de Vargas, a retired sergeant of infantry. The school was opened in the public granary. Vargas, in 1795, was offered $250 to open a school in San Diego. As this was higher wages than he was receiving he accepted the offer. José Manuel Toca, a gamute or ship boy, arrived on a Spanish transport in 1795 and the same year was employed at Santa Barbara as schoolmaster at a yearly salary of $125. Thus the army and the navy pioneered education in California.

Governor Borica, the founder of public schools in California, resigned in 1800 and was succeeded by Arrillaga. Governor Arrillaga, if not opposed to, was at least indifferent to the education of the common people. He took life easy and the schools took long vacations; indeed, it was nearly all vacation during his term. Governor Sola, the successor of Arrillaga, made an effort to establish public schools, but the indifference of the people discouraged him. In the lower pueblo, Los Angeles, the first school was opened in 1817, thirty-six years after the founding of the town. The first teacher there was Maximo Piña, an invalid soldier. He received $140 a year for his services as schoolmaster. If the records are correct, his was the only school taught in Los Angeles during the Spanish régime. One year of schooling to forty years of vacation, there was no educational cramming in those days. The schoolmasters of the Spanish era were invalid soldiers, possessed of that dangerous thing, a "little learning;" and it was very little indeed. About all they could teach was reading, writing and the doctrina Christiana. They were brutal tyrants and their school government a military despotism. They did not spare the rod or the child, either. The rod was too mild an instrument of punishment. Their implement of torture was a cat-o'-ninetails, made of hempen cords with iron points. To fail in learning the doctrina Christiana was an unpardonable sin. For this, for laughing aloud, playing truant or other offenses no more heinous, the guilty boy "was stretched face downward upon a bench with a handkerchief thrust into his mouth as a gag and lashed with a dozen or more blows until the blood ran down his little lacerated back." If he could not imbibe the Christian doctrine in any other way, it was injected into him with the points of the lash.

Mexico did better for education in California than Spain. The school terms were lengthened and the vacation shortened proportionally. Governor Echeandia, a man hated by the friars, was an enthusiastic friend of education. "He believed in the gratuitous and compulsory education of rich and poor, Indians and gente de rason alike." He held that learning was the corner-stone of a people's wealth and it was the duty of the government to foster education. When the friars heard of his views "they called upon God to pardon the unfortunate ruler unable to comprehend how vastly superior a religious education was to one merely secular.* Echeandia made a brave attempt to establish a public school system in the territory. He demanded of the friars that they establish a school at each mission for the neophytes; they promised, but, with the intention of evading, a show was made of opening schools. Soon it was reported that the funds were exhausted and the schools had to close for want of means to support them. Nor was Echeandia more successful with the people. He issued an order to the commanding officers at the presidios to compel parents to send their children to school. The school at Monterey was opened, the alcalde acting as schoolmaster. The school furniture consisted of one table and the school books were one arithmetic and four primers. The school funds were as meager as the school furniture. Echeandia, unable to contend against the enmity of the friars, the indifference of the parents and the lack of funds, reluctantly abandoned his futile fight against ignorance.

One of the most active and earnest friends of the public schools during the Mexican era was the much abused Governor Micheltorena. He made an earnest effort to establish a public school system in California. Through his efforts schools were established in all the principal towns and a guarantee of $500 from the territorial funds promised to each school. Michelorena promulgated what might be called the first school law of California. It was a decree issued May 1, 1844, and consisted of ten articles, which prescribed what should be taught in the schools, school hours, school age of the pupils and other regulations. Article 10 named the most holy virgin of Guadalupe as patroness of the schools. Her image was to be placed in each school. But, like all his predecessors, Michelorena failed: the funds were soon exhausted and the schools closed.

Even had the people been able to read there would have been nothing for them to read but religious books. The friars kept vigilant watch that no interdicted books were brought into the country. If any were found they were seized and publicly burned. Castro, Alvarado and Vallejo were at one time excommunicated for reading Rousseau's works, Telemachus and other books on the prohibited list. Alvarado having declined to pay Father Duran some money he owed him because it was a sin to have anything to do with an excommunicated person, and therefore it would be a sin for the father to take money from him, the padre annulled the sentence, received the money and gave Alvarado permission to read anything he wished.

During the war for the conquest of California and for some time afterwards the schools were all closed. The wild rush to the gold mines in 1848 carried away the male population. No one would stay at home and teach school for the paltry pay given a schoolmaster. The ayuntamiento of Los Angeles in the winter of 1849-50 appointed a committee to establish a school. After a three months' hunt the committee reported "that an individual had just presented himself who, although he did not speak English, yet could he teach the children many useful things; and besides the same person had managed to get the refusal of Mrs. Pollerena's house for school purpose." At the next meeting of the ayuntamiento the committee reported that the individual who had offered to teach had left for the mines and neither a school house nor a schoolmaster could be found.

In June, 1850, the ayuntamiento entered into a contract with Francisco Bustamente, an ex-soldier, "to teach to the children first, second and third lessons and likewise to read script, to write and count and so much as I may be competent to teach them orthography and good morals." Bustamente was to receive $60 per month and $20 for house rent. This was the first school opened in Los Angeles after the conquest.

"The first American school in San Francisco and, we believe, in California, was a merely private enterprise. It was opened by a Mr. Mars-ton from one of the Atlantic states in April, 1847, in a small shanty which stood on the block between Broadway and Pacific streets, west of Dupont street. There he collected some twenty or thirty pupils, whom he continued to teach for almost a whole year, his patrons paying for tuition."*

In the fall of 1847 a school house was built on the southwest corner of Portsmouth square, fronting on Clay street. The money to build it was raised by subscription. It was a very modest structure—box shaped with a door and two windows in the front and two windows in each end. It served a variety of purposes besides that of a school house. It was a public hall for all kinds of meetings. Churches held service in it. The first public amusements were given in it. At one time it was used for a court room. The first meeting to form a state government was held in it. It was finally degraded to a police office and a station house. For some time after it was built no school was kept in it for want of funds.

On the 21st of February, 1848, a town meeting was called for the election of a board of school trustees and Dr. F. Fourguard, Dr. J. Townsend, C. L. Ross, J. Serrini and William H. Davis were chosen. On the 3d of April following these trustees opened a school in the school house under the charge of Thomas Douglas, A. M., a graduate of Yale College and an experienced teacher of high reputation. The board pledged him a salary of $1,000 per annum and fixed a tariff of tuition to aid towards its payment; and the town council, afterwards, to make up any deficiency, appropriated to the payment of the teacher of the public school in this place $200 at the expiration of twelve months from the commencement of the school. "Soon after this Mr. Marston discontinued his private school and Mr. Douglas collected some forty pupils."*

The school flourished for eight or ten weeks. Gold had been discovered and rumors were coming thick and fast of fortunes made in a day. A thousand dollars a year looked large to Mr. Douglas when the contract was made, but in the light of recent events it looked rather small. A man in the diggings might dig out $1,000 in a week. So the schoolmaster laid down the pedagogical birch, shouldered his pick and hid himself away to the diggings. In the rush for gold, education was forgotten. December 12, 1848, Charles W. H. Christian reopened the school, charging tuition at the rate of $10. Evidently he did not teach longer than it took him to earn money to reach the mines. April 23, 1849, the Rev. Albert Williams, pastor of the First Presbyterian church, obtained the use of the school house and opened a private school, charging tuition. He gave up school teaching to attend to his ministerial duties. In the fall of '49 John C. Pelton, a Massachusetts schoolmaster, arrived in San Francisco and December 26 opened a school with three pupils in the Baptist church on Washington street. He fitted up the church with writing tables and benches at his own expense, depending on voluntary contributions for his support. In the spring of 1850 he applied to the city council for relief and for his services and that of his wife he received $500 a month till the summer of 1851, when he closed his school.

Col. T. J. Nevins, in June, 1850, obtained rent free the use of a building near the present intersection of Mission and Second streets for school purposes. He employed a Mr. Samuel Newton as teacher. The school was opened July 13. The school passed under the supervision of several teachers. The attendance was small at first and the school was supported by contributions, but later the council voted an appropriation. The school was closed in 1851. Colonel Nevins, in January, 1851, secured a fifty-vara lot at Spring Valley on the Presidio road and built principally by subscription a large school building, employed a teacher and opened a free school, supported by contributions. The building was afterwards leased to the city to be used for a free school, the term of the lease running ninety-nine years. This was the first school building in which the city had an ownership. Colonel Nevins prepared an ordinance for the establishment, regulation and support of free common schools in the city. The ordinance was adopted by the city council September 25, 1851, and was the first ordinance establishing free schools and providing for their maintenance in San Francisco.

A bill to provide for a public school system was introduced in the legislature of 1850, but the committee on education reported that it would be two or three years before any means would become available from the liberal provisions of the constitution; in the meantime the persons who had children to educate could do it out of their own pockets. So all action was postponed and the people who had children paid for their tuition or let them run without schooling.

The first school law was passed in 1851. It was drafted mainly by G. B. Lingley, John C. Pelton and the superintendent of public instruction, J. G. Marvin. It was revised and amended by the legislatures of 1852 and 1853. The state school fund then was derived from the sale and rental of five hundred thousand acres of state land; the estates of deceased persons escheated to the state; state poll tax and a state tax of five cents on each $100 of assessed property. Congress in 1853 granted to California the 16th and 36th sections of the public lands for school purposes. The total amount of this grant was six million seven hundred and sixty-five thousand five hundred and four acres, of which forty-six thousand and eighty acres were to be deducted for the founding of a state university or college and six thousand four hundred acres for public buildings.

The first apportionment of state funds was made in 1854. The amount of state funds for that year was $52,961. The county and municipal school taxes amounted to $157,702. These amounts were supplemented by rate bills to the amount of $42,557. In 1856 the state fund had increased to $69,961, while rate bills had decreased to $28,619. That year there were thirty thousand and thirty-nine children of school age in the state, of these only about fifteen thousand were enrolled in the schools.

In the earlier years, following the American conquest, the schools were confined almost entirely to the cities. The population in the country districts was too sparse to maintain a school. The first school house in Sacramento was built in 1849. It was located on I street. C. H. T. Palmer opened school in it in August. It was supported by rate bills and donations. He gathered together about a dozen pupils. The school was soon discontinued. Several other parties in succession tried school keeping in Sacramento, but did not make a success of it. It was not until 1851 that a permanent school was established. A public school was taught in Monterey in 1849 by Rev. Willey. The school was kept in Colton Hall. The first public school house in Los Angeles was built in 1854. Hugh Overns taught the first free school there in 1850.

The amount paid for teachers' salaries in 1854 was $85,860; in 1900 it reached $4,850,804. The total expenditures for school purposes in 1854 amounted to $275,606; in 1900 to $6,195,438. The first high school in the state was established in San Francisco in 1856. In 1900 there were one hundred and twenty high schools with an attendance of twelve thousand one hundred and seventy-nine students. Two million dollars were invested in high school buildings, furniture and grounds. Five hundred teachers were employed in these schools.

THE UNIVERSITY OF THE PACIFIC.

This institution was chartered in August, 1851, as the California Wesleyan College, which name was afterwards changed by act of the legislature to that it now bears. The charter was obtained under the general law of the state as it then was, and on the basis of a subscription of $27,500 and a donation of some ten acres of land adjacent to the village of Santa Clara. A school building was erected in which the preparatory department was opened in May, 1852, under the charge of Rev. E. Banister as principal, aided by two assistant teachers, and before the end of the first session had over sixty pupils. Near the close of the following year another edifice was so far completed that the male pupils were transferred to it, and the Female Collegiate Institute, with its special course of study, was organized and continued in the original building. In 1854 the classes of the college proper were formed and the requisite arrangement with respect to president, faculty, and course of study made. In 1858 two young men, constituting the first class, received the degree of A. B., they being the first to receive that honor from any college in California. In 1865 the board of trustees purchased the Stockton rancho, a large body of land adjoining the town of Santa Clara. This was subdivided into lots and small tracts and sold at a profit. By this means an endowment was secured and an excellent site for new college building obtained.

THE COLLEGE OF CALIFORNIA.

The question of founding a college or university in California had been discussed early in 1849, before the assembling of the constitutional convention at San José. The originator of the idea was the Rev. Samuel H. Willey, D. D., of the Presbyterian church. At that time he was stationed at Monterey. The first legislature passed a bill providing for the granting of college charters. The bill required that application should be made to the supreme court, which was to determine whether the property possessed by the proposed college was worth $20,000, and whether in other respects a charter should be granted. A body of land for a college site had been offered by James Stokes and Kimball H. Dimmick to be selected from a large tract they owned on the Guadalupe river, near San José. When application was made for a college charter the supreme court refused to give a charter to the applicants on the plea that the land was unsurveyed and the title not fully determined.

The Rev. Henry Durant, who had at one time been a tutor in Yale College, came to California in 1853 to engage in teaching. At a meeting of the presbytery of San Francisco and the Congregational Association of California held in Nevada City in May, 1853, which Mr. Durant attended, it was decided to establish an academy at Oakland. There were but few houses in Oakland then and the only communication with San Francisco was by means of a little steamer that crossed the bay two or three times a day. A house was obtained at the corner of Broadway and Fifth street and the academy opened with three pupils. A site was selected for the school, which, when the streets were opened, proved to be four blocks, located between Twelfth and Fourteenth, Franklin and Harrison streets. The site of Oakland at that time was covered with live oaks and the sand was knee deep. Added to other discouragements, titles were in dispute and squatters were seizing upon the vacant lots. A building was begun for the school, the money ran out and the property was in danger of seizure on a mechanics' lien, but was rescued by the bravery and resourcefulness of Dr. Durant.

In 1855 the College of California was chartered and a search begun for a permanent site. A number were offered at various places in the state. The trustees finally selected the Berkeley site, a tract of one hundred and sixty acres on Strawberry creek near Oakland, opposite the Golden Gate. The college school in Oakland was flourishing. A new building, Academy Hall, was erected in 1858. A college faculty was organized. The Rev. Henry Durant and the Rev. Martin Kellogg were chosen professors and the first college class was organized in June, 1860. The college classes were taught in the buildings of the college school, which were usually called the College of California. The college classes were small and the endowment smaller. The faculty met with many discouragements. It became evident that the institution could never become a prominent one in the educational field with the limited means of support it could command. In 1863 the idea of a state university began to be agitated. A bill was passed by the state legislature in 1866, devoting to the support of a narrow polytechnical school, the federal land grants to California for the support of agricultural schools and a college of mechanics. The trustees of the College of California proposed in 1867 to transfer to the state the college site at Berkeley, opposite the Golden Gate, together with all the other assets remaining after the debts were paid, on condition that the state would build a University of California on the site at Berkeley, which should be a classical and technological college.

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA.

A bill for the establishing of a state university was introduced in the legislature March 5, 1868, by Hon. John W. Dwinelle of Alameda county. After some amendments it was finally passed, March 21, and on the 27th of the same month a bill was passed making an appropriation for the support of the institution.

The board of regents of the university was organized June 9, 1868, and the same day Gen. George B. McClellan was elected president of the university, but at that time being engaged in building Stevens Battery at New York he declined the honor. September 23, 1869, the scholastic exercises of the university were begun in the buildings of the College of California in Oakland and the first university class was graduated in June, 1873. The new buildings of the university at Berkeley were occupied in September, 1873. Prof. John Le Conte was acting president for the first year. Dr. Henry Durant was chosen to fill that position and was succeeded by D. C. Gilman in 1872. The cornerstone of the Agricultural College, called the South Hall, was laid in August, 1872, and that of the North Hall in the spring of 1873.

The university, as now constituted, consists of Colleges of Letters, Social Science, Agriculture, Mechanics, Mining, Civil Engineering, Chemistry and Commerce, located at Berkeley; the Lick Astronomical Department at Mount Hamilton; and the professional and affiliated colleges in San Francisco, namely, the Hastings College of Law, the Medical Department, the Post-Graduate Medical Department, the College of Dentistry and Pharmacy, the Veterinary Department and the Mark Hopkins Institute of Art. The total value of the property belonging to the university at this time is about $5,000,000 and the endowment funds nearly $3,000,000. The total income in 1900 was $475,254.

LELAND STANFORD JUNIOR UNIVERSITY.

"When the intention of Senator Stanford to found a university in memory of his lamented son was first announced, it was expected from the broad and comprehensive views which he was known to entertain upon the subject, that his plans, when formed, would result in no ordinary college endowment or educational scheme, but when these plans were laid before the people their magnitude was so far beyond the most extravagant of public anticipation that all were astonished at the magnificence of their aggregate, the wide scope of their detail and the absolute grandeur of their munificence. The brief history of California as an American state comprises much that is noble and great, but nothing in that history will compare in grandeur with this act of one of her leading citizens. The records of history may be searched in vain for a parallel to this gift of Senator Stanford to the state of his adoption. * * * By this act Senator Stanford will not only immortalize the memory of his son, but will erect for himself a monument more enduring than brass or marble, for it will be enshrined in the hearts of succeeding generations for all time to come."*

Senator Stanford, to protect the endowments he proposed to make, prepared a bill, which was passed by the legislature, approved by the governor and became a law March 9, 1885. It is entitled "An act to advance learning, the arts and sciences and to promote the public welfare, by providing for the conveyance, holding and protection of property, and the creation of trusts for the founding, endowment, erection and maintenance within this state of universities, colleges, schools, seminaries of learning, mechanical institutes, museums and galleries of art."

Section 2 specifies how a grant for the above purposes may be made: "Any person desiring in his lifetime to promote the public welfare by founding, endowing and having maintained within this state a university, college, school, seminary of learning, mechanical institute, museum or gallery of art or any or all thereof, may, to that end, and for such purpose, by grant in writing, convey to a trustee, or any number of trustees named in such grant (and their successors), any property, real or personal, belonging to such person, and situated or being within this state; provided, that if any such person be married and the property be community property, then both husband and wife must join in such grant." The act contains twelve sections. After the passage of the act twenty-four trustees were appointed. Among them were judges of the supreme and superior courts, a United States senator and business men in various lines.

Among the lands deeded to the university by Senator Stanford and his wife were the Palo Alto estate, containing seventy-two hundred acres. This ranch had been devoted principally to the breeding and rearing of thoroughbred horses. On this the college buildings were to be erected. The site selected was near the town of Palo Alto, which is thirty-four miles south from San Francisco on the railroad to San José, in Santa Clara county.

Another property donated was the Vina rancho, situated at the junction of Deer creek with the Sacramento river in Tehama county. It consisted of fifty-five thousand acres, of which thirty-six thousand were planted to vines and orchard and the remainder used for grain growing and pasture.

The third rancho given to the support of the university was the Gridley ranch, containing about twenty-one thousand acres. This was situated in Butte county and included within its limits some of the richest wheat growing lands in the state. At the time it was donated its assessed value was $1,000,000. The total amount of land conveyed to the university by deed of trust was eighty-three thousand two hundred acres.

The name selected for the institution was Leland Stanford Junior University. The cornerstone of the university was laid May 14, 1887, by Senator and Mrs. Leland Stanford. The site of the college buildings is about one mile west from Palo Alto. In his address to the trustees

* Monograph of Leland Stanford Junior University.

November 14, 1885, Senator Stanford said: "We do not expect to establish a university and fill it with students at once. It must be the growth of time and experience. Our idea is that in the first instance we shall require the establishment of colleges for both sexes; then of primary schools, as they may be needed; and out of all these will grow the great central institution for more advanced study." The growth of the university has been rapid. In a very few years after its founding it took rank with the best institutions of learning in the United States.

NORMAL SCHOOLS.

The legislature of 1862 passed a bill authorizing the establishment of a state normal school for the training of teachers at San Francisco or at such other place as the legislature may hereafter direct. The school was established and conducted for several years at San Francisco, but was eventually moved to San José, where a site had been donated. A building was erected and the school became a flourishing institution. The first building was destroyed by fire and the present handsome and commodious building erected on a new site. The first normal school established in the state was a private one, conducted by George W. Minns. It was started in San Francisco in 1857, but was discontinued after the organization of the state school in 1863, Minns becoming principal. A normal school was established by the legislature at Los Angeles in 1881. It was at first a branch of the state school at San José and was under control of the same board of trustees and the same principal. Later it was made an independent institution with a board and principal of its own.

Normal schools have been established at Chico (1889), San Diego (1897) and San Francisco (1899). The total number of teachers employed in the five state normal schools in 1900 was one hundred and one, of whom thirty-seven were men and sixty-four women. The whole number of students in these at that time was two thousand and thirty-nine, of whom two hundred and fifty-six were men and one thousand eight hundred and thirty-nine women.

The total receipts for the support of these schools from all sources were for the year ending June 30, 1900, $251,217; the total expenditures for the same time were $206,001; the value of the normal school property of the state is about $700,000. The educational system and facilities of California, university, college, normal school and public school, rank with the best in the United States.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

CITIES OF CALIFORNIA—THEIR ORIGIN AND GROWTH.

ALTHOUGH Spain and Mexico possessed California for seventy-seven years after the date of the first settlement made in it, they founded but few towns and but one of those founded had attained the dignity of a city at the time of the American conquest. In a previous chapter I have given sketches of the founding of the four presidios and three pueblos under Spanish rule. Twenty missions were established under the rule of Spain and one under the Mexican Republic. While the country increased in population under the rule of Mexico, the only new settlement that was formed was the mission at Solano.

Pueblos grew up at the presidios and some of the mission settlements developed into towns. The principal towns that have grown up around the mission sites are San Juan Capistrano, San Gabriel, San Buenaventura, San Miguel, San Luis Obispo, Santa Clara and San Rafael.

The creation of towns began after the Americans got possession of the country. Before the treaty of peace between the United States and Mexico had been made, and while the war was in progress, two enterprising Americans, Robert Semple and T. O. Larkin, had created on paper an extensive city on the Straits of Carquinez. The city of Francisca "comprises five miles," so the proprietors of the embryo metropolis announced in the Californian of April 20, 1847, and in subsequent numbers. According to the theory of its promoters, Francisca had the choice of sites and must become the metropolis of the coast. "In front of the city," says their advertisement, "is a commodious Bay, large enough for two hundred ships to ride at anchor safe from any wind. The country around the city is the best agricultural portion of California on both sides of the Bay; the straits being only one mile wide, an easy crossing may always be made. The entire trade of the great Sacramento and San Joaquin Valleys (a fertile country of great width and nearly seven hundred miles long from North to South) must of necessity pass through the narrow channel of Carquinez and the Bay, and the country is so situated that every person who passes from one side of the Bay to the other will find the nearest and best way by Francisca."

In addition to its natural advantages the proprietors offered other attractions and inducements to settlers. They advertised that they would give "seventy-five per cent of the net proceeds of the ferries and wharves for a school fund and the embellishment of the city"; "they have also laid out several entire squares for school purposes and several others for public walks" (parks). Yet, notwithstanding all the superior attractions and natural advantages of Francisca, people would migrate to and locate at the wind-swept settlement on the Cove of Yerba Buena. And the town of the "good herb" took to itself the name of San Francisco and perforce compelled the Franciscans to become Benicians. Then came the discovery of gold and the consequent rush to the mines, and although Francisca, or Benicia, was on the route, or one of the routes, somehow San Francisco managed to get all the profit out of the trade and travel to the mines.

The rush to the land of gold expanded the little settlement formed by Richardson and Leese on the Cove of Yerba Buena into a great city that in time included within its limits the mission and the presidio. The consolidation of the city and county governments gave a simpler form of municipal rule and gave the city room to expand without growing outside of its municipal jurisdiction. The decennial Federal census from 1850 to the close of the century indicates the remarkable growth of San Francisco. Its population in 1850 was 21,000; in 1860, 56,802; in 1870, 149,473; in 1880, 234,000; in 1890, 298,997; in 1900, 342,742.

LOS ANGELES.

The only settlement under Mexican domination that attained the dignity of a ciudad, or city, was Los Angeles. Although proclaimed a city by the Mexican Congress, more than ten years before the Americans took possession of the country, except in official documents, it was usually spoken of as el pueblo—the town. Its population at the time of its conquest by the Americans numbered about sixteen hundred. The first legislature gave it a city charter, although fifteen years before it had been raised to the dignity of a city; the lawmakers for some reason cut down its area from four square leagues to four square miles. This did not affect its right to its pueblo lands. After the appointment of a land commission, in 1851, it laid claim to sixteen square leagues, but failed to substantiate its claim. Its pueblo area of four square leagues (Spanish) was confirmed to it by the commission. Within the past seven years, by annexation, its area has been increased from the original four square leagues, or about twenty-seven miles, to thirty-seven square miles. Its increase in population during the past twenty years has been the greatest of any of the large cities of the state. In 1880 it had 111,183 inhabitants; in 1890, 50,353; in 1900, 102,429. Its growth since 1900 has exceeded that of any similar period in its history. Its estimated population January, 1903, is 125,000.

OAKLAND.

Oakland, the third city in population among the cities of California, is the youngest of the large cities. It is purely American by birth. Its site during Spanish and Mexican rule was uninhabited and was covered with oak trees and chaparral. The territory which Oakland covers was part of a five-league grant made to Luis Maria Peralta, a Spanish soldier, who came to the presidio of San Francisco in 1790. August 16, 1820, Governor Sola granted him the Rancho San Antonio. His military service had extended over a period of forty years. In 1842 he divided the grant among his five sons, the portion embraced in Oakland falling to the allotment of Vicente.

The first permanent settlers and the fathers of Oakland were Moore, Carpentier and Adams, who squatted on the land in the summer of 1850. The Peraltas made an attempt to evict them, but failed. This trio of squatters obtained a lease from Peralta, laid out a town and sold lots, giving quit-claim deeds. They erected houses and are considered the founders of the town. Other squatters followed their example and possessed themselves of the Peraltas' land. This involved the settlers in litigation, and it was many years before titles were perfected. The Peralta litigants finally won.

May 4, 1852, the town of Oakland was incorporated. March 25, 1854, it was incorporated as a city and Horace W. Carpentier was elected the first mayor. The first ferry charter was granted in 1853. Defective titles and the water-front war between the city authorities and H. W. Carpentier retarded its growth for a number of years. In 1860 its population was about 1,500. The completion of the overland railroad, which made Oakland its western terminus, greatly accelerated its growth. The water-front war was continued; instead of Carpentier, the city now had the Central Pacific Railroad Company to contend with. The controversy was finally ended in 1882, and the city won. The population of Oakland in 1890 was 48,682; in 1900, 66,960. According to a recent census (November, 1902), it exceeds 88,000.

SACRAMENTO.

Sutter built his fort near the junction of the Sacramento and American rivers in 1839. It was then the most northerly settlement in California and became the trading post for the northern frontier. It was the outpost to which the tide of overland immigration flowed before and after the discovery of gold. Sutter's settlement was also known as New Helvitia. After the discovery of gold at Coloma it was, during 1848, the principal supply depot for the mines. Sutter had a store at the fort and did a thriving business. Sant Brannan, in June, 1848, established a store outside of the fort, in a long adobe building. His sales amounted to over $100,000 a month. His profits were enormous. Gold dust was a drug on the market and at one time passed for $8 an ounce, less than half its value. In September, 1848, Priest, Lee & Co. established a business house at the fort and did an immense business. The fort was not well located for a commercial center. It was too far away from the river by which all the freight from San Francisco was shipped. The land at the embarcadero was subject to overflow and was deemed unsuited for the site of a city. Sutterville was laid out on rising ground three miles below. A survey of lots was extended from the fort to the embarcadero and along the river bank. This embryo town at the embarcadero took the name of Sacramento from the river. Then began a rivalry between Sutterville and Sacramento. The first house in Sacramento, corner of Front and I streets, was erected in January, 1849. The proprietors of Sutterville, McDougall & Co., made an attempt to attract trade and building to their town by giving away lots, but Sutter beat them at that game, and Sacramento surged ahead. Sam Brannan and Priest, Lee & Co. moved their stores into Sacramento. The fort was deserted and Sutterville ceased to contend for supremacy. In four months lots had advanced from $50 to $1,000 and business lots to $3,000. A regular steamboat service on the river was inaugurated in August, 1849, and sailing vessels that had come around the Horn to avoid trans-shipment worked their way up the river and landed their goods at the embarcadero. The first number of the Placer Times was issued April 28, 1849. The steamboat rates of passage between San Francisco and Sacramento were: Cabin, $30; steerage, $20; freight, $2.50 per one hundred pounds. By the winter of 1849 the population of the town had reached five thousand and a year later it had doubled. Lots in the business section were held at $30,000 to $50,000 each. The great flood of 1849-50, when four-fifths of the city was under water, somewhat dampened the enthusiasm of the citizens, but did not check the growth of the city. Sacramento became the trading center of the mines. In 1855 its trade, principally with the mines, amounted to $6,000,000. It was also the center of the stage lines, a dozen of which led out from it.

It became the state capital in 1853, and although disastrous floods drove the legislators from the capital several times, they returned when the waters subsided. The great flood of 1861-62 inundated the city and compelled an immense outlay for levees and for raising the grades of the streets. Sacramento was made the terminus of the Central Pacific Railroad system, and its immense workshops are located there. Its growth for the past thirty years has been slow but steady. Its population in 1890 was 26,386; in 1900, 29,282.

SAN JOSE.

The early history of San José has been given in the chapter on Pueblos. After the American conquest the place became an important business center. It was the first state capital and the removal of the capital for a time checked its progress. In 1864 it was connected with San Francisco by railroad. The completion of the railroad killed off its former port, Alviso, which had been laid out as a city in 1849. Nearly all the trade and travel before the railroad was built had gone by way of Alviso down the bay to San Francisco. San José and its suburb, Santa Clara, early became the educational centers of California. The first American college founded in the state was located at Santa Clara and the first normal school building erected in the state was built at San José. The population of San José in 1880 was 12,570; in 1900, 21,500.

STOCKTON.

In 1844 the Rancho Campo de los Franceses, Camp of the French, or French Camp, on which the city of Stockton is located, was granted to William Gulnac by Governor Micheltorena. It contained eleven leagues of 48,747 acres of land. Capt. Charles M. Weber, the founder of Stockton, was a partner of Gulnac, but not being a Mexican citizen, he could not obtain a land grant. After Gulnac obtained the grant he conveyed a half interest in it to Weber. Weber shortly afterward purchased his partner's interest and became sole owner of the grant. Some attempts were made to stock it with cattle, but Indian depredations prevented it. In 1847, after the country had come into the possession of the Americans, Weber removed from San José, which had been his place of residence since his arrival in California in 1841, and located on his ranch at French Camp. He erected some huts for his vaqueros and fortified his corral against Indians. In 1848 the site of the city was surveyed and platted under the direction of Captain Weber and Maj. R. P. Hammond. The rancho was surveyed and sectionized and land offered on most advantageous terms to settlers. Captain Weber was puzzled to find a fitting name for his infant metropolis. He hesitated between Tuleburgh and Castoria (Spanish for beaver). Tules were plentiful and so were beaver, but as the town grew both would disappear, so he finally selected Stockton, after Commodore Stockton, who promised to be a godfather to the town, but proved to be a very indifferent stepfather; he never did anything for it. The discovery of gold in the region known as the southern mines brought Stockton into prominence and made it the metropolis of the southern mining district. Captain Weber led the party that first discovered gold on the Mokelumne river. The freight and travel to the mines on the Mokelumne, Tuolumne and Stanislaus rivers passed through Stockton, and its growth was rapid. In October, 1849, the Alta California reports lots in it selling from $2,500 to $6,000 each, according to situation. At that time it had a population of about one thousand souls and a floating population, that is, men coming and going to the mines, of about as many more. The houses were mostly cotton-lined shacks. Lumber was $1 a foot and carpenters' wages $16 per day. There was neither mechanics nor material to build better structures. Every man was his own architect and master builder. Cloth was scarce and high and tacks at one time were worth $5 a package; even a cloth house was no cheap affair, however flimsy and cheap it might appear. On the morning of December 23, 1849, the business portion of the town was swept out of existence by fire. Rebuilding was begun almost before the embers of the departed city were cold and a better city arose from the ashes of the first. After the wild rush of mining days was over, Stockton drifted into a center of agricultural trade and it also became a manufacturing city. Its growth has been steady, devoid of booms or periods of inflation, followed by collapse. Its population in 1890 was 14,424; in 1900, 17,506.

SAN DIEGO.

In former chapters I have described the founding of the presidio and mission of San Diego. A pueblo of twenty-five or thirty houses grew up around the presidio. This is what is known as Old San Diego. In 1850 it was incorporated as a city. March 18, 1850, Alcalde Sutherland granted to William Heath Davis and five associates one hundred and sixty acres of land a few miles south of Old Town, in consideration that they build a wharf and create a "new port." The town of New San Diego was laid out, the wharf was built, several houses erected, and government barracks constructed. A newspaper was established and the Panama steamers anchored at the wharf. San Diego was riding high on the wave of prosperity. But the wave broke and left San Diego stranded on the shore of adversity. In 1868, A. E. Horton came to San Diego. He bought about nine hundred acres of pueblo lands along the bay at twenty-six cents an acre. He subdivided it, gave away lots, built houses and a wharf and soon infused life into the sleepy pueblo. In 1884 the Southern California Railroad was completed into the city. In 1887 San Diego experienced a wonderful real estate boom and its growth for several years was marvelous. Then it came to a standstill, but has again started on the highway to prosperity. Its population in 1890 was 16,159; in 1900, 17,700.

FRESNO CITY.

Fresno City was founded by the Southern Pacific Railroad in May, 1872. The road at that time was in the course of construction. The outlook for a populous town was not brilliant. Stretching for miles away from the town site in different directions was an arid-looking plain.

The land was fertile enough when well watered; but the few settlers had no capital to construct irrigating canals.

In 1875 began the agricultural colony era. The land was divided into twenty-acre tracts. A number of persons combined together and by their united capital and community labor constructed irrigating canals and brought the land under cultivation. The principal product is the raisin grape. Fresno City became the county seat of Fresno county in 1874. It is now the largest and most important city of the Upper San Joaquin Valley. Its population in 1890 was 10,818; in 1900, 12,470.

VALLEJO.

Vallejo was founded for the state capital. It was one of several towns which had that temporary honor in the early '50s, when the state capitol was on wheels, or at least on the move. The original name of the place was Eureka. General Vallejo made a proposition to the legislature of 1850 to grant the state one hundred and fifty-six acres of land and to donate and pay to the state within two years after the acceptance of his proposition $370,000, to be used in the erection of public buildings. The legislature accepted his proposition. The location of the state capital was submitted to a vote of the people at the election on October 7, 1850, and Vallejo received more votes than the aggregated vote of all its competitors. Buildings were begun, but never completed. The legislature met there twice, but on account of insufficient accommodations sought other places where they were better cared for. General Vallejo's proposition at his own request was cancelled. In 1854 Mare Island, in front of Vallejo, was purchased by the general government for a United States navy yard and naval depot. The government works gave employment to large numbers of men and involved the expenditure of millions of dollars. The town began to prosper and still continues to do so. Its population in 1890 was 6,343; in 1900, 7,965.

NEVADA CITY.

No mining town in California was so well and so favorably known in the early '50s as Nevada

City. The first discovery of gold near it was made in September, 1849; and the first store and cabin erected. Rumors of rich strikes spread abroad and in the spring of 1850 the rush of gold-seekers came. In 1851 it was estimated that within a circuit of seven miles there was a population of 30,000. In 1856 the business section was destroyed by fire. It was then the third city in population in the state. It has had its periods of expansion and contraction, but still remains an important mining town. Its population in 1880 was 4,022; in 1890, 2,524; in 1900, 3,250.

GRASS VALLEY.

The first cabin in Grass Valley was erected in 1849. The discoveries of gold quartz raised great expectations. A quartz mill was erected in 1850, but this new form of mining not being understood, quartz mining was not a success; but with improved machinery and better methods, it became the most important form of mining. Grass Valley prospered and surpassed its rival, Nevada City. Its population in 1900 was 4,719.

EUREKA.

In the two hundred years that Spain and Mexico held possession of California its northwest coast remained practically a terra incognita, but it did not remain so long after the discovery of gold. Gold was discovered on the head waters of the Trinity river in 1849 and parties of prospectors during 1849 and 1850 explored the country between the head waters of the Trinity and Klamath rivers and the coast. Rich mines were found and these discoveries led to the founding of a number of towns on the coast which aspired to be the entrepôts for the supplies to the mines. The most successful of these proved to be Eureka, on Humboldt Bay. It was the best located for commerce and soon outstripped its rivals, Arcata and Bucksport. Humboldt county was formed in 1854, and Eureka, in 1856, became the county seat and was incorporated as a city. It is the largest shipping point for lumber on the coast. It is also the commercial center of a rich agricultural and dairying district. Its population in 1880 was 2,639; in 1890, 4,858; in 1900, 7,327.

MARYSVILLE.

The site on which Marysville stands was first known as New Mecklenburg and was a trading post of two houses. In October, 1848, M. C. Nye purchased the rancho and opened a store at New Mecklenburg. The place then became known as Nye's rancho. In 1849 a town was laid out and named Yubaville. The name was changed to Marysville in honor of the wife of the proprietor of the town Covilland. His wife was Mary Murphy, of the Donner party. Marysville, being at the head of the navigation of the north fork of the Sacramento, became the entrepot for mining supplies to the miners in the rich Yuba mines. After the decline of mining it became an agricultural center for the upper portion of the Sacramento. Its population in 1880 was 4,300; in 1890, 3,991; in 1900, 3,397.

REDDING.

The Placer Times of May 8, 1850, contains this notice of Reading, now changed to Redding: "Reading was laid off early in 1850 by P. B. Reading at the headwaters of the Sacramento within forty-five miles of the Trinity diggings. Reading is located in the heart of a most extensive mining district, embracing as it does, Cottonwood, Clear, Salt, Dry, Middle and Olney creeks, it is in close proximity to the Pitt and Trinity rivers. The pet steamer, Jack Hayes, leaves tomorrow morning (May 9, 1850) for Reading. It has been hitherto considered impossible to navigate the Sacramento to this height." The town grew rapidly at first, like all mining towns, and like most of such towns it was swept out of existence by fire. It was devastated by fire in December, 1852, and again in June, 1853. Its original name, Reading, got mixed with Fort Redding and it now appears on all railroad maps and guides as Redding. Its population in 1890 was 1,821; in 1900, 2,940.

PASADENA.

Pasadena is a child of the colony era of the early '70s. Its original name was the Indiana Colony. In 1873 a number of persons formed a company for the purchasing of a large tract of land and subdividing it among them. They incorporated under the title of the San Gabriel Orange Grove Association and purchased four thousand acres in the San Pasqual rancho, situated about nine miles east of Los Angeles city. This was divided on the basis of one share of stock being equivalent to fifteen acres. Each stockholder received in proportion to his investment. The colonists turned their attention to the cultivation of vineyards and orange orchards. In 1875 the name was changed to Pasadena, an Algonquin word meaning Crown of the Valley. The colony had become quite noted for its production of oranges. In 1887 the great real estate boom struck it and the cross roads village suddenly developed into a city. It has become famous as a tourist winter resort. Its population in 1890 was 4,882; in 1900, 9,117.

POMONA.

Pomona was founded by the Los Angeles Immigration and Land Co-Operative Association. This company bought twenty-seven hundred acres of the Rancho San José, lying along the eastern border of Los Angeles county. The town was laid off in the center of the tract. The remainder of the tract was divided into forty-acre lots. The town made a rapid growth at first, but disaster overtook it. First the dry season of 1876-77, and next a fire that swept it almost out of existence. In 1880 its population had dwindled to one hundred and eighty persons. In about 1881 it began to revive and it has made a steady growth ever since. It is the commercial center of a large orange growing district. Its population in 1890 was 3,634; in 1900, 5,526.

SAN BERNARDINO.

San Bernardino was originally a Mormon colony. In 1851 one hundred and fifty families were sent from Salt Lake to found a colony or a stake of Zion. The object of locating a colony at this point was to keep open a line of communication with some seaport. San Bernardino was near the old Spanish trail which led out through the Cajon pass. Goods could be transported to Salt Lake from San Pedro at all seasons of the year, which could not be done to Salt Lake over the central route westward or eastward during the winter. The leaders of the Mormon colony, Lyman and Rich, bought the San Bernardino rancho from the Lugos. A portion of the land was subdivided into small tracts and sold to the settlers. The Mormons devoted themselves to the cultivation of wheat, of which they raised a large crop the first year and received as high as $5 per bushel. The colony prospered for a time, but in 1857 the settlers, or all of them that would obey the call, were called to Salt Lake by Brigham Young to take part in the threatened war with the United States. The faithful sold their lands for whatever they could get and departed. The gentiles bought them and the character of the settlement changed. The city of San Bernardino has an extensive trade with the mining districts to the east of it. Its population in 1890 was 4,012; in 1900, 6,150.

RIVERSIDE.

Riverside had its origin in the colony era. It began its existence as the Southern California Colony Association. In 1870 an association, of which Judge John W. North and Dr. James P. Greves were leaders, purchased four thousand acres of the Roubidoux rancho and adjoining lands, aggregating in all about nine thousand acres. This was subdivided into small tracts and sold to settlers at a low price. A town was laid off and named Jurupa, but this being difficult of pronunciation its name was changed to Riverside, which eventually became the name of the settlement as well. An extensive irrigating system was constructed and the cultivation of citrus fruits became the leading industry. The Bahia or Washington navel orange has made Riverside famous in orange culture. It was propagated by budding from two small trees sent by the Department of Agriculture to a citizen of Riverside. The city of Riverside in area is one of the largest cities of the state. Its boundaries include fifty-six square miles. Its corporate lines take in most of the orange groves of the settlement. By this means municipal regulations against insect pests can be better enforced. The population of Riverside in 1890 was 4,683; in 1900, 7,973.

Wm. Newport

WILLIAM J. NEWPORT.

WILLIAM J. NEWPORT, banker, rancher, stock-breeder and veteran of the Civil war, was born near Lebanon, Warren county, Ohio, February 27, 1846, and died at his home near Hanford, Kings county, Cal., June 6, 1904. He was a descendant of David Newport, a native of Scotland, who immigrated to the United States in young manhood, settling in Pennsylvania, where he resided for many years. He afterward became a pioneer of Ohio, making his home in what is now Warren county, where he became a citizen of prominence and influence. He lived to be eighty-six years of age. His son, James T., who was born in Pennsylvania, served in the war of 1812, and afterward became a captain in the Ohio state militia. He lived to be seventy-six or seventy-seven years of age. His son, Joseph Corwin Newport, father of William J. Newport, was born on the Warren county farm in 1816. He became widely known as a horticulturist, accomplishing much toward the advancement of the science of pomology in Ohio. He married Elizabeth Montgomery, a native of New Jersey or Pennsylvania, and a daughter of William Montgomery, who came from Ireland to the United States as a boy, locating in Pennsylvania. Joseph C. Newport lived to be seventy-five years of age, and he and his wife celebrated their golden wedding in California in 1888. Mrs. Newport, who is now eighty-six years of age, resides in Lebanon, Ohio, and retains her mental faculties to a rare degree.

The boyhood of William J. Newport was passed uneventfully on the farm in Warren county, Ohio, and with the exception of the rumblings of discontent and apprehension between the north and south, little happened to break the monotony of hard work and irregular attendance at the district schools. In 1863, at the age of seventeen years, Mr. Newport enlisted in Company B, Second Ohio Heavy Artillery, under Colonel Gibson, and at once entered into active service for the Union. Under Gen. George H. Thomas he participated in the battle at Franklin, Tenn., Cleveland, Tenn., and Bull's Gap, besides numerous minor engagements. His command was attached to the Army of the Cumberland, and under General Sherman participated in the March to the Sea and in the Grand Review at Washington, D. C., at the close of the war. Fortunately Mr. Newport escaped many of the penalties of warfare, having suffered neither serious illness nor injury. He was honorably discharged from the service at Columbus, Ohio, August 25, 1865. Returning home, he assisted his father in the work upon the farm, but soon found his surroundings irksome in comparison with the sterner realities of life as he had learned to view them.

In 1866 Mr. Newport removed to eastern Kansas, locating near Fort Scott, and during the following winter and spring he attended the Quincy Business College at Quincy, Ill. In the fall of 1868 he went to St. Paul, Minn., and for two or three years worked in the lumber camps in that vicinity. Still remaining dissatisfied with the middle west, he determined to embrace the first favorable opportunity to see the Pacific coast. In pursuance of this plan he came to California in 1873 and soon after his arrival rented a ranch in the Two Rock valley, near Petaluma, Sonoma county. So encouraging were the results of this independent venture, that in 1876 he established a home of his own, marrying Elizabeth M. Railsback, a native of Warren county, Ind., the daughter of William and Mary (Rhode) Railsback, both of whom were of German extraction. Mrs. Newport's mother died when she was nine years old, and her father when she was twenty-three. Six children were born of this union, namely: Ada L., a graduate of the University of California, class of 1902, now a teacher in the Hanford high school; Augusta E., who is engaged in teaching vocal music; Walter Rollin, a merchant of Hanford; Ernest C., who was educated at the Lick Polytechnic School, and apprenticed himself with the Union Iron Works of San Francisco; and Rofa B. and Mildred R., who are at home.

In no way did the progressive and liberal mind of Mr. Newport find a more satisfactory outlet than in the rearing and education of his children, who, upon the foundation of strong inherited tendencies, have worked their way into positions of more than ordinary merit and responsibility. The two eldest were born in Petaluma and the others were born on the farm now occupied by the family, which Mr. Newport purchased in 1878.

When Mr. Newport purchased the property mentioned, he set about at once to develop it, engaging in general farming and stock and fruit raising. In 1880 he and his brother, John B., purchased a threshing machine, which they operated throughout this section of the country for four years. They built and conducted the first cook-house, or boarding car, for employes, thus relieving the farmers and inaugurating in southern California a system which has since been generally adopted.

Subsequently William J. Newport became sole owner of the machine, operating it for the ensuing four years alone. From that time forward he engaged exclusively in the cultivation of fruit and the raising of grain and stock. At the time of his death his ranch consisted of one hundred and twenty acres, forty of which were devoted to fruit. He was a model farmer, painstaking and thrifty, taking vastly more pleasure in his work than most men thus engaged. His undertakings were rewarded by success, and he gladly paid the price of ceaseless vigilance for the good fortune bestowed upon him. He was a great friend and admirer of the horse, and it is no exaggeration to say that he bought, sold and bred more draft horses than any other individual in Kings county, importing the sires, and paying especial attention to animals especially adapted to work in California. Several years ago he abandoned grain-raising for fruit-culture. He has owned and improved a number of orchards and vineyards in Kings county, but a short time prior to his death he disposed of all but his home farm, which is one of the most valuable and highly improved in this section of California.

To so broad-minded a man as Mr. Newport, events occurring outside his own particular domain naturally enlisted his support and co-operation. The development of Kings county was a matter in which he exhibited the keenest pride, and in innumerable ways he assisted in its march of progress. In 1887 he became one of the organizers of the Bank of Hanford, in which he served for several years as a director. He was also one of the founders of the Farmers' and Merchants' Bank of Hanford, organized in 1891, and from July 13, 1897, to July 15, 1902, he served as its president, but declined the honor at the latter date on account of the pressure of personal business matters. At the time of his death he was still a member of its board of directors. His political sympathies were always with the Republican party. Though he was averse to public life, he felt it his duty to serve as supervisor of Tulare county from 1886 to 1890, in response to a strong popular demand; and in 1893, when Kings county was separated from Tulare county, he was appointed a member of the commission on organization by Governor Markham. He was deeply interested in the development of the oil fields of Kern and Fresno counties, and was the owner of valuable properties in both counties. Earlier in life he assisted for some time in the operation of a lumber mill in the Sierra forests, and was identified with the lumber industry of Tulare county. In 1890 the old cabin which had been the home of his family for many years was removed from its site, and in its place a handsome modern residence was erected. The death of Mr. Newport was keenly felt by his comrades in McPherson Post No. 51, G. A. R., whose commander he had been since the last annual meeting of that organization.

In closing this memoir of one of the most influential and highly respected residents of Kings county, it is but proper to record the fact that no citizen of Hanford stood higher in the esteem of thoughtful people than he. Throughout his useful career he gave frequent evidence of the possession of those traits of character upon which rest the wealth and stability of communities. Those who knew him best have paid him the tribute of saying that he exhibited an unselfish public spirit, a generosity of heart and a high-mindedness of motive in all acts, public or private, which entitle him to rank forever among the most thoroughly representative men of Kings county. The record of his upright and highly useful career, perpetuated in the annals of the state of California, should prove a source of inspiration to the younger generations, and of gratification and pride to his descendants.

JAMES B. STEARNS. Oakdale in 1886 bore slight resemblance to the thriving, bustling town which today evidences not only progress, but promise, and which counts among its chief upbuilders men expert in all lines of commercial and industrial enterprise. As in all parts of the west there were openings for ability and far-sightedness, for thoroughness and high citizenship, and the advent of men representing these commendable attributes found appreciation and sure financial reward awaiting them. In January, 1886, James B. Stearns, a rugged Canadian of New England ancestry, joined the forces of industry in Oakdale, and ever since that time his name has been associated with the most earnest and capable efforts along the lines of blacksmithing, carriage and implement construction in Stanislaus county. The senior member at present of the firm of Stearns & Harry, his has the distinction of being not only the largest, but the oldest and most reliable of any similarly engaged concern in this part of the state.

The early life of this honored citizen presents the interesting development of all who have struggled with the absence of money and influence, and who have attained their goal solely through their own efforts. He was trained to the self-sacrifice and early assumption of responsibility common in all large families of moderate means, and as the fourth oldest of twelve children, felt the pressure of an inadequate treasury. Born in Lachute, province of Quebec, November 24, 1856, he is descended on both sides of his family from English ancestry, on the paternal side from a forefather who early settled in Connecticut, and on the maternal side from a pioneer of the province of Quebec. His father and grandfather were both farmers near Lachute, and his mother, formerly Sarah Ann Banning, came from a farm in the vicinity of the quaint old town. His mother and several of the children still live in Ontario, Canada, himself and brother Albert, the latter a carriage manufacturer of Sacramento, being the only ones to come to the coast. Interspersed with his farm work, Mr. Stearns attended the public schools of the northern province, and at the age of sixteen apprenticed for three years to a carriage-maker at Russell, Ontario. After a year at school he worked at his trade in Ontario, Canada, and in 1876 located in Rochelle, Ogle county, Ill., where he found steady employment at carriage-making for four years. He then engaged in blacksmithing and carriage-making at Ashton, Lee county, Ill., and in December, 1884, yielded to a long dormant desire to cast his fortunes with the now famed coast country. Remaining in Davisville, Yolo county, for a number of months, he came to Oakdale in January, 1886, soon after purchasing an interest in a carriage manufactory with a Mr. Wilbert, operating the same under the firm name of Wilbert & Stearns. In 1888 the interest of Mr. Wilbert reverted to M. J. Nightingale, and Nightingale & Stearns continued in partnership until the substitution of J. M. Harray in 1893. Stearns & Harray have acquired a reputation second to none on the coast for thoroughness and practicality, and have enlarged their business until they now occupy a building 100 feet square and two stories high, the machinery of which is operated by electric power. Their carriages, wagons, plows, harrows, and carpentering tools, are unexcelled, and are made of the finest materials procurable in the west. Both men have a thorough understanding of their business, and in addition realize the importance of fairness and honesty in dealing with their many patrons and friends. They represent the conservative, substantial business men of the coast, and their ability to represent the best in their line has long since passed the era of experiment.

Mr. Stearns is a public-spirited and liberal gentleman, taking a keen interest in many avenues of activity which want of time alone prevents his active participation in. The Republican party has profited by his able leadership as a member of the county committee, and he has otherwise invested the undertakings of his party with dignity and practical usefulness. He is an influential factor in the Methodist Church, of which he has been a trustee for many years, and of which he is now chairman of the board.

Through his marriage in Lee county, Ill., with Frances Lundy, a native of Pennsylvania, and daughter of William Lundy, a California settler of 1882, two children have been born into his family, Eva Bell and Edna Adella. Mr. Stearns is affable and approachable, kind and considerate to his many employes, and in his life and character furnishes an example of the strong, moderate and successful promoter of western enterprises.

DAVID L. JONES. The substantial, capable and progressive citizens of San Joaquin county have no better representative than David L. Jones, who occupies a noteworthy position among the enterprising, practical and business-like farmers, who are so ably conducting the agricultural interests of this part of the state. A son of the late John W. Jones, he was born on his father's farm, in that part of the valley now called Escalon, January 13, 1867. His grandfather, Electus Jones, was of Welsh ancestry. He was public-spirited and patriotic, and after serving as a soldier in the Revolution settled as a planter in North Carolina.

Born on the parental plantation in North Carolina, John W. Jones was there bred to agricultural pursuits. In the earlier part of his career he took up land in Missouri, and having cleared a farm remained there until 1852. Joining an ox-team train in that year, he made an overland trip to California, being six months in crossing the plains. Recognizing the fact that the many miners flocking here from all parts of the Union must be fed, he wisely decided that more money could be made by tilling the soil than in digging for gold. Locating accordingly on the Stanislaus river, he raised a good crop of grain the first season, dragging in the seed with a brush. The crop which he harvested he readily sold to the men traveling to the southern mines, receiving five cents a pound for the grain. Removing to the present site of Escalon in 1853, he erected a good dwelling-house, and began his career as a grain raiser in earnest, having at first a small ranch. At the end of each harvesting season, with the money that he received for his wheat, he purchased more land, until his home farm contained one thousand acres. In addition to this, he bought land in Stanislaus and Tulare counties, becoming one of the most extensive landholders in the state, at one time having a clear title to thirty-seven thousand acres. He made two return trips to the east, and on each occasion brought back with him large herds of cattle to stock his ranches. He made a specialty of raising sheep, being thus actively engaged when wool was selling at high prices, and made a good deal of money in his operations. He was a man of marked ability and integrity, and stood very high in the community. He died in Escalon, in the brick residence that he occupied, September 10, 1893, aged seventy-two years. He was keenly interested in the welfare of his adopted town and county, and was a staunch adherent of the Republican party.

John W. Jones was twice married. His first wife, who died while crossing the plains, in 1852, bore him six children, of whom but one is living, namely: Mrs. Edna M. Bledsoe, of Modesto. His second marriage was with Catherine M. Dunlap, who was born in Springfield, Ill., which was also the place of birth of her father, John W. Dunlap, a pioneer stockman and farmer of Knights Ferry, this state. She died on the home farm, in Escalon, September 25, 1880, at the age of forty-eight years. Of the eight children born of this union, three are living, namely: David L., the special subject of this sketch; Alice D., residing with her brother David; and James W., living on the old home farm.

After leaving the district schools, David L. Jones completed his early education at the Lytton Springs College, in Sonoma county. Choosing as his life-work the independent vocation to which he was reared, he began farming for himself at the age of twenty-one years, assuming possession of the ranch which he now owns and occupies. It is well situated on the river road, about three miles from the village of Escalon, and contains one thousand acres of land, which he devotes, principally, to the raising of stock and grain. Mr. Jones has met with characteristic success as an agriculturist, and has added valuable improvements to his estate, having an orange grove and a good orchard, and, in 1890, having erected a large two-story residence.

In Oakland Mr. Jones married Hattie L. King, a native of Wisconsin, and they have two children, namely: Herbert L. and Merrill E. Politically Mr. Jones is a staunch Republican, and fraternally he is an Odd Fellow.

D. M. TOOTHACRE. At an early period of our country's history the Toothacre family became established in Maine, and from that state one of the name went forth to fight under the standard of the colonies during the first struggle with England. John Toothacre, a son of this Revolutionary soldier, was born in Bangor, Me., and at an early age settled on Long Island, New York, where he enlisted in the war of 1812. A man of sturdy frame and stalwart physique, he was well fitted to endure the hardships and privations of army life. Nor was he less adapted for the stress and strain of pioneer existence. To such as he Nature in her primeval condition possessed charms which no city could afford.

Like Daniel Boone and many other hardy frontiersmen, he was content with the rough fare, the constant danger and the many deprivations incident to the civilizing of the then west. For a time after leaving New York he tilled the soil near Zanesville, Ohio, but as early as 1836 he settled in Jefferson county, Iowa, where he became an extensive and prosperous stockman, and lived to be one hundred and two years old.

In the family of this progressive pioneer was a son, John W., who was born in Bangor, Me., and who grew to manhood in the then frontier regions of Iowa, where for years he engaged in raising stock and general farm products. Shortly after the outbreak of the Civil war he enlisted and was accepted as a member of the Twenty-second Iowa Infantry, but owing to his unusual weight (two hundred and thirty-five pounds) Captain Newbold (afterward governor of Iowa) recommended that he be mustered out as unable to endure the strain of long forced marches. For this reason he saw no active service. After many years in Iowa, during 1884 he went to Kansas and bought land in Sheridan county, where he still carries on a stock business as well as general farming. Fraternally he is connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows.

The marriage of John W. Toothacre united him with Rebecca Hickenbottom, who was born in Jacksonville, Ky., and is still living. Her father, Joseph Hickenbottom, was a Virginian by birth and a pioneer of Kentucky. When Mr. Hickenbottom and his father went to Iowa in 1836 they were the first white settlers west of the Skunk river in that state, and his remaining years were devoted to the development of a tract of raw land in Jefferson county. Prosperity attended his efforts. In time he accumulated thousands of acres of tillable land. Not only was he a man of influence among the white settlers who gradually flocked to that section of country, but among the Indians as well he wielded considerable influence and for years during his early residence in Iowa he enjoyed the personal friendship of the great chief, Blackhawk. At the time of his death he was more than ninety years of age.

In the family of John W. Toothacre there are four sons and one daughter, all still living, and of these the eldest, D. M., was born at Fairfield, Jefferson county, Iowa, March 22, 1863. In boyhood he attended the country schools during the winter months and helped at home in the summer. On starting out for himself, in 1880, he went to Colorado and for three years engaged in lumbering at Leadville. The year 1883 found him in California, where he worked at the lumber business in Santa Cruz. In 1884 he was appointed deputy to Sheriff Crittenden, and two years later, on resigning that office, he came to Visalia, where he took up carpentering. That occupation engaged his attention entirely until 1894, when he formed the partnership of Heberling & Toothacre and organized the company of which he is now vice-president and which owns the pioneer brickyard of Visalia.

The first wife of Mr. Toothacre was Miss Jennie Brown, to whom he was married in 1887. She was a native of Ottumwa, Kans., and came to California in 1886, dying in Visalia in 1889. The present wife of Mr. Toothacre was formerly Miss Amanda Samis, who was born in Amador county, Cal., their marriage being solemnized in Hanford. They are the parents of two children, Delta and Buenna, and make their home at No. 407 Northwest First avenue, in a residence built by Mr. Toothacre. In fraternal relations he is a member of the Foresters and Woodmen of the World, along commercial lines holds membership in the Visalia Board of Trade, and politically gives his allegiance to the Republican party and is a member of the county central committee.

FRANK H. SHORT, attorney-at-law, Fresno, Cal., occupies a position of distinction at the bar of California, and for several years past has been recognized as one of the leaders of the Republican party of this state. He was born September 12, 1862, in Shelby county, Mo., and is a son of Hamilton and Emily (Wharton) Short. His father, who was also born in Shelby county, was a son of John Short, who was born in Delaware, of English ancestry. In young manhood he immigrated to Missouri, becoming one of the pioneers of Shelby county, where he cleared and improved a homestead. He was a man of profound religious convictions, and for many years was actively identified with the Methodist Episcopal Church. Hamilton Short received a common-school education, and afterward engaged in farming. Upon the outbreak of the Civil war he enlisted in the Missouri state troops; and while serving in the army died from drinking poisoned water, being but twenty-nine years of age at the time. Like his father, he was a consistent member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. His wife, who was born in Mount Pleasant, Ohio, now resides near Fresno, Cal. Her father, William Sayre Wharton, deceased, a descendant of one of the early families of Delaware, was born and reared in Ohio, where he learned the trade of saddler. He subsequently located in Shelby county, Mo., where he was engaged in farming for a number of years. Removing to the Pacific coast in later life, he spent his declining days in California, dying in Fresno in 1900, at the advanced age of eighty-eight years. He was a devoted member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and in politics was a staunch Republican. Two of his sons, Frank and F. A., served in the Union army during the Civil war. Frank Wharton, who held a commission as lieutenant, removed to Fresno during the early days of its history, and until his death in 1889 was one of its leading citizens, being a prominent attorney and at one time a representative in the state legislature. His brother, F. A. Wharton, also removed to Fresno county, where he is now a successful vineyardist.

Of the children born of the union of Hamilton and Emily (Wharton) Short, two attained maturity, namely: John W., now postmaster of Fresno, and Frank H. The latter attended the common schools of Shelby county, Mo., until he had reached the age of nine years, when he went to Hastings, Neb., where his schooling was continued. At the age of nineteen years he was engaged to teach school for one term. Removing to Fresno in the spring of 1882, he continued teaching one year, in the meantime beginning the study of the law under the direction of his uncle, Frank Wharton. In 1887 he was admitted to the bar, and since that time has been successfully engaged in the practice of his profession. Well versed in the intricacies of the science, he has successfully conducted many important cases, and has ably filled the position of attorney for various corporations. He is now serving as attorney for the well-known firm of Miller & Lux; for the Fresno Canal & Irrigation Company, in which he is also a director; for the Fresno Electric Company; for the City Water Company; and for the Fresno National Bank, in which he is a director and one of the original stockholders. Associated with Judge Chapman of Los Angeles, he was connected with the litigation over oil lands between Scrippers and the mineral locators, and was successful in obtaining decisions of the supreme court of the United States and from the Secretary of the Interior in favor of the mineral locators. He has likewise been actively identified with other cases of importance. He assisted in the prosecution of Heath for the murder of McWhorter, and defended Professor Sanders, accused of forgery and suspected of the murder of William Wooton. In the latter case he succeeded in avoiding the charge of murder, as the death of Wooton was not actually proven, although Sanders was subsequently prosecuted for forgery and sentenced to prison. In a proceeding before the railway commissioners he succeeded in procuring a reduction of ten per cent in the rates of transportation for oil, thus saving the oil shippers about $500,000 per year at the time and at the present amounting to about double that sum. The cases here cited are but a few of the more important ones with which Mr. Short has been associated, and the success which attended his conduct of them has given him a position among the leaders of the bar of California. Throughout his career his practice has been uniformly successful, whether in civil or criminal causes.

Outside of legal circles, Mr. Short is best known as one of the most aggressive and progressive leaders in the ranks of the Republican party in California. In 1885, two years prior to his admission to the bar, he was elected justice of the peace. At the end of his term he became the nominee of the Republican party for the office of district attorney, but was not elected, the county being strongly Democratic. He has been prominent in state and county conventions for several years. In 1896 he was chosen as a delegate to the Republican National convention at St. Louis, when McKinley was nominated for the presidency. In 1904 he was a leading member of the California delegation to the Republican National convention at Chicago, at which Roosevelt was nominated. He took a prominent and conspicuous part in the work of that body, and was one of the sub-committee chosen to frame the platform upon which the campaign was conducted. In 1898 Governor Gage appointed him a member of the State Board of Commissioners for the preservation of the Yosemite Valley, a post he still occupies. He was for a term also a member of the board of trustees of the State Normal School at San Jose. Fraternally he is a member of Fresno Lodge No. 247, F. & A. M.; of Trigo Chapter No. 69, R. A. M.; of Fresno Commandery No. 29, K. T.; and of Islam Temple, A. A. O. N. M. S., of San Francisco. He is also a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen. In his social relations he is identified with the Union League and the Bohemian clubs of San Francisco and with the Sequoia Club of Fresno. He is also a member of the State Bar Association, and ex-President of the Fresno County Bar Association. In religion he is a communicant of the Methodist Episcopal Church. In Fresno, in 1897, he was united in marriage with Nellie C. (Curtis) Rorick, who was born in Iowa, but was reared and educated in Los Angeles. She had one daughter, Mildred. By his first wife, Emma Packard, Mr. Short has one son, Frank H., Jr.

Endowed by nature with a body and mind of exceptional vigor, with praiseworthy ambition and indefatigable powers, Mr. Short has become recognized as a master of his profession at an age when most men are standing upon the thresholds of their careers. The marked success which has attended his efforts is doubtless due more to his untiring zeal and industry and his constant application to the work intrusted to his care than to any other attributes, although underlying all is a thorough groundwork of study under the supervision of one of the best-equipped lawyers who ever practiced before the courts of southern California. During the years of his residence in this state he has given frequent evidence of a hearty desire to accomplish all within his power for the advancement of community interests, and particularly for the promotion of those movements intended to elevate the social, moral, educational and industrial status of Fresno county. Though comparatively young in years, his strong personal attributes have long since been generally recognized, and these characteristics, taken in conjunction with his manifest public spirit, his breadth of mind in viewing all public affairs, and his generosity of heart, have given him a place in the esteem of thoughtful and discriminating men which few men attain at his time of life. His work is making a marked impress upon the trend of events in California, and the record of his life is entitled to a place of distinction in the annals of the state.

JOHN SUBLITT JOHNSON. Occupying a prominent place among the citizens of Visalia, Tulare county, is John Sublitt Johnson, whose interests are as varied as the talents which have marked his career in his adopted state. As a child of eight years he came west with his father, Langston A. Johnson, whose sketch is found elsewhere in this volume, starting from St. Charles county, Mo., where he was born August 16, 1859. His boyhood years were passed in the city of Los Angeles, this state, where he attended the public schools, afterward becoming a student in the schools of Kern county, where he removed with his parents in 1874. Two years later the family located in Visalia and this city has since been the scene of the most ambitious efforts of Mr. Johnson.

After completing an attendance of the common schools, Mr. Johnson attended Heald's Business College, San Francisco, where he graduated at the age of twenty-three years; this training in Heald's Business College prepared him for a business career. He then engaged as a bookkeeper in his father's store in Visalia, and also with various other concerns. Following this he mined in Fresno county for several years, and, returning to Visalia, entered politics, and in 1891 was elected to the office of county tax collector after serving one year as deputy, and was collector of taxes for six years. He then entered Packers' School of Mines and graduated from that institution. In 1899 he removed to Independence, Inyo county, where he established a laboratory. The following year he went to Nome, Alaska, and engaged as a miner for one year in the capacity of assayer and engineer and making reports on the various mines. Upon his return to Visalia he engaged in the same occupation, establishing a laboratory at the corner of Bridge and School streets. He is still interested in mines in Inyo county as well as in Mexico. In January, 1902, in partnership with William Ketter, Mr. Johnson purchased the Visalia City Water Company (incorporated), and in June, 1904, became sole owner of the concern by purchase of his partner's interest. This plant is operated by the Holly system, which pumps direct into the pipes, the pumps used being the very latest centrifugal type of Crow pumps. There are two stations, one on the west side, with three wells, and one on the east side, with five wells, with an average depth of one hundred and twenty-five feet. Mr. Johnson is also interested in orchards in Evansdale, where, with a partner, he owns eighty-three acres. He owns residence property in Visalia, as well as a quarter block of business property, upon which is located a lively stable.

The marriage of Mr. Johnson united him with Olga Woerner, who was born in Oakland, Cal. In his political affiliations a Democrat, Mr. Johnson has been very active in his efforts to advance the principles he espouses. Fraternally he is a Mason of high degree, belonging to the Blue Lodge, Chapter and Commandery, in Visalia, and Islam Temple, N. M. S., of San Francisco; and is a member of the Scottish Rite of Oakland. He is also a member of the Lodge of Perfection of Visalia; of the Woodmen of the World, and a charter member of the lodge of the Knights of Pythias, with which he has been identified for twenty-one years. He belongs to the National Guards, having been a charter member of Company E of the Sixth California regiment. He has been a member for fourteen years and now ranks as captain, as well as holding the office of regimental commissary. A true sportsman, he occupies admirably the office of vice president of the State Fish and Game Association. In the best interests of his home city he acts as director in the building and loan association and also on the board of trade. A public-spirited and enterprising citizen, Mr. Johnson is highly esteemed by all who know him.

J. GOODWIN THOMPSON, M. D. In considering the career and character of this eminent member of the medical fraternity, the impartial observer will be disposed to rank him not only among the distinguished members of the profession on the coast, but also among the most cultured and beneficent characters thus allied with Stanislaus county. Born in Poughkeepsie, Dutchess county, N. Y., November 26, 1864, his only patrimony was physical vigor and tenacity of purpose characteristic of the race from which he springs, his ancestors coming from the heart of Scotch Presbyterianism, near Glasgow, Lanarkshire, Scotland. His paternal grandfather, William, brought his family to Poughkeepsie, N. Y., at an early day, thus indulging a departure from conservative procedure entirely foreign to the trend of his forefathers. When old age began to creep through his veins, the traditions of his native land, and the presence of his children, weaned him back to the scenes of his childhood, youth and manhood, and his death occurred in Lanark, where he had farmed for so many years, and where he attained the age of ninety-one years. James Thompson, the father of J. Goodwin, was a boy when he came from Scotland, and after learning the trade of locomotive engineering, was employed on the New York Central Railroad. About 1870 he brought his family to near Portland, Ore., remained there six months, and then settling on his present farm at Lanark Park, Cal., in Stanislaus county. To his original purchase he has added, and now owns fifteen hundred acres, which, out of regard for his native Scottish county, he has named Lanark Park. True to the religious traditions of his family, he is a staunch Presbyterian and an elder in the church. His political tendencies are with the Republican party, and his activity has resulted in commendable service as a member of the county central committee. His wife, formerly Agnes Boyd, was born in New Jersey, and is the mother of seven sons and three daughters, Dr. Thompson being the oldest of all.

Since his sixth year Dr. Thompson has lived in California, and notwithstanding his father's comparatively limited circumstances, has been able to profit by the best educational opportunities of the state. Starting out in that great field of human equality, the public schools, he evidenced an early regard for the acquisition of knowledge, and in 1886 graduated with honors from the Modesto high school. Pursuing his studies at the University of California, his industry and balance met with the approval of his superiors, and with the appreciation of his fellow students. He was active in college societies and athletics, and in his senior year was treasurer of the associated student body, his graduation taking place in 1891, with the degree of Ph. B. Long since, the determination to devote his energies to medical science had taken firm root in his mind and heart, and the fall following his graduation he entered the medical department of the University of California, graduating from that institution in 1894. In 1895 he located in Oakdale and began a general practice of medicine and surgery, and it is the pride of his adopted town that it has profited by his steady advancement, and encouraged with its patronage and good-will his more than laudable ambitions. In the early days of his practice he met with success and encouragement, which is not common to all alleviators of human ills, all cases being regarded as stepping-stones to a never failing and well defined ideal.

The mind of Dr. Thompson is eminently constructive, impelling him to suggest and put into operation new agencies of instruction and relief. Thus in 1903, he began the erection of a sanitarium which should embody the best known means of caring for surgical and medical patients, and although the institution was opened as recently as December 15, of that year, it quickly outlived its capacity, and was in crying need of additional facilities for caring for its applicants for admission. Additions were made enabling the doctor to accommodate three times as many patients. The ground floor now covers 50x75 feet, the operating room also taking on the dignity of larger proportion and newer appliances. Besides, two cottages are in connection with the sanitarium building. The sanitarium, equipped with the latest modern appliances, X-ray apparatus, etc., is complete in every detail. The doctor moves steadily in grooves maintained by the medical school for years past, his practice suggesting everything that is modern and yet conservative. The fascinations and enormous possibilities of surgery have led him to devote his chief energies to that department of medical science, and his inventive faculty has led him to devise, modify and improve a variety of instruments used in the delicate operations of surgery, as well as to introduce new methods of treatment and manipulation of obscure cases. The recognition of his skill has been prompt and far-reaching, and has drawn patients from all over this and the surrounding counties. In addition to his regular practice important obligations of a public nature have accumulated along his path, and he is examiner of old line insurance companies, district surgeon for the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, and has at times been connected with large mercantile and mining enterprises in the capacity of physician and surgeon. He is a member of the San Joaquin Valley Medical Association, a charter member of the Pacific Coast Association of Railway Surgeons and a member of the International Association of Railway Surgeons. His achievements are based on an intimate knowledge of the intricate subjects of human anatomy and scientific therapeutics, to more extensively write of which must needs suggest the limitations attached both to the writer and to the ordinary reader.

In the midst of his engrossing practice Dr. Thompson has found time and inclination to enter the marts of trade, and to profit by certain advantages of wealth acquiring presented in his native state. With his brother Robert, he is operating a farm of fifteen hundred acres at Lanark Park, devoted to stock, alfalfa and grain raising, making a specialty of a model dairy, and high-grade Durham cattle. As a money maker this farm has more than realized the expectations of its enthusiastic promoters. Ever since his graduation Dr. Thompson has voted the Democratic ticket, and in 1902-04 was a member of the state central committee and of the county central committee. For years he has realized the social and general advantages of fraternal organizations, and at present is a member of the Modesto Chapter, R. A. M., the Stockton Lodge No. 218, B. P. O. E., and the Knights of Pythias. In religion he is a Presbyterian. No broader or more uplifting human agency is working for the good of Oakdale than that represented in the life and character of Dr. Thompson. His nature craves the best, and his intellect penetrates deeply and surely into the mazes of human suffering and human relief. His work is congenial, satisfying, presenting interminable vistas to be trodden reverently and with due regard for the most trenchant of human responsibility. His nature is genial, his heart large and his capacity for research and labor practically inexhaustible.

HENRY BRICKLEY. A fine representative of the native-born sons of Fresno county, and a man of ability and integrity, Henry Brickley is a deservedly popular member of the professional, business and social circles of the city of Fresno. As one of the rising young lawyers of the place, he is building up a good practice and fast winning for himself a prominent and honorable name in the legal fraternity. A son of the late John Brickley, he was born June 28, 1876, in Liberty, Fresno county, of Irish ancestry.

John Brickley was born and reared in the city of Cork, Ireland. When a young man he immigrated to this country, and settled in Chicago, Ill., where he followed the trade of carpenter and builder. Enlisting in an Illinois regiment, he served in the Civil war, and just before the surrender of Lee was wounded in the right leg. In 1866, with his wife, he came across the plains to California, and for two years or more was a resident of Truckee, Nevada county. Coming then to Fresno county, he engaged in general farming and sheep raising for a few years. He died in 1879 in Madera county. His wife, whose maiden name was Sarah McCormick, was born in Ireland, and now lives near Fresno. Four children were born of their union, three daughters and one son, Henry, the special subject of this sketch, being the third child in succession of birth.

Brought up in Fresno county, Henry Brickley obtained his elementary education in the district schools, and was afterward graduated from the Fresno high school. Entering the University of California in 1897, he continued there through the sophomore year. The ensuing two years he was on the reportorial staff of the Fresno Republican, during which time he studied law. September 12, 1900, Mr. Brickley was admitted to the bar, and has since been actively engaged in the practice of his profession, his office being in the Short building. Mr. Brickley is also interested to some extent in agricultural pursuits, owning a ranch of one hundred and twenty acres. This ranch, lying about eight miles west of Fresno, near Kearney, is entirely under irrigation, and is devoted to the raising of alfalfa, a most prolific and valuable crop. Mr. Brickley is a member of the County Bar Association, and a charter member, and ex-president, of Fresno Parlor No. 25, N. S. G. W.

FULTON G. BERRY. Distinguished as a pioneer of California, and as one who has been actively identified with the business and financial interests of the state, Fulton G. Berry of Fresno is especially worthy of honorable mention in a work of this character. Coming to the Pacific coast when a young man, more than half a century ago, he has since been variously employed, and by his own efforts has worked his way upward from a state of comparative poverty to one of affluence and influence. The lineal descendant of a prominent New England family, he was born February 10, 1832, in Belfast, Me., a son of Watson Berry. He comes of thrifty Scotch ancestry, his great-grandfather having been born in Scotland, from there immigrating to the United States in colonial times, and settling in Massachusetts. Mr. Berry's paternal grandfather, Scotta Berry, was a life-long resident of Massachusetts, his home being on Cape Cod.

A native of Harwich, Barnstable county, Mass., Watson Berry grew to manhood in his native state, and during the War of 1812 was an officer in the American army, serving as colonel of a regiment. Subsequently removing to Maine, he established a tannery in Belfast, and was afterward engaged in mercantile business in that city until his death, at the age of seventy-six years. He was highly esteemed as a man of integrity, and was prominent in the Masonic fraternity, and in the Whig party. He married Elizabeth Nickerson, who was born in Chatham, Mass., and died in Chelsea, Mass. Her father, Capt. Richard Nickerson, was born of English ancestors in Massachusetts, and died in the state that gave him birth. He was for many years master of an ocean vessel, and successfully engaged in the East India trade.

The youngest of a family of twelve children, Fulton G. Berry was bred and educated in Belfast, Me., remaining beneath the parental roof until seventeen years old. Ambitious and enterprising as a youth, he determined to seek the best possible opportunities for increasing his finances, and soon after the discovery of gold in California he concluded to try his fortunes in the mining fields. Going to New York City, he sailed by way of the Isthmus of Panama, and after a tedious voyage landed in San Francisco on May 20, 1851. Going directly to the old diggings in Forbestown, he met with success, and on his return to San Francisco sent his mother some of his first accumulations. He was subsequently employed in mining on the American river, and afterward on the Yuba river, at Cherokee. Locating in San Francisco in 1853, Mr. Berry secured employment at sand shoveling. Investing his earnings in a horse and dray, he was engaged in teaming the following seven years, in the meantime cooking his own meals, and sleeping in the stable loft. Embarking then in the grocery business, he opened a store at the corner of Jackson and Stockton streets, where he carried on a successful business for six years. During the stirring scenes of those years, he was an active member of the Vigilance Committee, enforcing law and order, as far as lay in his power.

Subsequently becoming junior partner of the firm of Badlam & Berry, Mr. Berry engaged in the real estate business, his office being at No. 318 Montgomery street. Later, becoming a member of the San Francisco Stock Exchange, he paid $30,000 for a seat, the price given being a record breaker. He was one of the charter members of the Pacific Board, but sold his seat in this to purchase the one mentioned above. Later locating in San Rafael, he leased the Tamalpais hotel, which he managed for two years. The ensuing three years Mr. Berry served as commissary at the San Quentin state prison. Resigning his position there in 1884, he came to Fresno, which had then a population of scarce twenty-five hundred souls. Buying a half interest in the Grand Central hotel, which is most advantageously located in the center of the city, he met with such success in its management that he subsequently bought out the interests of his partner, and in 1888 purchased the entire property. The house is 150 x 150 feet, containing four floors, and is finely furnished and equipped for hotel purposes.

With characteristic enterprise Mr. Berry has been actively associated with the establishment of many of the city's improvements and industries. He started the first steam laundry in town, built the first street railway in Fresno; was the principal owner of the gas works until the plant was sold; was one of the original owners of the electric light plant; and, in company with Ryland Wallace, started the first orange grove in the San Joaquin valley, setting out seventy acres of trees at Orange Dale, on Kings river. He still retains his interest in this grove, and likewise owns a ranch of one hundred and forty acres. This ranch, known as the Grand Central farm, is located about three-fourths of a mile from Fresno, and is devoted to general farming and dairying. When he became a resident of Fresno, Mr. Berry had lost a fortune, and was then $16,000 in debt. By strict attention to the details of business he has accumulated some of the best paying property in Fresno county. He was one of the executive committee of the Mid-Winter Fair held in San Francisco, which proved a great success and as a result the museum now seen in Golden Gate Park was built.

In San Francisco Mr. Berry married Mary Eliza Torrey, who was born in Rockland, Me., a daughter of E. M. Torrey, who came to California in 1849 with the gold seekers. Settling in San Francisco, he became one of the earliest contractors and builders of the city, and was joined by his family in 1850. Of the union of Mr. and Mrs. Berry four children were born, two of whom are deceased, namely: Fulton M., who was engaged in the insurance business, and died at the age of twenty-six years, and Mabel, who died at the age of twenty years. Two daughters are living, namely: Mrs. Minnie L. Goodwin, formerly a missionary in Chefoo, China, now residing in Mill Valley, and Maude Lillian, wife of Frank Moulan, of New York city, who is now the leading lady and whose husband is the leading comedian with Klaw & Erlanger, playing in New York city and meeting with great success in the new spectacular play, Humpty Dumpty. Politically Mr. Berry is a Republican and has served as member of the city council. Fraternally he was made a Mason at California Lodge No. 1, San Francisco, and is now a member of Fresno Lodge No. 247, F. & A. M. He is also a member of the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, and of the Ancient Order of United Workmen. Socially he is connected with several of the prominent clubs of San Francisco, including the Bohemian club, the Union League club, the Family club and the Corinthian Yacht club.

After an absence of fifty-three years Mr. Berry made a visit to his old home and seeing how the people have to economize to exist, he returned to Fresno county with a firmer belief in its possibilities than ever and declares that should any unforeseen reverse overtake him he would never leave the county to gain another start in life.

Few residents of Fresno have taken so active and important a part in the actual work of developing the city as has Mr. Berry. Settling there when it was a comparatively small town, he soon discerned the great possibilities offered by the place and its surroundings, and at once began the work of promoting enterprises of the greatest public utility. Since then, during all the years of his residence in Fresno, he has taken a leading part in the work of making that city one of the most desirable places of residence in the state, as well as assisting materially in the advancement of the industrial, commercial and social interests of the city. He has always exhibited a keen public spirit, has been generous in his treatment of his fellowmen and liberal in his contributions toward worthy enterprises of whatsoever nature, and has become widely known as one of the most progressive and loyal champions which Fresno has ever had. It is to such men as he that the greatest credit for the upbuilding of the city belongs, and thoughtful citizens freely accord him the honor which is his just due. Personally Mr. Berry is a man of most kindly and considerate disposition, living not alone for himself, but striving throughout his daily life to be of some benefit to mankind. He is entitled to a permanent place in the historical literature of the San Joaquin valley and of California, and the foregoing brief estimate of his character and standing as a citizen is a consensus of the opinion of those who have known him best for a score of years.

WILLIAM JOSEPH KITTRELL. A man of ability and integrity, enterprising and practical, William Joseph Kittrell is well known in the business circles of Fresno, being secretary and financial agent of the Fresno Agricultural Works, and secretary of the Knob Hill Oil Company. He comes of honorable pioneer ancestry, his grandfather, Joseph Kittrell, and his father, Francis M. Kittrell, having been among the earlier settlers of San Joaquin county. A Virginian by birth, Joseph Kittrell settled in Kentucky when a young man, from there removing to Clarksville, Ark. Joining the vast tide of gold-seekers in 1849, he crossed the plains to California, and for a year was successfully employed in mining. Going home the following year, he returned, in 1852, with his family to the Pacific coast, bringing with him a fine herd of cattle, and locating near Stockton. Taking up land he carried on general farming, including the raising of grain and stock, being quite successful. He subsequently removed to Stanislaus county, where he spent his declining years.

A native of Kentucky, Francis M. Kittrell lived there but a short time before his parents removed to Arkansas, where he acquired his early education. As a young man he came with his father to California, and lived for a time near Stockton, where he assisted in the pioneer labor of improving a homestead. Subsequently locating at French Camp, he followed general farming a number of years. In 1867 he removed with his family to Stanislaus county, where he continued in agricultural pursuits for four years. In 1871 he bought land on the Sacramento river, in Isleton, Sacramento county, and there engaged in his free and independent occupation until his health failed, owing to a severe attack of asthma, in 1876. Returning then to Stanislaus county, he remained there until his death, in 1877. His wife, whose maiden name was Selina Harp, was born in Tennessee, of Dutch ancestry, her paternal great-grandfather having been born and bred in Holland. Her father, William Harp, a native of Tennessee, became a pioneer farmer of Arkansas. In 1852 he crossed the plains to California, and located first in San Joaquin county, later going to Stanislaus county, where he resided until his death, at the venerable age of eighty-three years. He was an industrious, hard-working man, very successful in his agricultural labors, and acquired much wealth. After her husband's death Mrs. Selina Kittrell resided for a few years with her father, William Harp. She subsequently married, in Stockton, Mr. Zabel, and now resides on Thirty-fifth street, Oakland, Cal. Of her union with Mr. Kittrell, four children were born, namely: William Joseph, the special subject of this sketch; Byron C., who died at the age of twenty years; Mrs. Villa M. Purveyor, of Fresno; and Francis M., of San Francisco, where he is employed by the Market Street Railway Company.

Born October 10, 1866, William J. Kittrell spent the days of his childhood and youth in Stanislaus county, three miles south of Modesto, and was graduated from the Modesto high school in 1886, and from the Stockton Business College the following year. The next six months he was an assistant teacher in the college from which he had received his diploma, and on giving up the situation located at Fresno Flats, Madera county, where he was clerk and bookkeeper in a general mercantile house for eight months. Accepting a position with James Porteous, in March, 1888, he continued as bookkeeper and salesman for the Fresno Agricultural Works for six years. As the works increased in capacity and output, additional help was needed, and Mr. Kittrell gave assistance where it was most needed, and has since 1894 had entire charge of the financial department, and is now one of the stockholders of the company. He is also secretary of the Knob Hill Oil Company, which was formed in 1900, capitalizing with $25,000, and electing the following named officers: James Porteous, president; W. A. Ferguson, superintendent; G. T. Willis, vice-president; W. J. Kittrell, secretary; and C. C. Wheeler. This company owns forty acres of land on the Kern river, and from the wells now in operation takes out about two thousand barrels of oil per day, having a fine flow ever since the first well was struck. In the plant, the development of which cost upward of $100,000, two large engines and two boilers are kept constantly pumping, and the equipments are of the most modern and approved style. Mr. Kittrell also owns valuable real estate in Fresno.

In 1888, in Modesto, Mr. Kittrell married Miss Ella Vezey, who was born in San Andreas, this state, a daughter of D. D. Vezey. Mr. Vezey, a native of Vermont, came to California in 1848, and for many years was a prosperous contractor and builder in San Andreas, but is now a resident of Fresno. His wife, whose maiden name was Minerva J. Lewis, was born in Illinois. Mr. and Mrs. Kittrell have one child, a son, named Erroll Kittrell. Fraternally Mr. Kittrell belongs to Fresno Lodge No. 247, F. & A. M., and Fresno Commandery No. 29, Knights Templar, and is a member of Fresno Lodge of Perfection. Politically he is a sound Democrat, and in religion he is a member of the Presbyterian Church.

SCOTT MCKAY. A thorough master of his profession, Scott McKay of Fresno, the present county surveyor of Fresno county, is considered one of the best civil engineers and surveyors of this section of the state. He is accurate, painstaking, familiar with the topography of the county, and is filling his responsible office most creditably and acceptably to all concerned. He was born July 17, 1868, in Vevay, Ind., which was also the birthplace of his father, George W. McKay. His grandfather, Isaac McKay, was a life-long resident of Vevay, Ind., his parents having migrated there from Virginia, being pioneers of the place. He followed agricultural pursuits during his active life, clearing and improving a homestead from the wilderness.

A farmer by birth and breeding, George W. McKay is now living on the ancestral homestead where his birth occurred sixty-three years ago. From early manhood he was employed as a civil engineer, and as county surveyor of Switzerland county, Ind., a position which he held many terms, he surveyed a large part of that county. He was a strong Republican in politics, active in public affairs, and two of his brothers served in the Civil war. He married Mary Siebenthal, who was born in Vevay, and there spent her entire life, dying in 1899. Her father, Benjamin Siebenthal, was also a life-long resident of that place, his parents having located in Switzerland county, Ind., on immigrating to this country from Germany. He reared several children, and three of his sons were soldiers in the Civil war. Of the seven children born of the union of Mr. and Mrs. George W. McKay, five are living, Scott, the second child, and eldest son, being the only one residing in California.

After completing the course of study in the public schools, and the Vevay high school, Scott McKay, in 1886, entered the scientific department of the State Normal School at Terre Haute, and remained there until his senior term. He subsequently taught school a year, and then decided to take up the profession of civil engineering, with which he was already quite familiar, having worked with his father more or less from early boyhood. Entering the senior class of the Valparaiso State Normal School in 1890, Mr. McKay was graduated from that institution with the degree of C. E. in 1891. Coming to California soon after, he located in Fresno, and as construction engineer for the San Joaquin Electric Company had charge of the building of the Reservoir Pipe Line ditches. At the end of sixteen months, when the work was completed, he became deputy county surveyor under Surveyor Hoxie, with whom he was associated for about seven years. In 1902 Mr. McKay was nominated on the Republican ticket for county surveyor of Fresno county, and was elected by a majority of fourteen hundred and ninety-six, for a term of four years, beginning in January, 1903.

Mr. McKay married, in Fresno, Helen Jewett, a native of Wisconsin, and a daughter of George D. Jewett, an electrician, now living in Fresno, retired from active business. Mr. and Mrs. McKay have one child, a son named Warren Scott McKay. Mr. McKay is a staunch supporter of the principles of the Republican party, and takes an active interest in city and county affairs. He is a member of the Chamber of Commerce and belongs to the Royal Arcanum, to the Independent Order of Foresters, and to the Woodmen of the World.

RICHARD HENRY ENDICOTT, M. D. During the twenty-nine years Dr. Richard Henry Endicott has pursued the practice of medicine in California, he has been known not only for his skill and assiduity as a physician, but also for the genial urbanity of his manners, his literary taste and talent, and for his popularity as a member of its social circles. He has gained professional eminence by none of the arts of the charlatan, neither has he sought it in special lines of practice. He has been content to follow the beaten track in which physicians educated in the highest sense of the regular school, and loyal to its ethical code, seek rather to merit recognition by their knowledge and skill, than to gain notoriety by the more questionable methods by which less meritorious practitioners find a short cut to fame and fortune. Few, engrossed in the absorbing occupations of life, appreciate the patience, the self-denying application, the weight of care and anxiety, and the enormous responsibility which attends the life of the meritorious physician. It is the pride of the many families which have come to regard Dr. Endicott as an integral part of their households, that he belongs to and adorns this class of professional men.

It is pleasing to note that Dr. Endicott belongs to the only American aristocracy, that of brains and birth. An ennobling ancestry set up in his childish heart an ideal which the years have not diminished or changed, and which has served as a spur in overcoming obstacles and discouraging drawbacks. Born in Ridgely, Platte county, Mo., October 9, 1845, he is a lineal descendant of Governor John Endicott of Massachusetts, that zealous Puritan, Indian fighter and executive, who was born in Dorchester, England, in 1589, and who died in Boston, Mass., March 15, 1665. Later members of the family made their way to Virginia, where Joseph Endicott, the paternal great-grandfather of the doctor was born, and from which state he emigrated to Bourbon county, Ky., in the early days of its plantation supremacy. His son William, the next in line of succession, was born in Bourbon county, as was also his son, Richard Bohannon Endicott, the father of Richard Henry. William Endicott moved from Bourbon to Henry county, Ky., later making his home in Platte county, Mo., where he conducted farming until his death. Dr. Endicott's mother, formerly Dieza L. Cartwright, was a niece of that famous Methodist Episcopal circuit preacher, Peter Cartwright, who flourished in the latter part of the eighteenth and fore part of the nineteenth centuries. She was a daughter of Isaac Cartwright, a planter of North Carolina, where she was born, and from there she went overland with horse teams to Missouri. Richard Endicott made a fair success of farming in Platte county, reared his family of four sons and two daughters, three of whom are living, and spent his declining years on a farm in Clay county, where his life ended just as the Civil war burst in fury over the land in 1861. Two of his sons entered the medical profession, J. M., the oldest, practicing for many years in Oakdale, this state, where his death occurred.

Dr. Endicott is one of the many successful men of to-day who had their characters set and their thoughts turned into serious and responsible channels by the Civil war. When the call for volunteers broke into the occupations of men, he was a hard-working farmer lad with little thought of the future, and at the time of his discharge in St. Louis, July 6, 1865, he was still a youth, whose nineteen years would scarcely seem to warrant the serious and earnest outlook upon life. Enlisting in Company K, Eighteenth Missouri Volunteer Infantry, in 1862, he was mustered in at Macon, Mo., and after serving six months was taken ill and discharged for disability. Enlisting in 1863 in Company A, Fourth Missouri Cavalry, he participated in the second battle of Springfield, January 8, 1863; the battle of Jefferson City, Mo.; of Marshalltown; Big Blue; Little Blue; besides numerous skirmishes and cavalry dashes, and spent the winter of 1864 in quarters at Sedalia, Mo. When peace settled over the country he returned to his home in Missouri and attended Ridgely Academy, completing the course in 1868. A closely following experience was a journey to Colorado as a contractor on the Union Pacific Railway in Wyoming, and after the completion of the road he returned to Missouri and began to study medicine under his brother, J. M. Endicott. At the same time he engaged in the drug business, and in 1871 removed his store to Peru, Kans., where he continued in the store until entering the College of Physicians and Surgeons at Keokuk, Iowa, from which he was graduated in the class of 1875.

At the outset of his professional career Dr. Endicott wisely chose California as his most likely field of effort, practicing in Hollister from the fall of 1875 until 1876, and then locating in Darwin, Inyo county, where he remained a few months. He next located in Sacramento, and from there he removed to Bakersfield in 1877, assuming the position of superintendent and physician of the county hospital. For five years he practiced medicine in Rivista, Solano county, and in 1883 took a much needed rest in the east, visiting different cities and hospitals, and taking a course at a hospital in St. Louis. Returning to California in 1884, he practiced in Gilroy until 1886, and for the following seven years worked up a large practice in Oakdale. In 1893 he located in Stockton, from which headquarters he followed mining in Tuolumne and Eldorado counties, becoming interested as organizer and promoter in several large properties. He was a member of the company which opened the Red Cloud mine, near Plymouth, organized the Red Cloud Company and opened the North Star and Black Warrior mines in Tuolumne county. He also became interested in the Noonday mine in Tuolumne county, which they mined for several seasons, and a quarter of which he still owns. In 1901 the doctor settled in Rivista, duplicated his former success until 1904, in which year he became a resident of Oakdale, to which he brought a splendid reputation for erudition and ability. Dr. Endicott has a son by his former marriage, Edwin E., who shares his professional tendency, and is now a practicing surgeon of Jackson, Cal. He was educated in the public schools and graduated from the Kentucky School of Medicine in Louisville in 1894. In Stockton Dr. Endicott married for his second wife, Lulu Bechtol, a native of Clark county, Mo., and the mother of two children: Jessie, a graduate of the Stockton high school, and Albert. Dr. Endicott is a Mason and Knight of Pythias, and in politics is a Republican. His intellectual character is marked by strong qualities and positive convictions, which are tempered by kindly feeling and sympathy for the weak, while his professional endowments are of the kind which have tended to inspire confidence in his ability and a retention of his services as long as they were available in a given locality. He is a sincere and high-minded gentleman, proud of his good name, his many and loyal friends and the success which has been so fairly and strenuously won.

THOMAS W. PATTERSON. One of the substantial and prominent men of Fresno is Thomas W. Patterson, president of the Fresno National Bank, and an extensive owner of landed property in both city and county. Beginning life at the bottom of the ladder of attainment, he has steadily pushed his way upward, by energetic industry, perseverance and wise management achieving distinguished success in financial and business circles. A son of T. J. Patterson, he was born August 3, 1859, in Perry, Wyoming county, N. Y. He comes of patriotic New England stock, his paternal grandfather, Robert Patterson, a native of the Granite state, having served as lieutenant of a company in the Revolutionary war, Mr. Patterson having now in his possession the commission which made him an officer in the army.

Born and brought up in Londonderry, N. H., T. J. Patterson subsequently settled in Wyoming county, N. Y., as a manufacturer, and there spent the remainder of his life. He married Sophia H. Mace, who was born in Lockport, N. Y., and died, in 1887, in New York state. Her father, Isaac Mace, a native of Lowell, Mass., was the descendant of a Puritan family of New England. Of their union but two children were born, a son and a daughter.

His parents removing to Warsaw, N. Y., when he was young, Thomas W. Patterson was educated in the public schools of that place, and was afterward employed in mercantile pursuits in Rochester, N. Y. Going thence to Buffalo, N. Y., he was similarly engaged in that city until 1888, when he came to California and took up his residence in Fresno, and has since been a conspicuous factor in promoting its best interests. For a number of years he was actively engaged in the real estate and loan business, in 1896 becoming associated with the Fresno National Bank. In January, 1897, Mr. Patterson was elected a director of this institution; in January, 1900, was elected vice-president and director, and since March, 1900, has ably served as president. This bank, the second oldest national bank of Fresno, founded in 1888, has a capital of $200,000, with a surplus of $60,000, and is carrying on a general banking business, having the largest capital stock of any bank in the city. Mr. Patterson owns ranches, vineyards and orchards in various parts of Fresno county, and has valuable city property. His residence, the old Pulaski house, is one of the most attractive in the city, being most pleasantly located on Tulare street, and surrounded by a magnificent park of three acres. On the northeast corner of Tulare and J streets, Mr. Patterson erected, in 1900, Patterson block, a fine building 150 x 175 feet, two stories in height, and in 1904 erected, in company with Colonel Forsyth, a still larger block on the southeast corner of Tulare and J streets, the dimensions being the same as the former building, but having four stories and a basement. This is modernly equipped and furnished in every respect, fitted for offices, and is the most complete in all of its details of any similar block in the San Joaquin valley.

In Fresno, November 12, 1892, Mr. Patterson married Lizzie E. Bernhard, who was born in Mariposa county, the daughter of George Bernhard, a California pioneer, and an early settler of Fresno. Mr. and Mrs. Patterson are the parents of two children, namely: Dorothy H. and John D. In politics Mr. Patterson is a staunch supporter of the Republican party. He is a member of the California Bankers' Association and of the American Bankers' Association.

FRANCIS A. FEE. In every era of the world's history the profession of the law has attracted to its practice many of the keenest minds which their generation could boast. Notwithstanding the fact that the twentieth century promises to be a strictly commercial age, it would not be unwise to presage for the law that it will continue to draw to its practice men of brilliant intellects and that it will continue to fascinate them by the intricate problems it constantly offers for solution. Among the attorneys of California who have gained an assured position in the profession mention belongs to Francis A. Fee of Madera who practices in both the civil and criminal branches of the law, and in addition to his private practice acts as attorney for the Madera Board of Trade, the Madera Sugar Pine Company, the Commercial Bank of Madera, the Madera Electric Light and Water Companies, and various other concerns of an important nature.

Many years ago John Fee, who was a native of Carrick-on-Shannon, Ireland, became a pioneer of the Western Reserve in Ohio and there developed a farm, where he was largely interested in raising stock until his death. Like himself, his wife was of Irish nativity. She bore the maiden name of Sarah Parks and since the death of her husband has continued to live in Ohio. Of their three sons and one daughter Francis A. is the youngest child and the only one on the Pacific coast. He was born in Trumbull county, Ohio, November 5, 1859, and received the rudiments of his education in the country schools. The knowledge there secured was supplemented by study in the Grand River Institute at Austinsburg, Ashtabula county. While still a mere lad he had resolved to become a lawyer and in pursuit of this plan, in 1881, he took up the study of law under Judge Hunter of Warren, Ohio. Having completed the prescribed course of study and passed the stipulated examination, in October, 1883, he was admitted to the supreme court of Ohio.

On selecting a location for practice Mr. Fee first located in Syracuse, Otoe county, Neb., where he established himself shortly after his admission to the bar. From there in 1888 he came to California and opened an office in Madera, where he has since become known as an able attorney and counselor. During 1892-93 he took an active part in the county division contest and, with other leading citizens, helped to secure the organization of Madera county. At the special election of May, 1893, pursuant to the organization of the county, he was elected district attorney on the independent ticket by a majority of two hundred and twenty-two over his Democratic opponent. Immediately after his election he took the oath of office and entered upon its duties, which he filled with energy and dignity. At the next general election he was the Republican candidate, but suffered defeat by sixty votes. He has always been a staunch Republican and never fails to give his party the support of his ballot at local and general elections. Pronouncedly Republican as he is, he avoids any display of partisanship, but evinces instead the public spirit and progressive disposition of a loyal citizen. While he is not identified with any denomination, he aids in the maintenance of the Madera Presbyterian Church, with which his wife is identified. Mrs. Fee was formerly Miss Edith Howard and was born in Illinois, but in childhood accompanied her family to Otoe county, Neb., where she remained until after her marriage. The only child of the union is a daughter, Mamie. While making his home in Nebraska Mr. Fee was initiated into Masonry in Syracuse Lodge, F. & A. M., and since coming to California has affiliated with Madera Lodge No. 280, F. & A. M. In the social life of Madera he and his wife bear a prominent part, having by their culture and refinement attracted and retained the friendship of many of Madera's most respected citizens.

JOHN EDWARDS. Though not one of the earliest settlers of Tulare county, the fact that he has been identified with the business and agricultural interests of Visalia and the surrounding country since 1874 entitles Mr. Edwards to be classed among the pioneers of this portion of the San Joaquin valley. Since he was a boy of eight years he has made his home in the United States, but by birth and ancestry he is a Welshman. Montgomery, in North Wales, was his native shire, and August 15, 1832, the date of his birth, his parents being Maurice and Jane (Griffiths) Edwards, natives of the same shire. During 1840 the family crossed the ocean on a sailing vessel and landed in New York, from which city they journeyed westward to Ohio and settled in Delaware county. Notwithstanding his settlement in a strange land, where the language of the people and the character of the soil were unfamiliar to him, the father met with considerable success, and at the time of his death from cholera in 1864 he ranked among the most influential men of his community. In religion he was an active member of the Presbyterian Church. His wife also died on their Ohio farm.

In a family of four sons and three daughters, John Edwards was fourth in order of birth, and is one of the three sons living. Of all the family he alone has sought a home in California. When twenty years of age he took his first westward journey, halting in Illinois, where he secured work as head sawyer in a sawmill in Champaign. During his employment in that capacity the Civil war began, and in July of 1862 he left work to enlist in the Union service, being accepted as a private in Company B, Seventy-sixth Illinois Infantry. With his company and regiment he served under General Sherman and was present at Vicksburg, Jackson and Little Rock in decisive engagements fought at these places. At Jackson he was taken prisoner in July, 1864, and for two months was kept in captivity, but then was exchanged. In recognition of meritorious service he was promoted to be sergeant early in his army career, and served as such until he was mustered out at Galveston, Tex., in July, 1865. Returning north he was honorably discharged at Chicago.

Very shortly after the close of his army service Mr. Edwards removed from Illinois to Kansas and took up a soldier's homestead in Jackson county, where he cleared the land and inaugurated general farm pursuits. The ensuing years, however, did not bring him the results he desired, and accordingly in 1874 he disposed of his Kansas property and came to California, where he now occupies a two-acre homestead at No. 1010 West South street, Visalia. Here for twelve years he was engaged as foreman of a warehouse and later turned his attention to the cattle business, in which he still engages, owning eighty acres of pasture land north of Visalia. His first marriage was in Covington, Ind., and united him with Sophia Shofstall, who was born in Kentucky and died in Kansas. Three sons and a daughter were born of their union, of whom those living are W. H. Edwards, a cattle-raiser near Visalia, and Nancy Jane, wife of J. L. Daniels, of Reno, Nev. In Kansas, Mr. Edwards was united in marriage with Emily Jane Harvey, who died after their removal to California. Of this union one son is living, Joseph H., residing at Lemon Cove, this state. The present wife of Mr. Edwards, whom he met and married at Visalia, was Mrs. Martha A. Simpson, a native of the eastern part of Tennessee and a pioneer of 1856 in California, having crossed the plains in company with her father and husband. For a time they made their home in Butte county and later settled in Lake county, where her husband, Samuel V. Simpson, died upon a farm. As might be expected from an enthusiastic veteran, Mr. Edwards takes the deepest interest in the Grand Army of the Republic. Largely through the efforts of himself and other loyal ex-soldiers, in 1886 the post was organized at Visalia and of this organization, known as the Gen. George Wright Post, he has acted as commander since about 1892, meanwhile contributing of his time and means to its maintenance and enhancing its popularity by his effective leadership.

WILLIAM L. LOWREY. Among the representatives of old pioneer families who are maintaining high farming standards in Tulare county mention is due William L. Lowrey, who was born near where he now lives in the vicinity of Visalia, November 28, 1864, and who is now managing his mother's farm of sixty acres three miles northwest of town. His father, Eldon Lowrey, the establisher of the family on the coast, was born in Tennessee, and by occupation was a stock raiser and operator. Crossing the plains to California from Missouri in 1852, he located in Sonoma county and had a dairy and stock ranch there, but soon afterward removed to California and selected the farm upon which his death occurred June 10, 1904, aged seventy-four years. Delighted with the prospects of this section of the state, and pinning his financial faith to stock raising, he returned east by way of Panama, and in 1856 drove a herd of cattle across the plains, using them as the nucleus for extensive stock dealing on his farm north of Orosi. His wife, Elizabeth (Parsons) Lowrey, was born in Missouri, and became his helpmeet in the days of his struggle for a competence in that state. Of strong constitution and active mind, she survives him at the present time, and still makes her home on the ranch near Visalia. She has been the devoted mother of ten sons and three daughters, of whom five sons and one daughter are living.

The second youngest in his father's large family, William L. Lowrey was educated in the public schools and at the Visalia normal school, thereafter engaging in farming and stock raising in Fresno county for eight years. In 1902 he sold his farm in Fresno county and came to Tulare county, managing his mother's ranch, which is under stock and alfalfa. The farm is well improved, and evidences the care and industry of its original owner, and is equipped with practical agricultural implements. Mr. Lowrey succeeds at farming because he uses good judgment and likes his work, and because he is constantly looking for improved ways of taking advantage of his opportunities. For years he has been an active Democrat, and in 1902 was appointed assistant assessor of Fresno county, serving two years. He is devoted to his home and farm, and especially to the care and education of his three children, Jerald, Pearl and Dorothy. Mrs. Lowrey was formerly Maggie Rush, a native of Visalia, and to her economy and practical assistance her husband attributes much of his farming success. She is a daughter of Isaac Rush, an old settler of Tulare county.

ALFRED JOSEPH ARNAUDON. Distinguished as a leading citizen of Mendota, Alfred Joseph Arnaudon is also known far and wide as one of the most able and prosperous business men of Fresno county. A brief resumé of his life affords a forcible illustration of the self-made man, who began life at the foot of the ladder, and by his own strenuous efforts has steadily climbed the pathway of success, gaining an eminent position, socially and financially, among his fellow-men. He is actively identified with the mercantile, agricultural, and industrial prosperity of this part of the state, and is not only carrying on an extensive business as a dealer in general merchandise, hay and grain, but is proprietor of Arnaudon's hotel, in connection with which he has a large livery stable, and is an extensive land owner and stock raiser, as well. A native of France, he was born, October 14, 1853, in the department of Hautes-Alpes, where his parents, Joseph and Marie Arnaudon, spent their entire lives. He is the youngest child in a family consisting of three sons and six daughters born to his parents and of the three children now living, is the only one in America.

Born and reared on a farm, Alfred Joseph Arnaudon received a practical common school education in his native land, living at home until eighteen years old. Ambitious and energetic, he made up his mind to try life for himself in the new world. Accordingly, in 1872, he sailed from Havre on the steamer City of Paris, and fifteen days later landed in New York. Boarding a train, he started from there by rail for California, but being caught in a snowstorm while crossing the mountains was twenty-nine days en route. Arriving in San Francisco with just $20 in United States money in his pocket, Mr. Arnaudon, not a whit discouraged, began looking for employment, and the following six years worked in Remillard's brickyard, in San Rafael. Industrious, prudent and thrifty, he accumulated considerable money, and in 1878 located in Sunol, Alameda county, where, in partnership with his nephews, the Chaix boys, he embarked in sheep raising, having a large range in the Sunol foothills. Succeeding well in the venture, these partners subsequently bought a ranch in the valley, and continued their profitable business awhile longer. Later Mr. Arnaudon sold out his share of the ranch, and taking his part of the sheep to another ranch in the same county carried on stock-raising alone for three years. Removing to Fresno county, on the west side, in 1886, he established a sheep ranch, and at the same time embarked in mercantile pursuits, stocking a store at White Bridge with general merchandise, and running it successfully for eight years, serving meanwhile as assistant postmaster.

In 1894 Mr. Arnaudon built the block which he now owns and occupies in Mendota. It is eighty feet front, and contains two stores, and a large hotel, Arnaudon's, which he manages successfully, having a lucrative patronage. As a general merchant he has built up a large trade among the best people of the community, being an especially large dealer in hay and grain, as well as general goods, and from the livery which he manages in connection with his hotel he derives a good profit. From June 3, 1895, until the spring of 1900, Mr. Arnaudon was also the postmaster at Mendota. He is still interested in the sheep business, owning a ranch of forty-five hundred acres, lying three miles south of Mendota, where he keeps about five thousand sheep. He likewise owns a farm of one hundred and forty acres near Pleasanton, and on this he has a winery and a vineyard of twenty-five acres, while, about six miles east of Mendota, on the banks of the San Joaquin river, he has a small poultry, hay and vegetable ranch. Mr. Arnaudon has other property of value, owning a residence in the city of Fresno. In all of his undertakings Mr. Arnaudon has exercised good judgment and sound sense, and by wise forethought and prudent management has accumulated wealth.

In Mission San Jose, Mr. Arnaudon married Marie Arbios, who was born in France, in the department of Basses-Pyrenees, a daughter of John Arbios, who came with his family to California in 1876, settling first as a dairyman in San Rafael, but being now a resident of Pleasanton. Mr. and Mrs. Arnaudon have six children, namely: Emma (wife of R. Jury, of Palo Alto); Lucy, Cora, Adelta, Marie and Alfred J. Politically Mr. Arnaudon supports the principles of the Democratic party, and for many years served as school director. Fraternally he belongs to the Knights of Pythias.

JAMES FISHER. Prominent among the venerable and highly respected pioneers of Tulare county is James Fisher, living near Visalia, who, during his years of residence in this place, has witnessed its remarkable development, and in the work necessary for such an achievement has taken a conspicuous part. Since coming here in 1857 he has made an honorable record, by his means, enterprise and counsel assisting in the upbuilding of town and county, and by his energy and business management becoming an extensive landholder, and a most successful agriculturist. A son of Spencer Fisher, he was born, October 13, 1821, in Kaskaskia, Randolph county, Ill.

The son of one of Illinois' pioneer settlers, Spencer Fisher was born, lived and died in the Prairie state, being engaged, principally, in agricultural pursuits. He married Elizabeth Henderson, who was born near Little Rock, Ark., and died in Illinois. Of the five children born of their union but one, James, the youngest child, is now living. Brought up on the home farm, he obtained his early education in a subscription school, which was held in a log house chinked with mud, and having a puncheon floor and shake roof. On one of the slab benches, near the huge fireplace, he was taught to write with a quill pen, and under the instruction of his teacher made as good progress in the three "Rs" as his schoolmates. On attaining his majority he left the parental roof, going to Murphysboro, Jackson county, Ill., where he engaged in mercantile pursuits, boarding in the meantime at the hotel kept by Dr. Logan, father of Gen. John A. Logan, one of the heroes of the Civil war. At the end of two years Mr. Fisher located in Shreveport, La., where for a time he ran a ferry boat for a Mr. Douglas. Returning from there to his native state he was employed as a clerk in Chester, Randolph county, until 1855. Desirous of a decided change of location and occupation, Mr. Fisher started for the extreme west. With horses and wagons he left Council Bluffs in April, 1855, and followed the old Mormon trail across the plains to California, arriving in Millerton in the fall, having journeyed for six weary months. Taking a contract to cut two million feet of saw logs for Alexander Ball, Mr. Fisher completed the task, after which he contracted to build three miles of road down the mountains from Ball's Mill. He subsequently bought from Mr. Ball several yoke of oxen, and engaged in hauling lumber from the mill to Millerton and other places. Locating in Visalia in the spring of 1857, Mr. Fisher continued freighting for a year and a half. Using six yoke of oxen, he made a specialty of hauling lumber from mills to the markets, taking three thousand feet at a load, and being five days in making the round trip, receiving $30 a thousand for his work.

In the fall of 1858 Mr. Fisher went to Sonora, Mexico, where he bought a herd of branded cattle, which he drove to Antelope valley, Tulare county, Cal., where he disposed of them at a good price, making money in his venture. Purchasing in 1860 two hundred acres of land from R. L. Howison, Mr. Fisher began the improvement of his present home farm, which is now in its appointments one of the best in this locality. In addition to general farming, he made a specialty of stock-raising, until the enforcement of the fence law, having at times as many as twenty thousand sheep. As his money accumulated he judiciously invested it in land, becoming one of the largest real estate owners in the county. Within three and one-half miles of Visalia, to the northeast, he has thirteen hundred acres, in sections 11, 12, 14 and 15, all of which is under irrigation, being watered partly by Elbow creek and the St. John's river and its canals, the farm being known as Oaklawn ranch, and devoted to the raising of grain and alfalfa. He also owns a stock farm of ten hundred and twenty acres, lying four miles north of Oaklawn ranch; a ranch of eight hundred acres at Taurasa, two miles north of Oaklawn; and a large ranch of twelve hundred acres, lying seven miles east of Oaklawn, which he gave to his son, William Lee Fisher, for a stock farm. Mr. Fisher was interested in the building of the Witch Chimney canal, which irrigates a large part of his home ranch, and has been a promoter of many other beneficial enterprises. He has been especially successful as a stockman, raising draft horses and mules, and owns many valuable cattle.

In 1860, on his home farm Mr. Fisher married Mary E. Howison, who was born in Louisiana, a daughter of R. L. Howison, an early pioneer of Visalia. Three children were born of the union of Mr. and Mrs. Fisher, namely: The late Mrs. Alice Markham, who died in Visalia; Mrs. Fannie Bodden, of Visalia; and William L., who assists his father in the management of his farms and property. In 1875 Mr. Fisher built his present commodious residence, which, with its pleasant environments, is one of the most attractive in the neighborhood. Politically Mr. Fisher is a straightforward Democrat, ever loyal to the interests of his party.

LEWIS LINCOLN CORY. A man of literary and scholastic attainments, possessing a vigorous mentality and a well-trained mind, Lewis Lincoln Cory holds an assured position among the leading attorneys of Fresno, his legal ability and knowledge being recognized and appreciated. A son of the late Dr. Benjamin Cory, he was born, May 4, 1861, in San Jose, where his earlier years were spent.

The descendant of a New Jersey family of prominence, Benjamin Cory was born and bred in Oxford, Ohio. With a natural aptitude for learning, he was given excellent educational advantages, and after receiving the degree of A. B. at the Miami University was graduated from the Cincinnati Medical College with the degree of M. D. Migrating to California in 1848, Dr. Cory settled in San Jose, then the capital of the state, becoming the first American physician to locate in the Santa Clara valley. He took a prominent part in local affairs, being active in the capital fight, and was influential in advancing the industrial, social and business growth and prosperity of city and county, being the first person to set out a vineyard for commercial purposes. For a number of years he served as county physician, and until his death, in 1899, at the age of seventy-three years, was the leading physician of Santa Clara county. In his professional career, the doctor traveled extensively through the valley and mountains, his practice extending to Santa Cruz and Monterey. Dr. Cory married Sarah Braly, who was born in Missouri, near St. Louis, a daughter of Rev. John Braly. With his family, Mr. Braly came westward to Oregon, being at Whitman station just prior to the massacre. From there he came to California, locating near Santa Clara, where he improved a farm, on which he brought up his family. He also continued his ministerial labors in the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, being the first Presbyterian minister of this part of the state, until his death, at the age of seventy-three years. He married a Miss Hyde, who was of English descent. Of the union of Dr. and Mrs.

Cory, eight children were born, Lewis L., the subject of this sketch, being the fourth child in order of birth.

After completing the course of study in the grammar and high schools of San Jose, Lewis Lincoln Cory fitted himself for college at the University of the Pacific, after which he attended Rutgers College, at New Brunswick, N. J., for two years. In 1879 he entered the junior class of Princeton University, from which he was graduated with the degree of A. B. in 1881. Becoming a student then in the Columbia Law School, he studied there for two years, when he was graduated with the degree of LL. B. Being admitted to the bar in New York in 1883, Mr. Cory began the practice of his profession in that city, for two years being in the office of Judge William Fullerton. Returning to California in 1885, he practiced law in San Jose until 1886, when he opened an office in Fresno, where he has since been located. As a general practitioner, he has built up an extensive and lucrative clientage. Making a specialty of civil law, Mr. Cory has been associated with some very important land cases, and is now attorney for the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, the First National Bank, the Street Railway Company, the Water Company, and the Electric Light Company. Well versed in legal lore, wise and firm in his decisions, Mr. Cory inspires people with the greatest confidence in his judgment and uprightness, and is highly respected alike by his brother members of the bar, and by all with whom he is brought in contact, either in a business or a social way.

In New York City, Mr. Cory married Caroline A. Martin, a native of Rahway, N. J., and they are the parents of five children, namely: Edith M., attending the Leland Stanford, Jr., University, being a member of the class of 1907; Catherine H., a student in the Fresno high school; Margaret E.; Martin and Benjamin. Politically Mr. Cory is a steadfast Republican, and socially he belongs to Delta Upsilon Fraternity of Rutgers College. He is also a member of the Fresno County Bar Association.

RALEIGH E. RHODES. Through the inheritance of exceptional ability from his father and grandfather, both of whom were attorneys of prominence, and through the diligent cultivation of his talents, Raleigh E. Rhodes has gained a reputation as one of the leading lawyers of Madera county. In the field of criminal law he has met with especial success. His pre-eminence as a criminal lawyer has been established by his skilled management of numerous important suits, notably the Lawson, Rockwell and Derby murder trials, also the Fornier case, the most bitterly contested of any ever tried in the county. As attorney for the Valley Railroad when projected through Fresno, he successfully fought the condemnation suits in behalf of the railway.

The family genealogy is traced to Major Joseph T. Rhodes, an officer in the Revolutionary war under General Washington. The grandfather, Col. E. A. Rhodes, a native of North Carolina, became an influential attorney and served as United States consul to Texas stationed at Galveston. In the family of Colonel Rhodes was a son, William H., who was born in Windsor, N. C., in 1822, and was orphaned by his mother's death when he was a child of six years. After his preliminary education he was sent to Princeton, N. J., where he was a student in the university. Upon the appointment of his father as consul at Galveston he joined him in that city, where he continued his classical studies. In 1844 he matriculated in the Harvard Law School, and at the expiration of his term returned to Texas, where he was honored with the office of probate judge. After a brief sojourn in New York at the conclusion of his service as jurist, he took up the practice of law in Windsor, N. C., and remained there until he heard of the discovery of gold in California. In 1850 he came to San Francisco, where he was a member of the vigilance committee of 1856 and one of the most prominent lawyers of his day. During those times he was editor and part owner of the True Californian, for which he prepared some very able editorials and literary articles. As a brilliant writer, he won a reputation on the coast. He was a man of classical education and intellectual attainments, and his writings, judged by the standard of both that day and this, possess great literary merit. In literature he had a fondness for the Jules Verne style of writing. He delighted in scientific fiction and acquired prominence by several imaginative articles of that kind which came from his pen. Socially he was popular and prominent, a genial companion, a prominent Knight Templar Mason, and one of the founders of the Bohemian Club of San Francisco. In that city his death occurred April 14, 1876. His wife, who was Susan M. McDermott, was born in England, but at an early age came to Oroville, Cal., where she had a brother in business; she survived her husband a great many years, dying in 1901 in San Francisco.

Next to the youngest of four sons, Raleigh E. Rhodes was born in San Francisco October 1, 1868. After completing the studies of local schools he entered the law office of Colonel Flournoy and later for six years was with Naphtaly, Freidenrich & Ackerman, of San Francisco, one of the leading firms of attorneys on the coast. After two years of study in the Hastings Law School, in 1889 he was admitted to the Supreme Court of California. For several years he continued in his native city, but in 1893 came to Madera. Three years later he formed a partnership with H. H. Welsh, and opened an office in Fresno, but after three years came back to Madera, where he has since conducted a general law practice. During his residence in Fresno he became actively connected with the Fresno County Bar Association. The Democratic party receives his ballot and influence, and in 1902 he was his party's nominee for district attorney, but was defeated by R. R. Fowler. As an attorney his ability is unquestioned. The high principles of honor which have guided him in the conduct of his practice justly bring him the confidence of associates and acquaintances and give him a high rank among the attorneys of Madera. Socially he is popular, and fraternally holds membership with Yosemite Parlor No. 130, N. S. G. W. His marriage took place in Berkeley, and united him with Lillian Welton, who was born in New York City and is a graduate of the Berkeley high school. To this marriage three children were born: Welton, Marjorie and Beatrice. The family of which she is a member has not been without influence in the east, and to her grandfather, former United States Senator Thomas Morris, of Ohio, belonged the distinction of having appointed Ulysses S. Grant to the West Point Academy.

STRUDWICK SLEDGE. As chairman of the board of supervisors of Madera county, Cal., Strudwick Sledge ranks among the most prominent ranchers of that section. Born March 30, 1865, in Alabama, he was taken to the Golden state by his parents at the age of three years. Reared on his father's farm, he attended the public schools of Fresno (now Madera) county, and he then became a student at the San Jose Business College, where he took a complete commercial course. He has followed farming all his life. In 1903 he was elected to the office of supervisor of the First District on the Democratic ticket, and upon the organization of that body he was selected chairman. In addition to his extensive business interests, Mr. Sledge has ample time to attend to social duties to some extent, and affiliates with the Masonic and the Ancient Order of United Workmen lodges.

In tracing the ancestry of Mr. Sledge, we find him to be a descendant of an old southern family. His father, L. A. Sledge, was a native of Alabama, born April 3, 1823, and in that state he was united in marriage with Martha Strudwick. He was one of the founders of the Alabama settlement in Madera county, Cal., then a part of Fresno county. This colony was organized to form a settlement in 1868; they purchased about twenty thousand acres of land in the vicinity of Madera from the Chapman estate. But the colony proved to be a failure and Mr. Sledge returned east in 1875; a couple of years later he again came west and the balance of his life was spent in California. He engaged in sheep raising, meeting with varied success, and became one of the prominent stockmen in the San Joaquin valley. At the time of his death, July 3, 1896, he left a valuable estate, about eight hundred acres, which is now included in the home ranch.

Four children blessed the home of Mr. and Mrs. Sledge, namely: Sallie, Winnie, Levin L. and Strudwick. Since the death of the father these children, with the widowed mother, have continued to reside on the home place. This ranch is located five and one-half miles southwest of Madera and is devoted to the raising of alfalfa, grain, vineyards and stock. In addition to attending these broad acres, the brothers rent about eighteen hundred acres of additional land, and upon the latter they carry on grain raising on a large scale.

PROF. GILES N. FREMAN. As superintendent of the schools of Fresno county Prof. G. N. Freman, of Fresno, occupies a leading position among the prominent educators of this part of the country, his superior talents and scholarly attainments eminently qualifying him for his important work. Cultured and capable, possessing great force of character and executive ability, he has been a potent factor in bringing the school system to a high point of excellence, offering to the young, irrespective of sex, educational advantages worthy of consideration and commendation. A native of Missouri, he was born March 12, 1838, in Daviess county, where his father, John W. Freman, was a man of prominence and influence. His paternal grandfather was born in North Carolina, of Scotch-English ancestry. He served in the war of 1812 as a gallant soldier, and afterward settled in Kentucky as a pioneer farmer.

Born on the Kentucky homestead John W. Freman obtained a superior education for the times, and for many years was an educator of some note, and a successful agriculturist. Removing from his native state to Missouri, he took up land in Daviess and Buchanan counties, and there cleared and improved a farm, on which he resided until 1845, at which time he removed to Iowa, where he died the same year. For a number of years after settling in Buchanan county he taught school, and for one term served as sheriff. He was active in public affairs, and was a member of the Missouri troops that assisted in driving the Mormons from the territory. He was a strong Democrat in politics, and a member of the Baptist Church. He married Mrs. Massey E. (Parman) Black, who was born in North Carolina and died in Iowa. Of their union four children were born, namely: Giles N., the subject of this sketch; Phoebe A., deceased; Eliza, the widow of George C. Grimes, of Fresno; and John W., of Woodland, Cal.

After obtaining the rudiments of his education in the public schools of Missouri, G. N. Freman removed with the family to Iowa, where he continued his school life, between terms working on the farm. Subsequently he served an apprenticeship at the printer's trade in Sidney, Fremont county, Iowa. Going to Nebraska City, Neb., in 1856, he was for a year connected with the Nebraska City News, then edited by J. Sterling Morton. Returning to Iowa in 1857, Mr. Freman entered Mount Pleasant Seminary, at Mount Pleasant, from which he was graduated in 1862. Beginning then his career as an educator, Professor Freman taught school in Fremont county, Iowa, in the public schools of Warren and Adams counties, Ill., and was afterward principal of the preparatory department and professor of natural sciences in Abingdon College, at Abingdon, Ill. Resigning the position in 1864 he came to California, journeying across the plains with mules and being three months on the way, leaving Illinois May 16 and arriving in Woodland, Cal., August 20. At Deep creek and at Green river, the party with which he traveled had encounters with the Indians, but sustained no serious loss.

The following year Professor Freman was principal of the Woodland schools, and the ensuing six years was a member of the faculty of Hesperian College. In 1871 he was elected superintendent of the schools of Yolo county, and in 1873 was re-elected to the same position, and served efficiently for another term of two years. Going to Arizona in 1875, he was superintendent of the Stonewall Jackson mine, in the Globe district, for two years, and then gave up the work on account of the hostility of the Indians, who killed several of his men. Returning to California, he was engaged in mercantile pursuits in Capay for awhile, and was afterward employed in the raising of fruit in Vacaville for two years, having a fine orchard and vineyard. Locating in Fresno in 1887, Professor Freman bought forty acres of land near Fowler, and started a vineyard and orchard. He has since purchased additional land, and is now owner of eighty acres, devoted to orchard, in which he raises peaches, figs and nectarines. He has had excellent success as a horticulturist, making a specialty of the culture of Calymrna figs and peaches. In 1893 he resumed his professional labors, serving as principal of the Washington Colony school of Fresno county. He was subsequently employed in horticultural pursuits on his ranch. He served for a year as deputy county superintendent of schools under Thomas J. Kirk. In December, 1901, Professor Freman was appointed by the board of supervisors as county superintendent of the schools of Fresno county to fill a vacancy. In 1902 he was the Republican nominee for the same office, and was elected by a good majority for a term of four years, being also ex-officio secretary of the Board of Education of Fresno county. He is an active member of the State Teachers' Association; of the California Raisin Growers' Association; and of the State Horticultural Society. His orchard is advantageously located about three miles northwest of Fowler, and about eight miles from Fresno.

In Fremont, Ill., March 16, 1863, Professor Freman married Mollie T. Martin, who was born in Dade county, Mo., of which her father, John E. Martin, a native of Virginia, was a pioneer settler. She died in 1883, leaving three children. G. C., a well-known attorney of Fresno, was graduated from the Hastings Law School with the degree of LL. B.; F. Harold, for some months a reporter for the New York Journal, of New York City, is now paying teller in the cashier's department of that paper; and Frank F. is superintendent of the home ranch. Professor Freman was married a second time, October 17, 1887, Sarah A. DeBell, a native of Grayson, Ky., and a daughter of Alfred DeBell, becoming his wife. Mrs. Freman, the second of a family of four children, of whom two are living, is a well educated woman, and while in Illinois was engaged in educational work. In 1884 she came to California and was here similarly employed until her marriage. As deputy county superintendent of the Fresno county schools, Mrs. Freman greatly assists her husband in his work, taking charge of the office, as much of his time is necessarily spent in visiting schools, his territory extending one hundred and fifty miles from east to west. Politically Professor Freman is a Republican, and fraternally he is a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen, and since 1864 has been a consistent member of the Christian Church.

HON. GEORGE STOCKTON BERRY.

For over a quarter of a century G. S. Berry has been one of the prominent citizens of Tulare county. During these years he has been active in public affairs and has at all times been willing to give his attention to any movement which in his estimation would prove a benefit to his state or county. Such men are the makers of history and are accorded a place in the annals of California.

Born in Cooper county, Mo., October 11, 1847, G. S. Berry is a son of John and Josephine (Jones) Berry. The father was an early settler in California, crossing the plains from Missouri in 1857. He first settled at Lodi, where he engaged in farming, but later removed to Placerville, Eldorado county, where he followed mining until 1874. In that year he removed to Tulare county, where he engaged in farming and where he lived the remainder of his life, although he died in San Jose at the age of seventy-two years. His wife is still living, making her home at Campbell, Santa Clara county. By her union with Mr. Berry the following children were born: Martha, now Mrs. Wilson of Campbell; Dr. John, of Los Angeles; William, of Lindsay; Laura, now Mrs. Sears of Wrights; Robert, of Lindsay, and George S.

The last named was ten years of age when his parents crossed the plains, and his education was obtained in the public schools of Placerville. He first engaged in farming near Modesto with his father and while there he married, in Tuolumne City, June 2, 1868, Margaret Griffin, who was born in Lincoln county, Mo., and is a daughter of Joel Griffin, a native of North Carolina and an early settler in Lincoln county. In 1857 Mr. Griffin and his family crossed the plains to California. Ox teams were used for transportation purposes and six months were required for the completion of the journey. While en route the party was twice attacked by the Indians, but only one man in the train was killed. Mr. Griffin first settled at what is called The Five-Mile House, where he followed farming until his removal to Tuolumne City, near which place he engaged in farming and stock-raising. Later he retired from active pursuits, and taking up his residence in Oakland, died there at the age of eighty-four years. His wife, Frances Smith, died in Oakland at the age of seventy-two years. She became the mother of six children, four of whom are living, as follows: Joel, who resides near Modesto; Frances, now Mrs. C. C. Baker of Fruitvale; Margaret, Mrs. Berry; and Jennie, now Mrs. Woolery of Portland, Ore.

In 1874 Mr. and Mrs. Berry took up their residence in what was then called Tulare county but is now Grangeville, Kings county. Here Mr. Berry engaged in grain farming until 1875, when he purchased two thousand acres of railroad land, adjoining that on which the town of Lindsay is now located. Here he conducted an extensive grain-raising business for several years, but later disposed of a large portion of his land and is now living on a ranch of one hundred and sixty acres, one and a half miles east of Lindsay. Twenty acres are devoted to oranges and about fifty to a vineyard. He is also engaged in farming and stock-raising in the state of Nevada.

Of the union of Mr. and Mrs. Berry four children have been born: Lillie, now Mrs. Charles Rankin of Deer Creek; Lettie, who became the wife of Forrest Lyons and died in San Francisco; Mrs. M. Osborne, of Stockton; and Arthur, who lives at home and is engaged in business with his father. On November 14, 1900, he married Sena Jobe, who was born in Tulare county, a daughter of H. H. Jobe.

Mr. Berry is one of the leading Democrats in Tulare county and has been active in public affairs. He served one term in the assembly and so well pleased were his constituents with his record that in 1891 they elected him to the state senate. Here as in the lower house he labored earnestly for the welfare of those who had placed him in this responsible position. Fraternally he is a member of the Knights of Pythias and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, in both of which bodies he is an active worker. Mr. Berry has made a success of life by being ready to improve his opportunities, and the position he has attained is the result of his own efforts. Since early manhood he has made his own way in the world and he deservedly ranks among the self-made men. Mr. Berry was the patentee and manufacturer of the first steam thresher and harvester combined, used in the San Joaquin valley; this machine had a forty-foot cut, being the only successful machine of that kind ever manufactured, a forty horse-power engine required to operate the machine.

DAVID FRANKLIN EDWARDS. The earliest recollections of Mr. Edwards are associated with California, for he was a child of only three years when the family came to the Pacific coast in 1849. In his ancestry he is of remote English extraction and of Irish parentage. His grandfather, Patrick Edwards, who was the son of an Englishman, brought his family from Ireland to America and settled in Oswego county, N. Y., where he cleared a tract of raw land. At the time of crossing the ocean his son, John, was perhaps fifteen years of age, but in a short time he became familiar with American institutions and as loyal to the government as any of its native-born sons. This patriotic spirit was proved through his enlistment in the United States army during the Seminole war and also through his service in the war with Mexico. It was his service in the latter struggle that caused him to become familiar with the plains and the western country. In 1849 he brought his family via Cape Horn to San Diego, they remaining in that city while he went with his regiment to Colorado, crossing the plains via Yuma to fight the Apaches, the most savage of all Indian tribes. At the expiration of his term of enlistment as a soldier, in 1851, he returned to San Diego and from there brought the family to San Francisco, thence to Tuolumne county, where he engaged in mining. On relinquishing that occupation, in 1876 he came to what is now Madera (then Fresno) county and here he lived retired until his death at the age of eighty-three years. His wife, who bore the maiden name of Emeline Metcalf, was born in New Hampshire and died in California; her father, David Metcalf, a native of New Hampshire, was one of the first settlers of Oswego county, N. Y., and followed the shoe-makers trade there during much of his active life.

In the family of John and Emeline Edwards there were six children, namely: Mary R., who died in girlhood; David Franklin, of Madera; Sarah, who died in Tuolumne county; John G., of Madera, whose sketch appears on another page; Mrs. Lizzie Hope, of Madera county; and James H., who is engaged with his oldest brother as a blacksmith. David F. Edwards was born at North Hannibal, Oswego county, N. Y., April 20, 1846, and was three years of age when the family came to this section of the country. His earliest recollections are of passing through Stockton en route to Tuolumne county. When a young man he began to learn the trade of blacksmith at Knights Ferry, Stanislaus county, and worked as an apprentice for four years. In 1874 he opened a blacksmith's shop at Borden (now in Madera county), and remained there for two years. On coming to Madera in 1876, he bought a shop and began to work as a blacksmith. His place of business was in 1880 moved to his present location on Yosemite street. Renting his shop in 1883, he returned to Knights Ferry and conducted a similar business there, remaining for seven years. When he came back to Madera in 1890 he took his old shop, but the following year was burned out, and so rebuilt, having now a shop 54x50 feet in dimensions, and carrying on a general blacksmithing and repair business.

By his marriage to Eleanor Watson, a native of Pennsylvania and a resident of Stockton in girlhood, Mr. Edwards has six children, John F., Gertrude, Elsie, Percy, Ellis and Eleanor, all of whom are at home. The family attends the First Presbyterian Church of Madera, in which Mr. Edwards is a ruling elder. Politically a Republican, he has served as a member of the county central committee of his party both in this and Stanislaus counties. Fraternally he is connected with the Ancient Order of United Workmen, in which he is past master workman; Madera Lodge No. 134, K. of P., in which he is past chancellor; and Summit Lodge No. 112, F. & A. M., in which he is past master and served as worshipful master for four years. His Masonic relations began when he was made a Mason in Fresno Lodge No. 274, F. & A. M., and ever since then he has been a believer in the principles of the fraternity. With his wife he holds membership in the Eastern Star. His brother and partner, J. H. Edwards, was born in Tuolumne county, this state, in 1858, and during the years of youth learned the blacksmith's trade at Borden, afterward following the same in the employ of others for some years. Coming to Madera in 1882, he has since been in business and is now the company in the firm of D. F. Edwards & Co. Fraternaly he is associated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, being past grand of the Madera Lodge and a member of the Encampment at Fresno.

JOHN W. SHORT. Through his association with the city of Fresno, which began in May of 1881, Mr. Short has been an influential factor in its growth and progress. The occupation upon which he entered, that of journalism, was one offering the greatest opportunities to a public-spirited man desirous of promoting the welfare of his city and county. In other capacities he was also a contributor to local movements, notably through his service as vice-president of the Chamber of Commerce, which position he has held from the time of its organization. The Republican party, of which he has always been an intelligent champion, recognized his services in its behalf by securing his appointment to the office of postmaster, his first appointment to the position dating June 12, 1898, under the administration of President McKinley. Under President Roosevelt, December 22, 1902, he was again appointed to the office, which he continues to fill in a manner satisfactory to the citizens, irrespective of political faith.

In Shelby county, Mo., near Shelbyville, Mr. Short was born October 8, 1858, being a brother of Frank H. Short, in whose sketch the family record will be found. In 1869 he accompanied the family to Hastings, Neb., which was then beyond the confines of civilization. As a boy he endured all the hardships incident to life upon the frontier. However, he was not entirely deprived of advantages, for he was sent to the public school at Papillion, Sarpy county, for two years, and there laid the foundation of the broad education subsequently gained through reading and observation. His education in the printing business began at the age of fourteen years, when he entered the office of the Sarpy County Sentinel. A year later he went with the Papillion Times, where he worked his way up from the lowly position of "devil." Returning to Hastings, he was employed on the Hastings Journal for several years, first as a type-setter, then as a reporter and assistant editor.

Leaving Nebraska for California in 1881, on his arrival in Fresno Mr. Short secured employment as a compositor on the Fresno Republican. A year later he became the editor of the paper, in which capacity he continued for years, meanwhile becoming owner of a half interest in the plant, his partner being J. W. Shanklin. Together they established the Daily Republican, the first morning paper published in the city. After twelve years the paper was sold and Mr. Short then traveled through California in search of an attractive location, but, failing to find a place that suited him as well as Fresno, he returned to this city. Shortly afterward he assisted in organizing the Republican Publishing Company, of which he was vice-president and a director, and which he promoted through his successful editorial work on the paper. He identified himself with the California Press Association and gained many friends among the leading journalists of the state. With his brother Frank II. he erected the Short building, a three-story structure on J street. For some years he served as a member of the Fresno Board of Education, in which position he contributed effectively to the promotion of the welfare of the city schools and the elevation of the standard of scholarship. Another position in which he has rendered valuable service is that of member of the board of library trustees.

The marriage of Mr. Short united him with Miss Jessie Francis and was solemnized in Calistoga, Napa county, Cal. Mrs. Short was born at Silver Mountain, Sierra county, Cal., whither her father, James Francis, had come from Wisconsin during the memorable year 1849. Born of this union are three children: Jamie V., Margaret and John Douglas.

SAMUEL J. SAMELSON. As manager of the J. K. Armsby Company, packers and shippers of dried fruits, nuts, honey, etc., Samuel J. Samelson is discharging the duties incumbent upon him in a manner calculated to win the commendation of all with whom he comes in business contact. A man of energy and ability, possessed of quick and unerring judgment, he has made his influence felt in the business circles of Visalia and has risen rapidly to his present position of prominence, while a bright and promising future is assured him through his past work. Born in Austin, Nev., November 30, 1865, he is a son of Samuel Samelson, a native of New York state.

Samuel Samelson was an instrumental musician and was a leader of an orchestra for many years. The greater part of his life was spent in New York state, but in 1890 he came to California and locating in Fresno county, bought a vineyard ten miles southwest of the city of Fresno, where he still makes his home. His wife, formerly Alice Prior, a native of New Zealand, is also living. They became the parents of two sons and one daughter, the latter of whom is now deceased. The oldest of this family, Samuel J. Samelson received his education in the public schools and high school of Poughkeepsie, N. Y. He was then apprenticed to learn the trade of print cutter for wall-paper designing, etc. He came to California in 1890 with his parents, and four years later engaged in the fruit-packing business with the Griffin-Skelley Company. He continued in this employment for one year, when he was made superintendent of the Producers' Packing Company, of Fresno. Following this he accepted, in 1896, the position of buyer with the Fresno Home Packing Company and manager of the Selma branch through season, remaining so engaged for eight years. In June, 1902, he became identified with the J. K. Armsby Company as local manager of the Visalia branch packing house, which handles peaches, prunes and all dried fruits. Since his assumption of these duties Mr. Samelson has remodeled the packing house, which now has a capacity of two thousand cases per day, during a season of from three to five months, and employs sixty-five people.

In fraternal associations Mr. Samelson is identified with the Woodmen of the World and Heralds of Liberty. Politically he is a staunch adherent of the principles advocated in the platform of the Republican party.

F. R. MEILIKE. Numbered among the German-American citizens whose thrift and energy have contributed to the advancement of California is Mr. Meilike, member of the firm of Wehrmann & Meilike, and a leading business man of Madera. He was born in the province of Brandenburg, Prussia, Germany, February 12, 1858, being a son of Gustav and Theresa (Luther) Meilike, natives of the same province and members of families of agriculturists. His great-grandfather removed from the interior of Germany to Brandenburg, where he helped to build a large dam and was in other ways connected with local enterprises. The father and mother are deceased, the former having been accidentally drowned. Of their six living children (all in America), the subject of this narrative was third in order of birth and is the only one in California. Following the usual German custom, he was kept in school until fourteen and then apprenticed to a trade. For three years he served under a locksmith and at the expiration of his time traveled as a journeyman through different parts of Germany.

Coming to America in 1880, Mr. Meilike secured employment on a farm in Mitchell county, Iowa, but later removed to Milwaukee, Wis., where he was employed as a machinist in Bayliss iron works. After a short time he went to Menominee, Mich., and secured employment in a sawmill. From there he went south to Arkansas and Missouri, and next worked as a machinist in Kansas City and at Rosedale, Kans. After a short time in the Santa Fe shops at Topeka, Kans., he became a blacksmith in the Silver iron works at Salt Lake City, and in 1882 settled in California, where he was first engaged in the Southern Pacific Railroad shops at Sacramento. Then from the Union iron works in San Francisco he went to Seattle, Wash., and secured work in a sawmill. On his return to California, January, 1884, he came to Madera county and for four years worked on Mr. Mordecai's ranch, after which he took up land and engaged in teaming. In 1890 he secured employment as a clerk with Rosenthal & Kutner, at Madera, and for nine years remained in their mercantile establishment, leaving in 1899 to embark in business for himself under the firm title of Wehrmann & Meilike. The firm owns the site and the building, the latter having been erected in 1899 and increased in size by the building of a brick structure adjoining in 1903, so that the space utilized is now 50 x 150 feet in dimensions. The stock is varied, including groceries, house furnishing goods, queensware, bakery goods, flour and feed. An excellent business has been established among the residents of Madera and the surrounding country, and the reputation of the firm is unexcelled for accuracy in all business transactions.

The Madera Board of Trade is one of the local organizations to which Mr. Meilike gives his support as a member. Fraternally he is connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Ancient Order of United Workmen. In religion he adheres to the Lutheran faith, and politically votes for the men and measures of the Democratic party. Since coming to Madera he has established a home of his own. His wife was formerly Marie Birch, a native of Germany. Three children have been born of their union, namely: George R., who died at the age of three months; Carl William and Louise Birch, who are being educated in local schools and trained for positions of usefulness and honor in the world.

CHARLES ALLISON TELFER. Through his connection with the Fresno Canal & Irrigation Company as its secretary and manager, Mr. Telfer is intimately associated with an organization that has proved of distinct and permanent value to the material development of Fresno and vicinity. His connection with this enterprise dates from October 1, 1903, when he was tendered the position of manager, together with the office of secretary of the company, the oldest of its kind in this region. Within the limits of the company's three hundred miles of canals are embraced three large systems, namely: Church, Gould and Enterprise. The canal has its source in Kings river and is being gradually enlarged from time to time, in order to meet the needs of landowners in this community.

A native of Liverpool, Queens county, Nova Scotia, Charles Allison Telfer is a son of Richard H. and Martha (Freeman) Telfer, also natives of Nova Scotia. The paternal grandfather, Richard Telfer, was born and reared in Edinburgh, Scotland, and after crossing the Atlantic settled near Liverpool, Nova Scotia, where he cleared a tract of timbered land and improved a farm, besides working as a contractor and builder. In religion he was an adherent of the Baptist Church. The maternal grandfather, George Freeman, was a native of Massachusetts, where his ancestors were established in a very early day. After his removal to Nova Scotia he conducted farm pursuits. Taking up the trade of a millwright, Richard H. Telfer engaged in building and operating sawmills and conducted a large business in lumber manufacturing on Point Medway and Liverpool river. Both he and his wife are living, still occupying the family homestead near Liverpool. Of their five children (all of whom survive) the eldest, Charles Allison Telfer was born August 4, 1860, and received such advantages as local schools afforded. Under his father's training he early acquired considerable knowledge of lumbering and farming. In June of 1881 he came to the United States, being first employed as foreman in the cotton mills at Ipswich, Mass., after which he engaged in the grocery business at Beverly in the same state. January, 1880, he came to California and has since made Fresno his home. In October following his arrival in this city he entered the Fresno National Bank as a bookkeeper, from which position in 1892 he was transferred to that of assistant cashier. Upon the death of J. B. Smith he was elected cashier and continued in that capacity until February 1, 1903, when he resigned, afterward engaging in the construction and building of irrigation canals until he entered upon the duties of his present post.

By his marriage to Evoline Bennett, who was born and reared in Beverly, Mass., Mr. Telfer has two children, Abbie and Girard. Politically he votes with the Republican party in local and general elections. On the organization of the Woodmen of the World he became one of its charter members and has since been interested in the growth and activities of the fraternity, in addition to which he is connected with the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks. In the Fresno Chamber of Commerce he holds the office of vice-president and is further identified with its work through his membership on the executive committee. Prominent in business circles, a recognized authority in financial matters, resourceful and efficient in the management of the canal company's affairs, he is a leading factor in the business circles of Fresno and wields an influence as potent as it is permanent.

RICHARD HUBBARD STEVENS. The family represented by the late R. H. Stevens of Visalia was among the earliest to settle in New England, where several successive generations lived and labored. Thoroughly loyal to the locality where destiny had placed them, they showed no desire to drift into the outside world until the middle of the nineteenth century, after which they became scattered into various parts of the United States, retaining in every locality the honorable traits characteristic of them in the old state of Vermont. The twelve children of Solomon Stevens sought homes and fortunes in various places, but he was content to pass his entire life in his native town of Barnet, Caledonia county, Vt., where he worked as a tanner and currier in early manhood, and then conducted a saddlery business in addition to owning and superintending farm land. His wife, Sallie, who was also a life-long resident of Vermont, was a daughter of Clark Cushman, and descended from Robert Cushman, one of the passengers of the historic Mayflower.

The youngest among the children of Solomon Stevens was Richard Hubbard Stevens, who was born in Barnet, Vt., April 30, 1841, and received an academic education at St. Johnsbury. For three years he was employed as a clerk in a brother's store in Lacon, Ill., but returned to Vermont to take charge of the property and business of another brother who went to the front with the Green Mountain boys in the Civil war. In 1863 he came to California and after some years of following various pursuits, but meeting with success in none, he came to Tulare county in the fall of 1869, seeking employment in any capacity that offered. At Visalia he secured a clerkship with Douglas & Co., and in 1871 purchased a one-fourth interest in the store. Later, the firm meeting with reverses, he purchased an additional interest, and in 1885 became sole owner of the store. The following year he took into partnership Abraham Hamerslag and the two remained together until 1891, when Mr. Stevens sold his interest and retired. During his connection with the establishment it had developed from a small country store to an important enterprise, with a large and valuable stock, and occupying commodious quarters. The successful development of the business was due largely to his capable business methods and untiring energy.

The first substantial business block erected in Visalia was built by Mr. Stevens, who with a firm faith in the future of the city believed that its prosperity could be promoted by the development of its business property. In addition he erected one of the finest residences of which the town boasts and devoted considerable attention to the grounds surrounding the house, thus adding greatly to the beauty of the homestead. At different times he acquired a number of ranches in Tulare county, some of which were utilized for the raising of horses. In disposition he was charitable, large-hearted and kind to those in distress, and his genial and whole-souled qualities caused him to become known as "Uncle Dick" among the people of all this section of country. In physique he was of commanding appearance, six feet and one inch in height, and weighing about two hundred pounds. Rugged health blessed his years in Tulare county. Previously, however, while in San Francisco, he had suffered much from ill health, but after coming to this part of the state he became robust and stalwart. Before old age had come to him, however, he was stricken with paralysis, which resulted in his death January 9, 1894, at his Visalia home. The interment of his body was conducted with Masonic honors, for he had been active in that order as a member of lodge, chapter and commandery, and had passed all the chairs in the chapter, including that of high priest. In politics he favored Republican principles. His wife, who is administratrix of the estate and a woman of excellent business ability, bore the maiden name of Mattie M. Roberts, and was born at Macomb, Ill. The Roberts family is of eastern extraction. Her father, James C. Roberts, a native of New York, went to Illinois during the pioneer days of the latter state and settled in McDonough county, where he followed the trade of carpenter and builder. When advanced in life, having long since retired from all active labors, he came to California to see the country and visit his daughter at Visalia, and here his death occurred in 1901, when he had attained the age of eighty-seven years.

WILLIAM H. THURMAN, founder of the city of Madera, was born in 1831, in Winchester, Tenn., and was a son of John Thurman, a Virginian and a pioneer of Tennessee. At the age of sixteen years he left home and enlisted in the Mexican war, where he served under Gen. Winfield Scott. In 1849 he crossed the plains to California, where, besides trying his luck in the mines, he engaged in teaming and freighting in the mountains. After settling in Washoe county, Nev., he served for one term as sheriff. On his return to California in 1869, he embarked in the lumber business at Coulterville, Mariposa county. Coming from there to what is now Madera county, he organized the old California Lumber Company, and built the flume from the mills, sixty miles to this place. To the new town he gave the Spanish name of Madera. A man of inventive nature, he devised a number of articles to aid in his work. Among these was a clamp (patented), which is used in holding the lumber together in bundles, for transporting through the flume. After the disbanding of the California Lumber Company, he became identified as a contractor to do the logging and sawing for the Madera Flume and Trading Company, being so engaged for two years, after which he moved his family to Walla Walla, Wash., and engaged in lumbering in Idaho for two years.

On his return to California, Mr. Thurman built a mill in Mariposa county, and engaged in manufacturing lumber. Meanwhile, his winter home was at Fresno Flats. May 16, 1893, he was elected sheriff of Madera county, and held the office until January, 1895, when he declined to become a candidate for re-election. Ill health led him to remove to San Diego, but the change of climate did not benefit him, and he died in December, 1895, at sixty-four years of age. In politics he had always been a staunch Democrat, and fraternally was a Master and Royal Arch Mason. His wife, Emma (Bludworth) Thurman, was born in New Orleans, La., came to California after the Civil war, and is now living in San Diego. Of her four children, W. B. is a resident of Madera; George S. is manager of a commission house in San Francisco; Arthur L. is a conductor on the Southern Pacific Railroad; and James D. is an attorney in San Francisco.

WILLIAM B. THURMAN was born in Washoe, Nev., July 14, 1868, a son of the late W. H. Thurman, the founder of the town of Madera. He was brought to California by his parents when a babe of six months, grew to manhood and received his education in Merced and Madera counties. At an early age he became identified with the lumber interests of that section, and in 1892 entered the employ of the Madera Flume and Trading Company in this city. When his father was elected sheriff of Madera county, upon its organization, he was appointed under-sheriff, serving until January, 1895, when he was appointed deputy to the county clerk and clerk of the board of supervisors, holding the position two years.

In 1898 he was the nominee of the Democratic party for county sheriff, was elected, and entered upon his duties in January, 1899, retiring from the office after serving efficiently four years. His creed was the strict enforcement of law and order, and in the fulfillment of his duties had several narrow escapes from death.

In June, 1902, Mr. Thurman formed a partnership with J. W. Watkins, under the firm name of Watkins & Thurman. Leasing the mill owned by the Madera Flume and Trading Company, they began the manufacture of sash and doors. In this enterprise they have built up a splendid business, their product finding a ready market throughout the eastern states and the Pacific coast.

June 17, 1896, Mr. Thurman was united in marriage in Fresno Flats, with Georgia A. Rice, a native of Grant county, Ore. Her father, Henry Rice, came to California in 1852 via Cape Horn, and ten years later went to Oregon and settled in Grant county, where he married Sophronia Dodson. He now makes his home in Fresno.

Mr. Thurman is a member of Madera Lodge No. 280, F. & A. M.; is past grand of the local lodge of Odd Fellows, and past district deputy grand master; a member of the Rebekahs and Encampment at Fresno; Benevolent Protective Order of Elks of Fresno, and the Woodmen of the World, of Madera. Is an active member of Madera Chamber of Commerce.

HON. SYLVESTER CLARK SMITH.

Through wise statesmanship and the promotion of measures for the benefit of the people, Hon. Sylvester Clark Smith has gained a reputation which is not limited to the confines of his home town of Bakersfield, nor the county of Kern, but extends throughout the state. His service in the state senate, to which he was elected in 1894 and re-elected in 1898, forms one of the most noteworthy features of his life. In the halls of legislature he has borne a prominent part in progressive movements. He was the author of the county government bill and chairman of the committee appointed to report upon the same. As the author of the present registration law, he not only introduced the bill during his first year in the legislature, but also did all in his power to interest other senators in its passage. At that time it failed of passage, but later was more successfully pushed forward by its author. Two constitutional amendments, providing for the employment of voting machines in cities of California when sanctioned by the legislature, owe their conception to him. One of the most important measures with which his name is connected, the bill for the establishment of the California Polytechnic School at San Luis Obispo, was passed, and in October of 1903 the school opened. The special purpose of the institution is to furnish instruction to farmers and mechanics, while there is also a department for young ladies. Should the purpose of the founders reach a successful consummation the school will be fruitful of much good. Senator Smith acts as president of the board of trustees of the college, having charge of some three hundred acres of land owned by the institution. In this connection it may be stated that his services are given gratuitously, none of the board receiving compensation for their labors.

The ancestry of Senator Smith is traced to John Smith, the Puritan pioneer of New England. Sylvester Smith, the senator's grandfather, a native of New England, spent the larger part of his life in developing raw, unimproved land and was a hardy frontiersman. At the time of his death in Iowa he was about eighty years of age. His son, Edward, was born in northern New York, and in childhood accompanied the family to Ohio, thence to Illinois, and with a brother proceeded to Iowa in 1835, when that state was considered beyond the boundary of civilization. Pleased with the prospects, they sent for other members of the family and took up government land in Henry county. Edward Smith became the owner of a farm of one hundred and twenty acres, and remained there until a short time before his death, which occurred in California in 1882, at the age of sixty-three years. In politics he voted with the Republicans. During the Civil war he offered his services to the Union, but was rejected for physical reasons. In his family there were five sons and three daughters born of his union with Celia Shockley, a native of Ohio but from childhood a resident of Iowa, her parents being among the earliest settlers of Henry county. At the time of her death in 1866 she was about forty years of age.

Near Mount Pleasant, Henry county, Iowa, Sylvester Clark Smith was born August 26, 1858. He was primarily educated in district schools and later attended Howe's Academy at Mount Pleasant. When eighteen years of age he began to teach school and this occupation he followed in the summers, attending school during the winters, until he was twenty-one. In 1879 he came to California and began to teach a district school in Colusa county, where, May 7, 1882, he was united in marriage with Maria Hart, who was born near Warrensburg, Mo., and by whom he has two daughters, Eva and Dorrit. In the summer of 1882 Mr. Smith and a brother drove through to Walla Walla, Wash. During the winter he read law in San Francisco. The summer of 1883 found him in Kern county, where he taught district schools until December, 1885, and meanwhile continued his law studies.

In October, 1885, he was admitted to the bar and two months later came to Bakersfield, where he opened an office. When, in 1886, the excitement regarding the water supply arose, some of the farmers deeply interested in the matter started a paper, the Echo, and engaged him to edit and conduct the same in their interests. In 1889, when the issue for which the paper had been established was settled, he purchased the plant, and ran it until 1897, when he resumed his law practice. However, a short time afterward he resumed his journalistic connections, becoming the largest stockholder in the incorporated company, which founded a daily paper called the Morning Echo. Ever since then Mr. Smith has been manager of the publication and one of its editorial writers. In 1902 he was one of four Republican candidates for the congressional nomination, but was defeated on the forty-ninth ballot, although he stood first on next to the last ballot. In company with the successful candidate he afterward made a canvass of the district, and his stump speeches were a feature of the campaign. The campaign of 1904 again found him a candidate for congressional honors, and when the convention met at Santa Cruz on August 25th, he was nominated by acclamation. His election followed by a plurality of ten thousand eight hundred votes.

Among the local movements which receive Mr. Smith's support, mention belongs to the library board, of which he is a trustee; the board of trade, and the board of health. He has been one of the most active factors in the improvement of the city and in beautifying its streets, and was one of the leaders in the movement for the incorporation of Bakersfield as a city. Fraternally he is connected with the Knights of Pythias and the Woodmen of the World.

LEVI WOOD. There are few men now living retired in Oakdale who have so emphatically impressed their worth upon Stanislaus county as Levi Wood. While his name is associated with that of its most substantial and conservative citizens, his prestige has been gained in the fields and meadows of this fertile section, and is identified with unusual sagacity in purchasing and improving lands, and with the establishment of a standard which aspirants for agricultural honors would do well to emulate. At all times practical and far-sighted, he is responsible for the improvement of at least five farms in the county, and his success has permitted the purchase of four properties besides the farm of two hundred and forty acres which he owns at present in the vicinity of the town.

Mr. Wood is a self-made man from whose career one may derive both encouragement and help. He has given farming the best and strongest years of his life, has studied its every phase, and is competent to talk intelligently and instructively concerning an occupation upon which depends the success or failure of the markets of the world. He came to California in 1869 from Atchison county, Mo., to which his family had removed from Pike county, Ind., in 1855, and where an untracked wilderness, with its attendant dangers and loneliness, presented problems difficult to unravel. Born in Pike county January 1, 1847, Levi was eight years old when he went overland to Missouri, his father, Zachariah, taking up land in Atchison county, where the latter died when his son was fourteen years old. He was born in Ohio, and was of Welsh descent, and his father fought and was killed in the Black Hawk war. Through his marriage with Matilda J. Chambers, of North Carolina, he became the parent of ten children, six of whom attained maturity. Of these, Isaac died in Missouri; Samuel, who served in the Civil war in a Missouri regiment, lives on a farm near Portland, Ore.; Aaron resides on a farm in Missouri; Levi, the subject of this sketch, resides in Oakdale; Thomas died in Missouri; Mrs. Shackelford died in Missouri.

Levi Wood had few playmates in his youth, for there were but thirty families in Atchison county when he first settled there, and of necessity the opportunities for acquiring an education were limited. Distinctly he recalls the disturbance incident to the breaking out of the Civil war, of the death of his father in the quiet of his farm almost when the first bugle-call was stirring patriots to action, of the hurried departure of his older brother to the front, and his own assumption of the responsibility of managing the home place in his absence. Putting his shoulder to the wheel, he cared for those dependent upon him, and when the war was over and peace restored, established a home of his own by marrying Lydia Keeley. Mrs. Wood was born in Philadelphia, and came to Missouri with her father, Conrad Keeley, the latter of whom was a carpenter by trade, and a soldier in the Civil war. Mrs. Wood died in California in 1901. There are five sons and one daughter living, all of whom remain in their father's vicinity to comfort him in his declining years. William Elwood is a rancher near by; Alonzo Thomas owns and operates a fruit ranch near Oakdale; Harry J. is a funeral director in Oakdale; Ralph is running a ranch near Oakdale; Walter A. lives on the home farm; Laura Evelyn also lives at home. Levi C., the second youngest, died in 1901.

Mr. Wood remained in Missouri until 1869, when, owing to his health being broken, he came to California with his wife, and began to peddle fruit over the mountains from Tuolumne county. This proved admirable summer work, and his falls and winters he spent in Stockton, soon regaining his health and spirits, and becoming thoroughly impressed with the many advantages of the west. In 1871 he rented a farm on the Stanislaus river, and in 1878 purchased a farm of three hundred and twenty acres three miles south of Oakdale where he lived and prospered for ten years. He then bought a farm the same size twelve miles from town, remained thereon for eight years, and then purchased a half section two miles south of Oakdale, which he eventually presented to his sons. In 1901 he purchased his present home in Oakdale, and at the same time a ranch of two hundred and thirty-eight acres south of the town, which he has placed to grain and stock, and which now contains two hundred and forty acres. On all of these properties he established an ideal farming center, instituted the most modern and labor-saving of improvements, and secured from his land the best results compatible with soil, climate, and general adaptiveness. He was systematic, practical and eminently far-sighted, making few mistakes, and those never a second time. He has always believed and lived up to the gospel of industry and common sense, has been loyal to trusts imposed and friendships enjoyed, and in consequence has won the lasting esteem of the people among whom his lot has been cast. A staunch but not active Republican, he is an ex-member of the school board, and is a devout and generous associate and trustee of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

SAMUEL CARR BROWN. A residence of more than fifty years in Tulare county has made Mr. Brown a witness of its development as well as a contributor to its progress. As a result of his far-sighted policy in purchasing tracts of land in early days when property was very low, he has attained a position of wealth and influence among the people of Visalia, his home town. With the exception of two others, he is the oldest surviving settler of this region. Coming here in 1852 when settlers were few and the inducements for permanent citizenship meager, it has been his privilege to be associated with the development of the valley, until it has become a favorite place for investment among capitalists.

Franklin county, Vt., is Mr. Brown's native place, and August 17, 1826, the date of his birth. His parents, James and Sarah (Smith) Brown, were natives respectively of Rhode Island and Massachusetts, and resided for years at Swanton, Franklin county, Vt., where the father engaged in the mercantile business and owned large tracts of land. Eventually they removed to St. Lawrence county, N. Y., and there died. In their family of four sons and three daughters, Samuel Carr Brown was the youngest. Primarily educated in common schools, he was later a student in Pennsylvania College in the Western Reserve and also attended Oberlin College in 1848. Having acquired a rudimentary knowledge of law through study under Judge Wallace of St. Lawrence county, N. Y., he gained considerable experience of its practice through his connection with a justice court, and throughout all of his active life devoted his attention largely to professional matters.

After one-half year in Pike county, Ill., in 1849 Mr. Brown joined a band of gold-seekers bound for California. In April the journey was begun and in September he reached the North Fork of the American river, where he tried his luck at mining for a year. Fortune did not favor his efforts and he gave up mining and went to San Francisco. For six months he engaged as steward on the Vincennes, a sloop, sailing out from San Francisco. After leaving that work he remained in San Francisco for a short time. January of 1852 found him in Tulare county in company with about fifty people, mostly farmers from Iowa. They first built a stockade, the Indians two years before having killed the first white settlers. After this other log houses, eight or ten, were built in the stockade. It had not been his intention to settle here permanently, for his object in making the trip had been to hunt the deer, antelope and bear that abounded in what was then called the Four Creek county. However, as trifles often change our destiny, so a trip taken for recreation and hunting ended with permanent settlement in the locality visited. The practice of law, buying of land, teaching two terms of school, and other activities filled the early years of Mr. Brown's residence in Visalia, and during the Civil war he was an active sympathizer of the Union. Three times attempts were made to wreck his office, but United States troops restored order and remained until the close of the war. These troops were sent here at the request of six reputable citizens, three Republicans and three Democrats, the latter having come to their Republican friends to warn them of trouble. For a time he was a law partner of William G. Morris and later was a member of the firm of Brown & Daggett, but in 1891 retired from active law practice. The large properties owned by him are under his personal supervision, including an office building in Visalia, twenty-five hundred acres of farm land in proximity to the town, and a one-half interest in four thousand acres in the foothills near Visalia. The land is divided into five ranches, the most of which are leased.

Many of the most important enterprises in Visalia have received the aid and influence of S. C. Brown. Seeing the need of a financial institution, he interested others in the establishment of the Bank of Visalia, of which he is now a director. After taking part in the establishment of the ice works he was elected a director, and has since served in that capacity. Upon the organization of the Visalia steam laundry, an enterprise that he aided in starting, he was chosen a member of the board of directors and has since helped to shape its business policy. In addition he is a director of the soda works and a leading worker in the Tulare Irrigation Company. During early days he held the office of district attorney for two years, for two terms held the position of mayor, and for three terms served in the city council. Politically he was a Free-soiler during the existence of that party, and during the candidacy of Abraham Lincoln became a Republican, which party has since received his support. After coming to Visalia he married Fannie Kellenburg, a native of Illinois. They are the parents of five children now living, namely: May, wife of William H. Hammond, and Fannie, wife of C. G. Wilcox, all of Visalia; Philip S., who has charge of a ranch; Maude, wife of J. E. Conbs, of Visalia, and Helen, who resides with her parents.

THOMAS A. BARR. The lineage of the Barr family, represented in Fresno county by Thomas A. Barr, a prominent vineyardist of the Malaga district, is traced to Germany, from which country some member emigrated to the United States in the seventeenth century. He is supposed to have located in Maryland, as that is the state in which some of the more recent ancestors were born, Adam Barr, the great-grandfather of Thomas A., owing his nativity to that locality, whence he joined the westward tide of civilization and went to Kentucky as a scout with Daniel Boone. His son, also called Adam, served in the war of 1812. He was born in Kentucky one and a half miles from the place where Jerry B. Barr, his son, was born, the birth-place of the latter being eight miles from that of Thomas A., who was born in Breckinridge county, Ky., September 10, 1841.

Jerry B. Barr was a farmer by occupation. In 1852 he removed to Scotland county, Mo., and later to Illinois, where he remained until 1861. Returning to Missouri in that year, he located in Lewis county, where his death occurred at the age of seventy-three years. By marriage he had allied himself with a family which had been prominent in this country since the colonial period, Eliza Anne Dowell, of Kentucky, becoming his wife. She was the daughter of Thomas Dowell, a native of Virginia, and on the maternal side a great-granddaughter of John Conklin, who served in the Revolutionary war as a soldier in the famous cavalry commanded by Light-horse Harry Lee. Of their family four children are now living, namely: Thomas A., of this review; Z. Taylor, of Selma, Cal.; Elizabeth Johnson; and Josephine Dudley.

Reared to manhood in the states of Kentucky and Illinois, Thomas A. Barr received his education in the common schools of both states. He removed with his parents to Missouri in 1861, and remained at home until the following year, when he went back to Illinois and made his home with an uncle for two years, renting his farm. In 1869 he located in Lewis county, Mo., and engaged in the general merchandise business in Maywood, at the same time carrying on farming operations. Until 1881 he remained connected with the mercantile interests of that town, when he gave his attention entirely to farming and stock raising, becoming the owner of a four-hundred-and-eighty-acre farm. Deciding to immigrate to the Pacific coast he sold his property in 1890 and came to California, spending his first year in Stockton, after which he came to Fresno and purchased his present place in 1892. He now owns eighty-three acres of land, sixty-five acres being devoted to vines and fruits.

In Missouri, in 1866, Mr. Barr was united in marriage with Anna L. Wright, a native of Lewis county, and the daughter of Wesley Wright. Of this union were born the following children: Clarence E., of Sacramento; Arthur E., of Selma; Warden T., a physician of Fresno; Adeline J., the wife of E. T. Wall, of Fresno county; and Edgar B., at home. In his political convictions Mr. Barr is an adherent of the principles of the Democratic party, and in religion is a member of the Christian Church.

ALFRED D. McMASTER, M. D., a well known practitioner and proprietor of the Mountain View Drug Store of Le Grand, Merced county, was born December 13, 1854, in North Carolina, a son of Micajah and Sybil (Jones) McMaster, both of whom were natives of that state, the latter dying in 1857 at an early age.

Alfred D. McMaster received his education in the common schools making his home in North Carolina until seventeen years of age, at which time he went to Kansas and a few years later to Missouri, where he engaged in a general merchandise business for three years in Morrisville. During this time he studied medicine, and in 1879 was graduated from the Missouri Medical College at St. Louis. He began the practice of his profession in that state and was married to Delina J. Reed that same year. She died in 1886, leaving one daughter, Willie A.

Having had several years' experience, and believing that California offered better inducements, the doctor disposed of his holdings in Missouri in 1882 and came to this state, locating for a short time in Willits, Mendocino county, where he opened a drug store in connection with his practice. After three years he removed to Sonoma county; remaining there one year, he came to the San Joaquin valley and located in Selma, Fresno county; later, in 1891, he moved to Plainsberg, Merced county, and built up a lucrative practice and patronage in his drug store in his six years residence there.

In 1897 he came to Le Grand, where he has since been one of the leading citizens and has assisted materially in building up the town. His practice reaches far into the country surrounding Le Grand and is a lucrative one as well.

In 1888 Dr. McMaster was united in marriage in Merced county, with Nellie, the daughter of N. N. Turner, a pioneer of 1849. She was born in Merced county in 1868. Of this union have been born two children, Raleigh, in 1889, and Blanche in 1891.

In the county where Dr. McMaster has made his home for nearly fifteen years he has gathered about him many friends by his courteous treatment, his hospitality and professional skill as a physician. He is a man of public spirit and always has supported movements he considered worthy of advancing the interests of the county. Fraternally he is a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen and Modern Woodmen of America. In politics a Democrat, he has always had the interests of the party at heart.

DAVID B. FOWLER. The supervisor of the third district of Madera county is a representative of a family identified with the colonial history of Virginia. At an early period, when Kentucky was beginning to attract people over the mountains, James Fowler, Sr., became a pioneer of the Blue-Grass state and cleared a raw tract of land, making of it an improved farm. From there late in life he removed to Indiana. Next in line of descent was James Fowler, Jr., a native of Kentucky and a farmer of Jennings county, Ind., whence he removed to Nebraska and died in Pawnee City. His wife was Millie Maria Stone, daughter of Thomas Stone, a Virginian who settled in Kentucky in an early day. Among their children was a son, James M., who served in an Indiana regiment during the Civil war. Another son, W. F. (father of David B.), was born in Indiana, May 14, 1830, and while still a mere boy gained a thorough knowledge of agriculture under his father's training. At the age of twenty-five, in 1855, he removed to Iowa and settled on a farm in Wapello county. From there in 1857 he removed to Pawnee City, Neb., and took up farm pursuits in a new and undeveloped region. In 1864 he opened a mercantile establishment in Pawnee City as a member of the firm of Butler & Fowler, his partner being later elected governor of Nebraska. Various interests in farming, stock-raising and mercantile affairs, he led a busy and prosperous life until the siege of grasshoppers brought disaster and ruin to that region. Farmers lost their crops and were unable to meet their bills at the store, causing him a heavy loss.

Hoping to have better success in a different location W. F. Fowler came to California in 1874. His first abode was at Tehachapi, Kern county, where he took up a farm of one hundred and sixty acres. Bad luck followed him, for again the grasshoppers devastated his crop and to add to his misfortunes the railroad claimed and succeeded in getting possession of his farm. Forced to make another start, in 1883 he settled in Selma, where he combined real estate transactions with farming and serving as justice of the peace. In 1893 he came to Madera county, where he has since been interested in farming. He is proud of the fact that he supported Abraham Lincoln for president in the days when that statesman was comparatively unknown, and later he was as firm in his allegiance to James G. Blaine. Ever since the formation of the Republican party he has voted that ticket, in both local and general elections, and has maintained the deepest interest in its success. His marriage united him with Elizabeth H. Anderson, who was born in Indiana, a daughter of Robert Anderson, a farmer who removed from Kentucky to Indiana.

Of two sons now living, David B. is supervisor and R. R. district attorney of Madera county, where both are influential in public affairs. The former was born in Pawnee county, Neb., May 20, 1860, and attended district schools from the age of six until fifteen. In 1874 he accompanied the family to California and aided his father on the farm in Kern county. After removing to Selma in 1883 he became interested in the real estate business. In 1891 he came to Madera and later was employed by the Sugar Pine Company, acting as foreman of two different colonies. At this writing he is engaged in the cigar business on Yosemite avenue. He was married in San Francisco to Mary Raish, who was born in Marysville, this state, and they have one son, Cecil. Mrs. Fowler is a member of the Episcopal Church. Fraternally Mr. Fowler is connected with the Woodmen of the World. The commercial welfare of Madera secures his co-operation through his membership on the Board of Trade. In political belief he is a pronounced Republican, always voting with his party. In 1892 he was elected justice of the peace, but resigned the same year. At the first election after the organization of Madera county he was elected county supervisor over two opponents. Again, in 1902, he was elected on the Republican ticket county supervisor for district 3, receiving a majority of forty-four, and taking the office in January, 1903, to serve a term of four years.

NORMAN D. KELLEY, D. D. S. The family represented by Dr. Kelley of Fresno has been identified with the history of California for a long period and he himself is a native of this state, born at Watonsville. His father, Rev. D. O. Kelley, was born at Kelley Island in Lake Erie, being a member of an old family of Ohio. Educated in the east, at the outbreak of the Civil war he enlisted and served as lieutenant of a company belonging to the One Hundredth Ohio Infantry. While participating in a campaign in the south he was captured by the enemy and confined in Libby prison, where for fifteen months he endured all the hardships of that historic place. When the war ended he returned to Ohio and from there via Panama came to California, where he practiced law, studied and was ordained to the Episcopal ministry. His life has since been devoted to his denomination. In 1879 he came to Fresno and organized the first Episcopal parish in this vicinity, also built the first house of worship used by the denomination here. For fourteen years he remained rector of this congregation, greatly promoting its welfare by his skillful leadership. With Fresno as his headquarters he organized congregations throughout the San Joaquin valley and gave to them the encouragement of his practical and efficient assistance. All of the churches of his denomination from the Tehachapi to Stockton were organized under his direct supervision, and the denomination owes much to his ability as a missionary preacher and organizer. Resigning his charge at Fresno in 1891, he returned to San Francisco as a city missionary on the staff of Bishop Nichols, and still makes that city his home, where he is as earnest in the work of the church as in more youthful years. For a long period he acted as editor at San Francisco of the Pacific Churchman, devoted to the interests of his denomination on the coast. From the standpoint of an editor, no less than as a missionary, his work was of permanent value to the church and promoted its welfare and progress. He is a Republican in political views, and is a member of the Loyal Legion and Grand Army of the Republic.

After coming to California Rev. Mr. Kelley married Annie A. Fletcher, who was born in Boston, Mass., and at an early age accompanied her father, Stephen Fletcher, an Englishman, to the Pacific coast. Settling in California, Mr. Fletcher remained a resident of San Francisco until his death. In the Kelley family there are seven sons, of whom Norman D. was next to the oldest. He was born August 8, 1877, and was two years of age when his parents removed to Fresno, where his education was commenced in the public schools. After removing to San Francisco in 1891, he was a student in the schools of that city. In 1895 he matriculated in the College of Physicians & Surgeons, where he took the regular course of study and received the degree of D. D. S. at his graduation in 1898. Immediately after completing his studies he opened an office in Fresno, where he has since engaged in practice. His marriage was solemnized in San Francisco and united him with Harriet P. Steinwand, who was born in Oakland and grew to womanhood in Fresno. They have two children, Douglas Tracy and Harriet Elise. The family are identified with St. James Episcopal Church of Fresno. If Dr. Kelley has a hobby outside of his profession, it is his enthusiastic support of the work of the Sierra Club, with which he is associated. It is his belief that mountain roads should be opened so that tourists may have an opportunity of beholding the grandeur of the Sierra scenery, and he is a leader in the movement for the opening of Kings river canyon. By frequent summer visits in the mountains he has been impressed with the beauty of the scenery, which, if a safe and pleasant method of transit can be secured, will undoubtedly draw thousands of visitors to enjoy its wonderful attractions.

HORACE G. KELSEY. A native son of Merced county, Horace G. Kelsey was born near where he now lives, May 5, 1859, his parents being Erastus and Melinda (Powers) Kelsey, who crossed the plains in 1849, and of whom mention is made in another part of this work. Reared on the home farm, he was educated in the public school at Merced Falls, later entering the University of California from which he was graduated in the class of 1881. As a youth he had a leaning toward the profession of medicine, and to this end studied for a couple of years in the Cooper Medical College of San Francisco. His inclinations, however, underwent a change, and he returned to the home farm in Merced county and soon after purchased his father's interest in his present ranch, upon which the elder Kelsey had already made many improvements and had set out a few fig trees. From 1889 until 1890 he worked zealously to set out his fig orchard of seventy-five acres, and in all has about twenty-five hundred trees. To the making of the orchard, which has had the distinction of being the largest fig orchard in the world, he has brought all of the science and skill possible of acquirement through the medium of the experience of others, and the success of his project is the best guarantee of his correct application of modern horticultural ideas. As usual with figs, he gathers two crops a year, the yearly production being between one hundred and twenty-five and one hundred and fifty tons. The trees are thirty-five feet apart, and are known as the True Mission fig tree. A ready market is found in San Francisco.

The Kelsey ranch contains four hundred and forty-one acres, one hundred and ten of which are under alfalfa, and the balance, not in orchard, is under grain and pasture. Mr. Kelsey, in connection with his diversified interests, keeps an average of three thousand sheep. His home is a commodious and modern one, his farm is well kept and equipped with the most desirable of agricultural and horticultural improvements, and his orchard spreads its shade and shelters its time-honored fruit in beautiful and luxuriant fashion. At the helm of these varied country enterprises is a man thoroughly in touch with his work, of marked culture and sociability, and of unquestioned integrity of purpose and public spirit. His home is presided over by his wife, formerly Ida T. Weed, a native of New Jersey, and daughter of Mark H. Weed. Mr. Kelsey is a Democrat in national politics, and was formerly a member of the board of education. Fraternally he is connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. He is a lover of nature and while he has had advantages that tended toward a professional career, he selected his present vocation as one in which he could advance an intelligent interest in horticulture in the state. To such men as Mr. Kelsey California owes her present prosperity.

J. W. KNOX, B. S., LL.B. Among the leading attorneys and business men of central California, is J. W. Knox, who is prominent in legal, financial and social circles. Of a strong personality, great force of character and rare mental attainments, he is justly entitled to the honorable position that he holds as one of the most brilliant lawyers, and shrewd, energetic and safe business men of that part of California. Through persistency of purpose and zeal, intelligently and unerringly directed, he has achieved success at the bar and in financial circles, the influence of his masterful intellect being felt by judge and jury as well as by his associates and clientele. He is and has always been, an inveterate worker, deep thinker and great traveler; has a high sense of honor and integrity, belongs to a good family, is of a genial and hospitable nature, extremely cool, self-possessed and calculating under trying conditions, and is a gentleman under all circumstances. His caution is large, but it is offset by a large hope; his moral faculties are strong and active; his intuitions and first impressions and presentiments have almost invariably been correct, and have been his guide, in a large measure, in his successful dealings with strangers and men in general. He is possessed with unbounded benevolence; is philanthropic, large-minded, liberal and public-spirited, and has always been in advance of the times in all matters relating to the public welfare. He is a natural critic and has an analytic mind; is a high idealist and a man of great order; a lover of art, books and nature, and his home is surrounded and beautified by all such. There is an under-current of thought and philosophy permeating his nature; his mind is discriminating, logical and clear; he spares neither time nor labor in any cause or other business in which he is engaged. He is a great lover of his home, of home life and family, and has spared no expense to beautify and make his home attractive. He is a Mason, Knight of Pythias and Workman, and takes much interest in these orders. He is, and has always been, a leading Republican. Has been for many years a member of the state central committee and chairman of the Republican county committee. While he takes great interest in politics on principle, he has never sought nor accepted office, preferring to devote his entire time to his large and increasing legal business. He has repeatedly refused nomination for the office of superior judge and other offices at the hand of his party, and declined a tendered appointment by the governor as judge of the superior court of Merced county. Aside from his private practice, he is filling an important position as chairman of the board of directors of the Merced county branch of the Federal Trust Company, of which he is also attorney and treasurer. This company, organized with an authorized capital of $5,000,000, has its headquarters in the Mills building, San Francisco, and acts as executor, administrator, guardian and assignee; executes trusts of all kinds; loans money and issues and countersigns stocks and other securities.

Mr. Knox was born October 10, 1855, at Bloomingburg, Fayette county, Ohio. His parents were William Knox, born at Xenia, Ohio, January 6, 1828 (and died at Kansas City on June 30, 1900), and Mary Elizabeth (Short) Knox, born February 20, 1833, at Bloomingburg, Fayette county, Ohio (and died at Des Moines, Iowa, in 1902). The issue of this marriage was nine children, all of whom are living at the present time, namely: Jessie, the wife of Ira B. Thompson, a contractor and architect of Eureka, Cal.; Frank Knox, president of the National Bank of the Republic, of Salt Lake, Utah; Murray Knox, a large farmer and breeder of blooded stock, of Osborne, Kansas; Helen, the wife of John Gibson, of the large mercantile firm of Gibson & Gibson, of Maxwell, Iowa; George Knox, a rising young physician of San Francisco; Bruce Knox, a successful merchant of Sonora; Florence Knox, a teacher in the Polytechnic and Training School of Chicago, and Josephine Knox, one of the leading primary teachers of Des Moines, Iowa.

William Knox, with his family, removed from Ohio to Iowa in 1857, and was during the remainder of his life engaged in farming and the breeding of thoroughbred stock of all kinds. His farm in Washington county was a model of neatness, landscape beauty and profit. His children were taught in their western home three important lessons, habits of industry, economy and integrity, and were all given a liberal education. Mary Knox was a noble Christian woman, and by her life and careful teachings left a profound impress for good on the minds of her children.

J. W. Knox graduated from Washington College in 1876, and that fall came to California; later he entered the first class of the law department of the University of California, and graduated from that department with the first class of graduates in 1881. In 1882, he came to the city of Merced, where he began the practice of his profession and where he has lived continuously since. His ability and power met with ready recognition, and he easily came to the front in his chosen profession. For the last fifteen years or more, he has been identified with nearly all the litigation of importance in central California, ranging over probate, irrigation, land, corporation and criminal law. His practice has extended to all the counties of the San Joaquin valley and many of the other counties of the state, besides a large federal court practice in which he has been universally successful.

In 1885, Mr. Knox married Miss Ella M., the only child of Prof. W. A. and Minnie Cowdery, a native of New York, who died September 13, 1903, in the city of Merced, leaving four daughters, Hazel, Helen, Ruth and Karmel. Mrs. Knox was a woman of charming personality and noble character. All who knew her were attracted by her winsome manner and goodness of heart. Her praises are sounded by many lips and she is sincerely mourned by friends and acquaintances. In the church of which she and her husband were members (the First Presbyterian) and in the order of Eastern Star, she was a devoted and valued member, and took an important part in the work and the social entertainments of these organizations. She possessed many accomplishments. Her memory will long be cherished in many a heart. Death came to her in the noonday of her happy life and usefulness. She had a beautiful home and enjoyed a large circle of friends; had a fine voice and was especially gifted as a singer and was always in demand to aid in social entertainments, and she was ever ready to lend her services in entertaining when for the purpose of raising funds for charity. She was proverbial for her good work in this way, and it was fully appreciated.

WILLIAM W. RUTHERFORD. A typical representative of the honorable, determined and fearless Scotchman is found in William W. Rutherford, a California pioneer of 1854, who, though now living retired in Oakdale, was for many years identified with stock raising and dairying in Stanislaus county. On the threshold of his eighty-first year, Mr. Rutherford scans the horizon of the past with clear eyes, and looks confidently forward to many more years of peaceful existence. His history since early manhood is that of the west, for he arrived when its possibilities were beginning to fret the mind of the nation, and he has progressed in the wake of its picturesque and oftentimes lurid path. He has known the exposure of its vast stretches of unfenced land, the deprivation incident to its uncultivated soil, and the joy of its fulfilled promise. That he has taken a noble part in its development, is his own and the pride of his friends and associates.

That few Scotchmen came to the west in its crude awakening is generally believed. Their conservatism rebelled at the element of chance involved in its undertaking. Those that came left their strength and reliability upon whatever occupation they chose to engage in. Mr. Rutherford is no exception to this rule. Born in Roxburgh, southern Scotland, March 10, 1824, he was an infant when his paternal grandfather, John Rutherford, set forth to make a home for himself and family in St. Lawrence county, N. Y. Reports sent back were so favorable, that in 1827 he was taken by his parents, William and Catherine (Forsyth) Rutherford, to America, locating on a farm near Madrid, St. Lawrence county. Besides William W., who is the fifth oldest and only living son in his father's family, there were four sons and five daughters, of whom James, who came to the coast in the early days, died in the territory of Nevada. Mr. Rutherford inherits the trait of longevity, for his father lived to be ninety and his mother eighty years old. His educational chances were limited in the extreme, and his lessons of life were learned from the great teachers, observation and experience. From the drudgery of farm work he turned his attention to carpentering, and while thus employed had his thought turned into broader channels by his cousin, J. F. Rutherford, but recently returned from the west, to purchase and drive back across the plains a herd of cattle. The opportunity presented did not escape the young carpenter, who accompanied his relative to Illinois and Missouri, and assisted him in purchasing cattle with which to stock the ranges of the far west. Starting overland in April, they took turns in driving stock on alternating days, and with comparatively little difficulty arrived in California by way of the Walker river, turning their stock loose in the San Joaquin valley, Stanislaus county. Thereafter they engaged in stock raising in Stanislaus and Tuolumne county, and at the same time Mr. Rutherford ran a dairy at Keller's Ferry, his combined efforts netting him an encouraging income. A depreciation in stock values sent the business to a low level, yet notwithstanding this, the cattle were disposed of with small actual loss, after which he purchased cattle for $5 a head which formerly had been valued at $40. An opportunity for making money was presented in the Chinese Camp, where he, in partnership with Robert McHenry, engaged in the meat business during the mining rush. Starting all over again, he engaged in raising hogs until 1865, and that year entered land five miles from what is now Oakdale, on the Stanislaus river. Building a house and barns, and making many improvements, he developed a fine and paying property, adding to it until he owned eleven hundred and fifty acres in the river ranch, and three hundred and twenty acres near there. He engaged in raising grain and hogs principally, and was very successful also as to general farming. In 1891 he located in Oakdale, built a pleasant home, and has since made this his headquarters. From 1897 until 1902 he lived in Paloalto, to educate his children, returning then to Oakdale, where he contemplates spending the balance of his life.

In Stanislaus county Mr. Rutherford married Mrs. Melvina (Stearns) Gray, a native of Bethel, Me., who came to California about 1856. Mrs. Rutherford died in California, May 10, 1904, having had two children by her second marriage, Catherine and Mina, who are twins. Through her former marriage four sons and one daughter were born, of whom Frank Gray lives in Honolulu; William and Newton run the Rutherford ranch; Thomas is an attorney of Oakland, and a graduate of Stanford University; and Emma is the wife of William Judkins, of Oakdale. Long since Mr. Rutherford laid aside the cares of active life, going occasionally to his farm, and visiting the friends who have helped to make life enjoyable. He has never taken an active interest in politics, but has voted the Republican ticket in national affairs, using his discretion in voting for local offices. In religion he is a Presbyterian. Mr. Rutherford has retained a remarkable serenity and clearness of mind, and an unusual interest in the affairs and people around him. He is respected for his integrity and success, and for the usefulness and nobility of his well-balanced and moderate life.

CHARLES MORTIMER FRENCH. The present game warden of Merced county is one of the substantial business men of the town of that name, and enjoys the distinction of having conducted a dray business there for a longer time than any other man in the community. He represents a family which has contributed not a little to the educational and stock-raising development of Merced county, and which brought to the coast the strong and reliable traits of a New England ancestry. Mr. French was born in Augusta, Kennebec county, Me., July 13, 1864, his mother, Felicia Hemans (Gould) French, having been born in the same city April 23, 1837. His maternal grandfather was Judge Joshua Gould, for many years connected with the jurisprudence of Maine, and the education which he himself absorbed was shared with his children, and supplemented by training in the best schools of that state.

Hayden Winfield French, the father of C. M. French, was born in Lowell, Mass., and settled at an early day in Kennebec county, Me., where he owned a farm and where he married November 25, 1850. His immigration to California in 1865 followed upon the close of his military service in the Civil war, and he soon afterward went to Montana and engaged in mining until 1869. Subsequently settling in Merced county, Cal., he sent east for his wife and children. Here he engaged successfully in raising sheep, carrying on an extensive business. Under A. J. Meany he served as deputy sheriff of Merced county for twelve or fourteen years, later serving a couple of terms as constable, and finally retiring from active life. His death occurred April 7, 1894, and he left a comfortable competence to those dependent upon him. Fraternally he was identified with the Knights of Pythias, and politically he was a staunch Democrat, a man of highest integrity, and universally respected. He was one of the first settlers of Merced county, and his sheep ranch on Bear creek was a lonely place in the early days. The family were hospitable and generous, and many a wayfarer partook of food and slept beneath their humble roof. While rearing her five children, his wife taught a district school, being the first to thus afford educational advantages to the children of the settlers. A strong and self-reliant woman, she was a typical pioneer and in later life, when prosperity placed greater comfort in her path, she was a social factor in her neighborhood. She was a member of the Rathbone Sisters, a worker in the Baptist Church, and took an active part in reform work. At the time of her death, February 4, 1897, she left a host of friends to mourn her loss. Four of her children grew to maturity: Fannie, the wife of J. R. Jones, of Fresno, Cal.; Charles Mortimer, the present game warden of Merced county; Hayden Winfield, of Fresno, Cal.; and Abbie Maria, wife of John Macaboy, of Fresno.

Charles Mortimer French went to school to his mother on Bear creek, later attending the grammar school of Merced until starting in the dray business in 1887. He possessed plenty of practical common sense and straightforward business ability, qualities which won him recognition, and today he has a large patronage in the town and county. In 1892 he erected his present commodious residence on west Sixteenth street, and January 10, 1898, he married Mary Corinne Yoakum, who was born in Alameda county, March 22, 1869, a daughter of George W. Yoakum.

Mr. French is a Democrat in politics and in April, 1904, was elected a member of the city council. He also holds the position of game warden, to which he was appointed by the board of supervisors February 1, 1903. He is fraternally connected with the Knights of Pythias, Ancient Order of United Workmen, Woodmen of the World and the Foresters, in all of which he has served in an official capacity. He is also a member and was foreman of the Merced Hose Company, No. 1. Mr. French is popular and prominent in the business world of Merced, a man of unquestioned honor, of broad sympathies and great generosity.

GEORGE W. CARTWRIGHT. The progressive citizenship of Fresno has a worthy representative in George W. Cartwright, now engaged in the practice of law in this city. Energetic and enterprising, he has done much toward developing and promoting the horticultural, manufacturing and political interests of this part of the state, and in various official capacities has served with credit. A son of the late Rev. John Cartwright, he was born November 9, 1863, in Coles county, Ill. His grandfather, Reddick Cartwright, came from old Virginia stock, and inherited in a large measure the virtues of his honored ancestors. As a man of patriotic zeal, he served in the war of 1812, and actively participated in the battle of New Orleans, January 8, 1813. He subsequently removed to Illinois, becoming a pioneer of Sangamon county.

A native of Sangamon county, Ill., Rev. John Cartwright was born in 1835, and nearly rounded out the allotted period of man's life, dying August 8, 1902, in Fresno, Cal. During the Civil war he fought in his country's defense, serving as a private in Company F, Fifty-eighth Illinois Volunteer Infantry. As a Baptist minister he subsequently preached in Illinois until 1869, when he brought his family, consisting of his wife and four children, to California. Crossing the plains with horses and wagons, he journeyed for five months, arriving safely, although the party immediately following the train which he accompanied was massacred by the Indians. Settling first in Colusa county he engaged in farming and preaching, being the pioneer Baptist minister of that county. Locating in Fresno county in 1885, he bought forty acres of land lying one and one-half miles west of Malaga, and set out a vineyard, which he carried on successfully for a number of years, in addition to his horticultural labors, also preaching in different places. He possessed great mechanical ingenuity, and from his early youth was familiar with the blacksmith's trade. About 1889 he began the manufacture of the now famous Cartwright pruning shears, which are of a better temper and better adapted for pruning vines and trees than any other implement of the kind, and are now in general use throughout the vineyards and orchards of the Pacific coast. The business, small at first, has grown rapidly and steadily, and is now continued by his sons, George W. and John M., under the firm name of J. Cartwright & Sons. Rev. John Cartwright was a Master Mason and an Odd Fellow. He married Martha Ashby, who was born in Coles county, Ill., of Virginia ancestry, and now resides with her children in California. Four sons and two daughters blessed their union, namely: Jasper F., a vineyardist, and an employe in the office of the county clerk; Lizzie, wife of F. M. Cook, of Orosi, Cal.; Reddick N., an employe in the manufacturing plant belonging to his brothers; George W., the subject of this sketch; Mamie, wife of Edward Roach, a vineyardist, residing in Fresno county; and John M., in partnership with his brother, George W., is a skilled mechanic and thoroughly understands the tempering of steel, being an expert in that line.

After leaving the public schools of Willows, George W. Cartwright pursued his studies under the guidance of Prof. J. L. Wilson, for some years in Colusa county. Coming to

John Cutler

Fresno county in 1885, he taught in the public schools for nine years. In 1894 he was the nominee of the People's party for county superintendent of schools, and although he ran far ahead of his ticket he was defeated, the Republican party electing its candidate, Prof. Thomas J. Kirk, now state superintendent of public instruction. Entering then the manufacturing establishment of his father, he worked in the factory a few months, introducing many valuable improvements, and was then elected secretary and business manager of the Malaga Packing Association, a position which he filled for four years. In 1896, nominated on the Fusion ticket, Mr. Cartwright was elected as representative to the state legislature, receiving a majority of over seven hundred and fifty votes, and served during the session of 1897. Appointed by caucus to draft an income tax bill, he did so, and it was introduced into the assembly by Shannahan of Shasta, but was defeated by a strict party vote. Mr. Cartwright also introduced a resolution so to amend the constitution as to do away with the poll tax, but this was likewise defeated by party vote, as was the bill which he introduced for the purpose of preventing the demonetization of lawful money by contract. In 1898 Mr. Cartwright was elected county clerk, being the candidate of the Democratic and People's parties, and served efficiently for four years, from January, 1899, until January, 1903.

Taking up the study of law, which had always been his ambition, Mr. Cartwright was admitted to the bar March 12, 1903, and has since been successfully engaged in the practice of his profession in Fresno. In 1902, soon after the death of his father, he purchased an interest with his brother in the manufacturing business of J. Cartwright & Son, his brother being secretary and business manager. New machinery has been installed in the plant, which is now up to date in its equipments, and the business is constantly increasing, the shears manufactured being of the finest quality.

In Fresno, December 24, 1889, Mr. Cartwright married Rosa S. Otto, who was born in Wisconsin, near Oshkosh, and they have one child, Hazel. Mrs. Cartwright's father, Andreas Otto, embarked in the manufacture of sugar in Wisconsin, erecting there the first sugar-mill in the United States. (A detailed sketch of his life will be found elsewhere in this work.) Politically Mr. Cartwright is a Democrat, and since 1894 has been one of the principal local speakers in every campaign.

Fraternally he belongs to the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, to the Woodmen of the World, and Modern Woodmen of America. He is also a member of the County Bar Association.

LOYAL O. CUTLER was born on the ranch owned by his parents, five miles east of Visalia, June 7, 1866, a son of Dr. John and Nancy (Rice) Cutler, the former born in Indiana and the latter in Ohio. Dr. Cutler was a graduate in medicine and practiced his profession in Iowa until 1849 when he crossed the plains to California, locating in Eldorado county. While a resident of that county he served as a representative to the state legislature. In 1852 he removed to Tulare county and engaged in farming on a large ranch on the St. John's river, meeting with deserved success and acquiring a fortune. He was elected and served two terms as county judge and died July 12, 1902, aged eighty-three years. His wife died in Santa Cruz. They became the parents of three sons and four daughters, of whom L. O. was the youngest son and the fifth child.

L. O. Cutler was reared on the home ranch and educated in the public school and Visalia Normal. He remained at home until he was of age and became thoroughly acquainted with all the details of the stock business, as conducted by his father. At this time he and his brother John began farming on a large scale on the home ranch and also on two thousand acres near Goshen, which they sowed to grain. Meeting with success in this independent venture they began to make a specialty of Herefords in their cattle business, having pasturage of about seven thousand acres in the hills. At this time (1905) they lease some of their land near Goshen. L. O. Cutler, with his wife and brother John, owns the H. T. Chrisman ranch of six hundred and forty acres on Elbow creek, and John Cutler owns three hundred and twenty acres at Cutler. The old Cutler ranch has eight hundred acres, all fine land. Mr. Cutler and his brother John have about seven thousand acres at Auckland, all fenced and devoted to raising cattle and hogs. Their grain farm is located four miles south of Cutler, and is known as the Petty Place. They operate two combined harvesters, and in 1900 had eighty head of work horses.

December 31, 1889, Loyal O. Cutler was united in marriage with Miss Villa Chrisman, who was born in Tulare county. They have one son, Harold Oliver. Though not an aspirant for office, Mr. Cutler has always been an ardent supporter of the Republican party. A member of a pioneer family, Mr. Cutler has, by his earnestness of purpose, strict integrity and public spirit; gained recognition as a worthy representative of the younger generation of citizens in Tulare county.

WILLIAM A. HORSLEY. The firm of J. R. Horsley & Son, of Snelling, represents one of the largest and best-equipped mercantile establishments in Merced county. Its original establishment is due to the energy and resource of J. R. Horsley, a pioneer of 1850, but its subsequent successful management is to be attributed as well to an infusion of younger blood and ambition in the person of his son and business partner, William A. Horsley. Joseph R. Horsley was born in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1828, and as a young man moved to Indiana, where he married Catherine Caldwell, of Ohio, and where his son, William A., was born January 11, 1853. The family is of English descent, the immigrating ancestor being the paternal grandfather, James Horsley, who sailed for the United States at an early day and identified himself with trade interests in Philadelphia.

Joseph R. Horsley left his family in Indiana in 1850 and crossed the plains with ox-teams, accompanied by his brother, Washington, with whom he worked in the mines for a couple of years. Pleased with the climate and prospects, the brothers brought their hoard back to Indiana by way of Panama in 1852, and in 1857 the entire family came to California, William A. being at that time four years old. From Panama they sailed on the steamer Golden Gate, and arriving in California, located at Knights Ferry, Stanislaus county, where Mr. Horsley mined until 1859. He then took charge of the store of Mr. Reese, in Jeffersonville, Tuolumne county, until 1868, returning then to Knights Ferry, where he was employed as bookkeeper for the Stanislaus Mills for nine years. By this time his son William A. had grown into a strong and capable young man, had proved himself useful in the general merchandise store at Jeffersonville, and had gotten a good start as a farmer in Stanislaus county. Father and son joined their farming interests upon the former's resigning from the Stanislaus Milling Company, continuing to raise grain and stock on eleven hundred and eighty acres of land until disposing of their property in 1877. They then moved to Snelling and farmed for a year, after which they purchased the Snelling hotel and ran the same until 1884. During this time they also engaged in a general merchandise business in Snelling, which, because of its rapid growth, justified them in retiring from the hotel business and devoting all of their time to their store. In time they established another store at Waterford, each establishment carrying at the present time a stock of about $11,000. They have a complete line of general merchandise, are moderate in their prices, and maintain uniform courtesy and consideration in dealing with their many patrons. They are among the popular and substantial upbuilders of mercantile superiority in Merced county, and enjoy an extended reputation for public spirit and enterprise. The elder Horsley has held a number of offices, among them that of justice of the peace; he is a staunch Democrat in national affairs, voting for the best man for local offices.

William A. Horsley was educated in the public schools, and has pursued his entire business career in connection with that of his father. He married Anna Owens, a native of Pennsylvania, who came to California in 1878 with her father, J. M. Owens. They have two children, Earl A. and Samuel O. Mr. Horsley follows the family inclination politically, being a Democrat in national politics, and is fraternally connected with the Ancient Order of United Workmen. He is genial, able and painstaking, sharing with his father the honor of conducting a thoroughly up-to-date and growing business.

MAJOR MARION SIDES. Among the representative men of Fresno county, Marion Sides has held a position of prominence. As president of the First National Bank of Selma, he is an advocate of a conservative policy and endeavors to do all in his power to avoid all wild-cat speculation. His ability to judge others has been of untold benefit to him in his business career as a banker, merchant and farmer. He was born in Perry county, Mo., January 27, 1837, a son of Elihu and Daisy (Welker) Sides, the former a native of North Carolina, and the latter of Perry county, where they both died.

Elihu Sides located in Missouri at an early day and engaged in farming, a vocation he followed with success for many years. Marion Sides received his education in the common schools of Perry county and assisted with the work upon the home farm until 1861, at which time he enlisted in Company D, Fifth Missouri Cavalry, and was afterward transferred to the Forty-eighth Infantry, taking part in many engagements of the war. After being mustered out of service in 1866, he returned to his home and engaged in a general merchandise business for one year, then took up farm work until 1875, when he disposed of his holdings and came to California, believing this state offered better inducements for an ambitious young man. Locating at once in Fresno county he homesteaded one hundred and sixty acres, two miles north of the present site of Selma, and began its cultivation and improvement. As success came his way he has added to his original tract, and now owns about eight hundred acres of valuable land devoted to diversified farming interests. He also was interested in the lumber business in Reedley, and is a stockholder and president of the First National Bank.

Mr. Sides has been twice married, the first union was in Dent county, Mo., with Casander Matthews, a native of Missouri. Two children were born to them, both now deceased, Effic A., who married Charles E. Walker, and Ira M. Mrs. Sides died in Fresno county, April 8, 1894. In Fresno county, June 11, 1895, he was again married, Ollie M. Davies, a native of Tennessee, becoming his wife. Of this union two children have been born, Richard D. and Thomas M. The family are members of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, Mr. Sides serving as trustee. In his political preference he is a Democrat, and always cast his vote with that party, except when Abraham Lincoln was a candidate. While a resident of Dent county, Mo., he represented his district in the state legislature two terms, serving his constituents in an efficient manner. Since becoming a resident of California he has never been an aspirant for official honors. He has always been a friend of education and been a supporter and advocate of a high standard of schools and instructors. In all of his social and business relations with the people he has always adhered to the principles of fair dealing and strict business integrity; has always supported those measures which he considered worthy of his co-operation, and by his public spirit has attained a position as one of the leading citizens of Selma and Fresno county.

FRED BARCROFT. In his lineage, Fred Barcroft, an influential business man of Madera, represents an old-established eastern family and also an aristocratic Castilian race. His father, R. W., was a son of John Barcroft, a merchant tailor of Cadiz, Ohio, and in that city was born, reared and learned the trades of merchant tailor and carpenter. During 1849 he crossed the plains with ox-teams and engaged in placer and quartz mining in Mariposa county, continuing in that occupation until 1899, when he retired. In addition, he also followed contracting and building. By reason of ill health, he is now debarred from business activities, and is living retired in Madera. After coming to California he married Rafila Orosco, who was born near Casa Grande, Ariz., the daughter of a pioneer Spanish rancher who owned large tracts near Casa Grande and was murdered there by the Apache savages. Afterward his widow brought the children to California and about 1852 settled in Hornitos, Mariposa county. She died November 6, 1901, in Madera, at the age of almost eighty-four years. She was born in southern Arizona and was a member of the Herrera family. A devout Roman Catholic, she taught a private school for years, charging tuition when the children were able to pay, but teaching those who were poor without any charge whatever. Her principal object in teaching the children to read and write Spanish was that she might have an opportunity to inculcate in their hearts the doctrines of Catholicism. She was also a skilled needlewoman and devoted considerable time to teaching fancy work.

In the family of R. W. and Rafila Barcroft there were seven children, namely: Rafael, who is engaged in the hardware business in Merced; Fred, of Madera; David, a graduate of the University of California and of the Johns Hopkins University at Baltimore, who died at the age of thirty-one years; Caroline, who died at the age of nine years; Mrs. Mary Wilkinson, of Stockton; Joseph, who is a justice of the peace in Madera; and Louisa, who died at sixteen years of age.

In Hornitos, Mariposa county, Fred Barcroft was born July 31, 1858. During boyhood he attended district schools. When about seventeen years of age he was apprenticed to the tinsmith's trade in Merced under J. Kocher, with whom he remained for five and one-half years. At the expiration of his time he started in business for himself, opening a hardware store at Merced with a partner under the firm title of Branson & Barcroft. During the three years he remained in Merced a branch store was started in Madera December 23, 1883, and he came to this city to assume its management. October 1, 1884, he sold his interest in the Merced store to his brother Rafael, after which he devoted his entire attention to the Madera business. For the first two years he rented a store room adjoining H. S. Williams' store and then erected a frame building on the site of his present establishment. The shop was neatly and conveniently equipped with every facility for the conduct of the business. In addition to carrying a stock of hardware and tinware, he had plumbing outfits and did considerable business in this line. July 19, 1886, the building was destroyed by fire. He immediately rebuilt, but the building was for temporary use only, it being his intention to replace it as soon as possible. Before he had commenced a new building fire again destroyed his shop, April 20, 1895. All that he saved was a punching machine of his own invention, used in the punching of sheet iron for tanks and well casing.

After his second heavy loss by fire, Mr. Barcroft began to construct a more substantial building than those he had previously occupied. Brick was used instead of lumber, and every effort was made to secure a building that could not readily succumb to the fire element, the new structure being three stories and basement, the highest building in the city, and in dimensions 25x80 feet. Even this new building was not to escape unscathed, for the fiery element attacked it also July 2, 1904, with disastrous results. His shops in the rear were destroyed and also the woodwork in the rear and side of the building. But with that quality of grit that has characterized the Californian, Mr. Barcroft set about restoring the damaged portions, extending his shop to 38x70 feet, including a two-story brick on the west side of his first building, 25x80 feet, which he leases. He devoted the basement and first floor to a line of heavy and shelf hardware, stoves and tinware. His shop and plumbing establishment are the largest in the city. He handles also gasoline engines and the Aermotor windmills.

The Madera Chamber of Commerce numbers Mr. Barcroft among its active members. In politics he votes with the Republican party, and fraternally is connected with the Ancient Order of United Workmen, Woodmen of the World, Foresters and Fraternal Brotherhood. His first marriage occurred in Hornitos and united him with Carmen Navarine, who was born in that city and died in Los Angeles. Afterward he married Cornelia Reyes, of Madera, a native of Watsonville, this state, and they have one daughter, Dolores.

JOHN MADISON WALTHALL. That Mr. Walthall is popular as a Republican in a Democratic county, being twice elected to the office of district attorney, his first nomination occurring a week after his graduation, speaks well for the character of the man, the strength and dignity of the purpose which has animated him in his brief but eminently successful career as a lawyer of Modesto. Though young in years he has already evidenced his ability and has made his influence felt in legal circles in the community, and that which has been accomplished presages a career of exceptional interest and success. A native of the state, he was born in San Joaquin county, December 31, 1871, a son of Madison Walthall, Jr., and grandson of Madison Walthall, Sr.

Madison Walthall, Sr., was born in Richmond, Va., and was there reared to manhood, remaining in his native state until the breaking out of the Mexican war, when he enlisted and going to Mississippi found his way two years later, via the Isthmus, to California. Locating in San Jose, he early became an important factor in the political life of the state, as a Democrat being elected to the first legislature, in which he served with commendable enthusiasm and ability. Thoroughly imbued with the pioneer spirit, he decided to cast in his lot permanently with the fortunes of the state, and soon purchased a large tract of land, containing five hundred acres, upon which he engaged in the agricultural pursuits which so early marked the development of this particular section of the west. In 1851 he sent for his son, Madison Walthall, Jr., who located at Stockton, where the elder man had purchased three hundred acres of land, and where his death occurred by a fall from a window, when much advanced in years.

Madison Walthall, Jr., there engaged in mining and farming, and was also actively engaged in surveying throughout the state, being for some years employed in a land office and the real estate business. In 1872 he died near the place which had been his first home in the west. He married Emma Covert, a native of Arkansas, who died here in 1875, at the age of thirty-three years. Her father, John Covert, came to California in 1838 with John C. Fremont, returning to the States overland, after which he brought his family west. Upon his second arrival in the state he engaged in the general merchandise business at Tuolumne City, this county, later locating in Modesto where he remained until his removal to Tulare, where his death occurred. Of the four children born to Mr. and Mrs. Madison Walthall, Jr., two died in infancy, the others being J. M. of this sketch and Stella, who is married to Judge E. A. Belcher, of San Francisco.

Mr. Walthall has spent his entire life in his native state, as a child attending the common schools in the vicinity of his home, and afterward entering the San Mateo school where he took a preparatory course, graduating with the degree of B.S. In 1895 he entered Hastings Law College, from which institution he was graduated three years later with the degree of B.L. Coming at once to Modesto a week afterward he received the nomination for district attorney and was elected, serving two terms in an entirely efficient manner. Since 1901 he has carried on his practice in partnership with L. L. Dennett, the two having a constantly increasing clientele. Fraternally he is a member of the Knights of Pythias and Woodmen of the World, and politically is a Republican, having always been active in the promotion of the principles he indorses. He has served as delegate to the state convention and in many other ways has aided in the support of Republicanism.

WILLIS RUSSELL HIGH. Among the representative business men of Modesto and Stanislaus county, Willis Russell High occupies a prominent position, won by his own efforts since his advent to California in 1883. He is now connected with the business interests of Modesto through the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank, of which he is now president, having been elected to that position in October, 1903, having previously served as vice-president after assisting materially in the organization of the bank. He is a large land owner and extensively interested in the land in the Turlock irrigation district, having five hundred and twenty acres which he intends opening in the spring of 1904. A native of Tennessee, he was born in Smith county March 30, 1860, the son of James T. High.

James T. High was also a native of Tennessee, being a merchant by occupation during his earlier years, and later in life engaging as a farmer. He is now living retired from the active cares of life in Alexandria, Tenn., at the age of eighty years. He married Elizabeth Austin, who was born in Glasgow, Ky., and she is also living. To them were born eleven children, six sons and five daughters, of whom all attained maturity with the exception of the youngest two. William Russell High was the fourth child and the third son, and received his scholastic education in the common schools of his native state and the Masonic Academy located at Elmwood, Smith county. In 1883 he came to California, locating in Stanislaus county, one mile north of Modesto, where he bought one hundred and sixty acres of land. In addition to this farm he cultivated five thousand acres located in Madera county, this land being devoted entirely to the raising of grain. From a small and modest beginning he has accumulated considerable property and become an influential man in the business of the city. During the year 1900 he acted as a director of the irrigation district.

The marriage of Mr. High occurred in Modesto and united him with Olive Drake, a native of this city, and the daughter of Jacob Drake, a native of Illinois, who crossed the plains to California during the Civil war, locating as a farmer near Modesto in 1861. Here his death occurred, after a long and useful life. For about fifty years of his life he had followed his trade which was that of machinist. Fraternally he was a member of the Masonic order. Politically he was a Democrat. The children born to Mr. High and his wife are named in order of birth as follows: Benjamin Hugh, Delma Gertrude, James Luther, Lester Homer and Vera. Fraternally Mr. High is a member of Modesto Lodge No. 149, I. O. O. F., and Stockton Lodge No. 218, B. P. O. E. Politically he adheres to the principles advocated in the platform of the Democratic party.

HON. JAMES W. HALEY, manager of the Haley ranch of five thousand acres, twenty miles northwest of Los Banos, and ex-member of the state legislature, was born in St. Louis, Mo., July 12, 1849, the oldest of the four sons and two daughters of William and Esther (Byrns) Haley. William Haley was born in county Wicklow, Ireland, and prior to coming to America married and operated a farm of his own for a number of years. In St. Louis he conceived the idea of joining his fortunes to the growing west, and with ox-teams left Missouri in March, 1852, crossing the plains in the usual time, and with the usual number of adventures. The mines of Trinity county yielded him $8,000, and in the fall of 1853 he returned to his wife and two sons by way of Panama, again turning his steps westward in 1854, accompanied by his family, in whom he had aroused a spirit of interest in the coast country. He started one of the pioneer dairy industries in San Francisco in 1861, and it is a tribute to him as a substantial business man that the small business thus inaugurated under scarcely promising circumstances, grew into a permanent enterprise, and is still conducted by his sons, with the dairy depot, on the corner of Buchanan and Union streets. Mr. Haley's life continued a busy one until his death in 1882, at the age of fifty-eight years. He trained all of his sons in the dairy business, and his two youngest, Daniel T. and William E., are still owners and managers of the old dairy in San Francisco, known as the Laurel Vale Dairy. His second oldest son, Michael C., was formerly county clerk in San Francisco, and is now living retired in that city.

Although but five years of age when his father brought him to California, Hon. James W. Haley distinctly recalls crossing the Isthmus of Panama on the back of a mule, and afterward inaugurating his industrial career as a milk peddler in the streets of San Francisco. He was twelve years old at the time, and later carried his milk on horseback, still later being supplied with a wagon, filled at the home on the corner of Greenwich and Buchanan streets. He was educated in the old Beach school, the Spring Valley grammar school, the first of its kind in San Francisco, from which he graduated in the spring of 1863, and St. Ignatius College, which he attended three years. He continued with the Laurel Vale Dairy until 1870, in which year himself and brother, M. C., rented a dairy, continuing the same until Mr. Haley's marriage, after which he dissolved the partnership and engaged in an independent business. He was united with Rose Smith, a native of Wallabout, Long Island, N. Y. The Golden City Dairy prospered under his management until 1881, when he sold out his business and located on the west side of Merced county, purchasing land on San Luis creek, and engaging in stock raising. He was successful beyond his expectations, met with a ready response from the San Francisco markets, and finally was obliged to purchase more land in order to supply demands for his stock. He now controls five thousand acres, and raises principally Devonshire cattle and blooded horses. His land is watered by San Luis creek, and admirably adapted for the purpose intended. Mr. Haley has the most modern and practical of improvements, and lives in a manner befitting his enlightened and progressive views. His only living child, George J., is attending St. Mary's College, of Oakland, a member of the class of '06. He is fond of out-door sports and is the best amateur short stop in California.

Mr. Haley's active political service began in 1890, when he was elected supervisor of the fifth district, his re-election following in 1894, and his term expiring in January, 1899. For the last two years he was chairman of the board. In 1900 he was elected to the state legislature, representing the fifty-seventh legislative district, which embraces Stanislaus and Merced counties, and received the largest Democratic majority in the history of the district. During the session of 1901 he served on the committee on roads and irrigation, succeeding in handling and securing the passage of the Modesto refunding bill; the water credit bill, a very important measure; the Coyote scalp bill, and the county government bill of Stanislaus and Merced counties. He is now a member of the county central committee, and has been a delegate to various state and county conventions. Mr. Haley is noted for the shrewdness and practicability of his views upon public questions, and his influence is accordingly emphatic and far reaching. He is a generous contributor to all worthy causes, is public spirited and a promoter of education, morality and good government.

ELLWOOD OLIVER LARKINS. When the second war with England began among those who enlisted to fight for the United States was William Larkins, who some years before had crossed the ocean to establish his home in the new world and who proved his loyalty to his adopted country by faithful service at the front. A grandson of this soldier, J. B. Larkins, was born in Birmingham, Pa., and during 1850 settled in Ohio, engaging in the mercantile business at East Liverpool, Columbiana county. From there in 1861 he removed to Meigs county, Ohio, where he not only carried on a store, but also engaged in general farm pursuits. The year 1866 witnessed his removal to Linn county, Mo., where he added stock raising to his duties as a merchant. He later removed to Kirksville, which continued to be his home until 1899, when he was killed by the cyclone that passed through that town.

In the family of J. B. Larkins was a son, E. O., born at East Liverpool, Ohio, December 16, 1854. Primarily educated in the public schools of his native town, he had the further advantage of attending the Missouri state normal school at Kirksville, where he prepared for educational work. During 1874 he was employed as a teacher in the schools of Salisbury, Chariton county, Mo., and the following year acted as principal of the schools of Laeled, Linn county, that state. Already he had resolved to become an attorney, and with that ambition before him he took up law studies under Harrington & Stover of Kirksville. From Missouri he came to California in the summer of 1875 and for a time was a law student under Van Dyke & Wells, of San Francisco. From 1877 to 1880 he held the principalship of the Meridian public schools and for three years of that period acted as a member of the board of education of Sutter county. On resigning there he accepted the chair of mathematics in the Visalia normal school, a private institution, where he continued an instructor for four years. In 1884 he was elected principal of the grammar and high schools of Visalia, but resigned the following year in order to devote his attention to the practice of law.

His since successful connection with the law proves that Mr. Larkins selected wisely in choosing a profession. The talents with which he is endowed by nature qualify him for the logical reasoning, keen insight and wise judgment demanded of an attorney. Furthermore, a fine command of language and ready eloquence make him a popular speaker, both in the court room with judge and jury, and on the stump in political campaigns. His work as a speaker in the interests of Senator George C. Perkins when candidate for governor received frequent praise, nor was he less active in the McKinley campaign of 1896 and the Roosevelt campaign of 1904. Indeed, in every campaign when the principles of the Republican party are at stake, he willingly devotes time and money to the promotion of their success. At other times, however, he devotes himself closely to professional work, and in leisure hours is a student of his fine law library, broadening his knowledge of the intricacies and technicalities of the profession. Formerly he was a partner of Hon. J. F. Wharton of Fresno and Hon. Tipton Lindsey of Visalia, but both of these gentlemen are now dead, and he practices alone. Much of the important litigation of the San Joaquin valley has been in his charge, but civil cases are his preference and his specialties are water rights and land titles. For several years he was a director in the Bank of Visalia, and is the owner of the Larkins building in this place. Now, as in earlier life, educational affairs receive his attention and aid. He was a member of the educational commission of California. For years he has been a member of the Republican state central committee. Fraternally he is connected with the Woodmen of the World, Ancient Order of United Workmen and Independent Order of Odd Fellows at Visalia, and is active in Masonry as a member of Lodge, Chapter and Commandery, having received the eighteen degrees, including that of Scottish Rite, thirty-second degree.

The marriage of Mr. Larkins united him with Sallie C. Callaway, of Waverly, Mo., a descendant of the Boone family and closely related to the Hardins of Kentucky. The famous pioneer Daniel Boone, was one of her ancestors, and it is matter of history that his daughter, Jennina, became the wife of a gallant young Kentuckian, bearing the name of Callaway, who rescued her from the Indians with the greatest daring and bravery. Four daughters comprise the family of Mr. and Mrs. Larkins, namely: Zoe P., who is a graduate of Leland Stanford, Jr., University and married Roydon I. Woolsey, of Berkeley; Carroll, a graduate of the Visalia high school; Addie T. and Calla, who are at home.

ORPEALYER P. MUNSON. In Orpealyer P. Munson, near Crows Landing, is found a representative of the third generation of his family to identify himself with the growing fortunes of the great state of California. The name was first known in the mining camps of the coast through the emigration of his paternal grandfather, Charles F. Munson, one of those rugged sons of Maine who have ever been associated with strong personal characteristics and great perseverance. Perfecting himself in the carpenter's trade as a young man, an occupation with which his ancestors had long been familiar, he not only paved the way for others to put to sea, but applied his craft to the furtherance of the supreme ambition of his life, that of locating in and growing up with the Pacific coast country. Constructing a ship of strong timber, he sailed from his bleak native coast, weathering the storm and calms of two oceans with his noble craft, and eventually landed on a sunnier and more promising shore. Locating in French Camp, Cal., he worked with pick and pan with moderate success, and soon afterward started a hotel for the accommodation of the fortune-seeking public. He was successful as a miner and hotel-keeper, and in these occupations laid the foundation for the fortune which maintained him in comfort up to the time of his death in 1892. His son Orpealyer P., Sr., was born on his ranch in the San Joaquin valley, and upon starting out upon his independent career located in Merced county, ten miles from Turlock, remaining there until 1891. He settled on fourteen hundred acres of leased land in Stanislaus county in the latter year, where he died September 18, 1893, at the age of fifty-two years. He was married to Mary L. Houser, a native of Pennsylvania, and reared a family of three sons and one daughter, namely: Orpealyer P., Jr., George L., Benjamin E., and Leta R. The honest efforts and industry of this worthy son of the grand old pioneer were amply rewarded in the gaining of an independent competency. He was successful in his occupation and has left his widow in independent and comfortable circumstances. She is a woman possessed of sound faculties and cheerful views of life.

To the property rented by the elder Munson, and devoted to extensive grain raising, land has been added from time to time, until at present Orpealyer P., Jr., and his brother, George L., rent three thousand acres, all under wheat and barley. Theirs is one of the largest grain-raising enterprises in Stanislaus county, and both men stand high as authorities upon their particular line of activity. The land is all in the San Joaquin valley, and the majority in Stanislaus county, and is of a kind particularly adapted to grain raising. As the older of the brothers, Orpealyer P., Jr., is the chief manager of the property.

Mr. Munson is an energetic and practical man, progressive in the extreme, and popular with his fellow agriculturists of Stanislaus county. He is a Republican in national politics, but as yet has taken no active part in local affairs. Fraternally he is identified with the Ancient Order of United Workmen. Mr. Munson's prosperity is reared upon a common school education, a keen knowledge of scientific farming, and a high regard for the dignity and importance of his chosen occupation.

REUBEN A. EDMONDS. The postoffice at Bakersfield, which is under the supervision of Mr. Edmonds as postmaster, ranks among the leading second-class offices of California. Accuracy, promptness and system are noticeable features in the administration of the office. To assist in the assortment and distribution of the mail seven clerks are employed, besides which four carriers take charge of the city delivery and one carrier covers the rural route. During his tenure of the position it has been the aim of the postmaster to facilitate the delivery of mail and thus promote the interests of the people, and he has been so successful in his efforts that people of all political beliefs testify to his fidelity as an official.

Mr. Edmonds was born in Lane county, Ore., January 14, 1859. His father, William Edmonds, was a native of Carlisle, Pa., and at an early age went to Illinois. From there he worked his way across the plains to Oregon and entered the mines, since which time he has made mining his occupation, and, though now seventy years of age, he still continues actively at work. When Reuben A. Edmonds was a boy of six years his mother died. He was then taken into the home of his grandmother near Santa Rosa, Sonoma county, Cal., and later remained for a time at Kellogg, Napa county. After spending a short period in Oregon he entered the public schools of Napa City, where he was a pupil for seven years. His education was further extended by a course of study in the Napa Collegiate Institute, where he made a specialty of bookkeeping. In 1881 he came to Bakersfield and, by the exercise of constant economy and perseverance, he reaped a gratifying measure of success and built up a dry goods business that was important and remunerative. Unfortunately, the great fire of 1889 found him without insurance and his loss was complete. Being thus forced to begin at the bottom once more, he secured a position as clerk and bookkeeper, and worked in that capacity for five years.

The Republican party has always had a firm champion in Mr. Edmonds. For twenty years he has been a local leader. At different times he was chosen to occupy minor offices. In 1898 he was honored by receiving the appointment as postmaster under President McKinley and four years later was reappointed to the office. After coming to Bakersfield he married Miss Elizabeth Hallet of Napa, by whom he has two children, Shirlee A. and Reubelle, both at home. On the organization of the Knights of Pythias lodge at Bakersfield he became one of its charter members, and his fraternal relations are further supplemented by membership in the Bakersfield Lodge of Elks.

WILLIAM VAN BUCKNER. In the comparatively brief history of Kings county, William Van Buckner figures as one of its most successful agricultural and horticultural promoters, as well as its only citizen thus far to hold the office of sheriff. Continuously since the organization of the county in 1893 he has dignified a position calling for more than the average tact, discretion and judgment, evidencing particular aptitude for the office and winning the good-will of the community, regardless of political creed. His duties have been accompanied by the hardships and trials usually associated with the office in comparatively new localities, but he has met them with courage and wisdom, and to the satisfaction of the law and order loving portion of the community. Continuous residence in the unsettled west since early boyhood has made him most familiar with the cosmopolitan element which comprises his environment, and his knowledge of human nature at its worst and best has come to be of immense use to him in the adjustment of the numerous complications which have confronted him.

Mr. Buckner was born near Fort Scott, Kans., August 31, 1859, his father, William G. Buckner, having removed to that section from his native state, Tennessee. The family came to California in 1863, settling first in San Joaquin county, and in 1868 locating in Stanislaus county, where they resided until 1881. During the latter year Mr. Buckner purchased his crude farm of eighty acres, improved it for general farming and fruit-raising, and sold it in 1890. Following his pronounced religious bent, he then engaged in missionary work in the South Pacific islands for two or three years, representing the Seventh Day Adventists, with whom he has been identified for many years. He is now living in retirement in San Jose, Cal., and is about seventy-six years of age. Through his marriage with Nancy Butts, who died in 1877, four sons were born, namely: Henry F., a railroad contractor of Washington; James B., who died in 1885; Andrew E., a rancher in the vicinity of Lemoore, and William V.

William Van Buckner was reared on his father's farm in Stanislaus county, and his education was received in the country schools and the grammar school at Modesto. In 1881 he accompanied his father to Tulare county, where he purchased a ranch of eighty acres. This property, which is now managed by his brother, he still owns. Upon the organization of Kings county he was elected to the office of sheriff, an honor which was entirely unexpected on his part. Yielding to the earnest solicitations of friends he allowed his name to be used, and the hearty support accorded him was convincing proof of his popularity and general fitness for the office. He was re-elected in 1894, 1898 and 1902, and public sentiment appears to favor his retention of the office so long as he will consent to fill it.

Mr. Buckner is a stockholder and director in the Hanford National Bank. In politics he has always been an advocate of the principles of the Republican party, though at no time in his life has he been what might be termed a politician. Fraternally he is well known and prominent, being a charter member of Lemoore Court No. 196, I. O. F.; Hanford Lodge No. 194, K. P.; Woodmen of the World, and the Knights of Maccabees.

Upon the organization of Company I, Sixth Regiment, California National Guard, March

A. M. White

14, 1900, he was elected first lieutenant, serving two terms of two years each.

Personally Mr. Buckner is a quiet and unassuming man. Underlying his nature is the iron and determination which make his influence felt, as well as the kindness and benevolence which enable him to do much good while seeing that the majesty of the law is upheld. He cheerfully co-operates with his fellow-citizens in the promotion of all well-considered movements tending toward the betterment of social, moral, educational or industrial conditions in the community, and has always had the best interests of the whole people at heart.

HUFFMAN MICHAEL WHITE. An extensive land owner and a pioneer whose earliest efforts have been enlisted in the cause of up-building and developing the western state that he made his home, Huffman M. White is esteemed as a citizen of worth and integrity and a potent factor in the commercial, political and social life of the community. He was born in Tioga county, N. Y., March 14, 1824, a son of Silas and grandson of Joshua White, both natives of Dutchess county, N. Y., where the death of the latter occurred. Silas White went to Illinois in 1838 as a pioneer and located in LaSalle county, where he engaged in farming until his death. His wife, Maria McClave in maidenhood, was born in New York state and died in Illinois. They were the parents of five sons and four daughters, of whom Huffman Michael White was the third in order of birth.

Reared to manhood in Illinois, to which state he accompanied his parents when he was fourteen years of age, Huffman M. White received his education in the public schools in the vicinity of his home. On attaining maturity he engaged in lumbering in Grundy county, in 1844 operating a sawmill in that section of country. In 1850 he followed the westward trend of civilization, making a trip across the plains by horse-teams, consuming one hundred and one days from St. Joseph, Mo. The trip was a pleasant one, even in the midst of hardships and privations which were necessarily incident to such travel. Upon his safe arrival in California Mr. White followed mining in Sacramento and Eldorado counties for about three months. The fall of 1852 found Mr. White in Parajo, Santa Cruz county, where he farmed and raised potatoes and barley. He was probably the largest potato raiser in California at that time, having as many as seven hundred acres planted to that vegetable. He marketed his produce in San Francisco, by means of a line of vessels which he owned, and amassed a fortune of $100,000 in the business. One of his vessels, the Young America, was sent to Melbourne, Australia, in charge of his brother, but the boat was lost at sea with all on board. Mr. White suffered another loss in the burning of one of his vessels while anchored in the harbor. In the spring of 1865 Mr. White went to Sacramento, where he engaged in the wholesale mercantile business, and two years later came to Tulare county, and in Visalia was interested in mercantile pursuits for a year. Coming then to the Frazier river valley he pre-empted and purchased land, until today he owns twenty-three hundred acres. The land available for grain purposes he rents; while the balance is devoted to the raising of stock.

In Visalia Mr. White was united in marriage with Mrs. Jerusha (Anthony) Brown, born in New York state, and a daughter of Paul Anthony, Jr., and Hannah Eddy, natives of Massachusetts and Vermont, respectively. By her first marriage Mrs. White became the mother of two sons, Clinton T. and William W. Brown, the former residing in Plano, and the latter in Portersville.

To Mrs. White belongs the distinction of planting the first orange tree in this vicinity. The seed was brought from the Society Islands by Captain McLaughlin, of the United States Volunteer army. One tree which came from this seed was planted in the White ranch, and is still standing, an honored patriarch of California trees, and the first tree to be planted in Tulare county. When seven years old this tree bore ten oranges, which were sold at $1 apiece, and the sum which they brought, $10, was given by Mrs. White to the building fund of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Portersville. A lemon tree planted at the same time bore fruit when three years old. Mrs. White may well claim the honor and distinction of being the mother of horticulture in the San Joaquin valley.

In his political convictions Mr. White is a staunch Republican and has always taken an active interest in the workings of that party. He served as a delegate to the first Republican convention held in Sacramento, and subsequently was a candidate for election to the assembly, being defeated by only fifteen votes. He has repeatedly served as school trustee, and for the year of 1905 was a delegate to the state convention, being the oldest man in that body.

JOHN T. DUNLAP. Kings county has among its citizens many men of more than the average ability and intelligence who are doing a great work for its advancement, and John T. Dunlap may with justice be classed among that number. He was born in Somerset county, Me., January 29, 1855, a son of Guy Dunlap, also a native of Maine, where as a farmer and lumberman he spent his entire life of seventy-six years. Mrs. Jane A. (Tinkham) Dunlap, the mother of John T., was also a native of Somerset county, Me., where her entire life was spent, and where her death occurred at the comparatively early age of forty-six years.

When most other boys were enjoying a freedom from care it fell to the lot of John T. Dunlap to give a helping hand in the support of the family, and when only fourteen years old he began working on farms adjacent to the parental home. At sixteen he had his first experience at railroad work, being on the construction force, which gave him employment only during the summer months, while he found work in the straw hat manufactories at Medway and Framingham, Mass., that occupied his time during the winters. After working in the vicinity of his parents' home for about ten years he found a better opening in Milwaukee, Wis., and thither he went in the fall of 1880, taking a position in the straw hat works in that place. Hard work had impaired his health to some extent and he deemed a short respite advisable. Not content to be idle, however, he went to Kingsbury county, S. Dak., and pre-empted a tract of one hundred and sixty acres of land, to which he has since added until he now has four hundred and eighty acres of land, which is constantly growing more valuable. The latter acquisition is located in Clark county and was pre-empted in the spring of 1882. He carried on general farming in that state until December, 1891, when he sold his stock and, leasing his farm, came to California in the employ of the Solano Colony, which owned a section of land five miles northeast of Hanford which had been laid out for the purpose of inducing settlers to locate there. The first attempt had not proved a success, but Mr. Dunlap gave practical assistance, planting trees and vines, and in various ways was instrumental in putting the settlers in a position to become independent of assistance. The land was divided into ten and twenty acre tracts. After two years spent in the employ of the company Mr. Dunlap opened a brick yard in Hanford and also erected a brick residence. He subsequently sold his property and invested the proceeds in town lots, which in turn were given in part payment for his present home of eighty acres planted to trees and vines, and valued at $187.50 per acre. He has recently added to the original tract, which was forty acres, and now practically all of the land is devoted to fruits and vines.

Mr. Dunlap was married to Louise Slocum, who was born in Massachusetts, and who was taken to Milwaukee, Wis., when a very young child. She received an excellent education in the schools of that city, qualifying herself as a teacher of German, and finally became principal of the Deaf and Dumb Institute, being connected with the institution when it was conducted as a private institution and also after it became a state institution. Mr. and Mrs. Dunlap have two children, Marjorie and Carol, both of whom are attending school. Mr. Dunlap has been a hard worker all of his life, starting out when only thirteen years old to care for himself, and his course throughout life has been one of steady purpose and determination. His success speaks for itself in the interests which have grown up around him and in the esteem in which he is held by his fellow-citizens. Mr. Dunlap is a director in the Baby King Oil Company, which owns wells in Fresno county, and is also a member of the Raisin Growers' Association.

JAMES RUTHERFORD. The twenty-acre farm of James Rutherford bears evidence of the thrifty and painstaking methods of this venerable farmer of the vicinity of Fresno. Mr. Rutherford belongs to that number who have come and gone and returned to the west, impelled by the nameless charm which clings with renewed persistency when one is again subjected to the trying winters and uncertain elements of the eastern part of the country. He was born in Lincoln county, Ky., August 11, 1821, and is a son of James and Polly Anne (Huntsman) Rutherford. The former was born near Lexington, Ky., and the latter in Lincoln county, the same state. The parents moved to Howard county, Mo., when James, Jr., was a small lad, and there the mother died, leaving eight children, of whom James is the seventh and the only one living. Later the family located on a farm in Randolph county, Mo., where the father died, and whence his son and namesake removed to Pike county, Mo., July 10, 1844. Here he learned the carpenter's trade with his brother, and while thus employed became interested in the stream of emigration for the gold fields of California. Outfitting with ox teams, he went overland in the usual time, starting April 13, 1850, and arriving at Hangtown August 29, 1850. A winter spent on the American river failed to produce any of the startling evidences of wealth which Mr. Rutherford had dreamed, and the following spring he returned to Pike county by way of Central America. Here he joined his wife, whom he had married in 1848, and who was formerly Margaret A. Van Noy, a native of Pike county. She is a daughter of Dr. Nathan Van Noy, who, with his wife, came from the Carolinas to Tennessee and from there to Missouri. In the latter state, in Pike county, Dr. Van Noy practiced medicine for many years.

In 1887 Mr. Rutherford sold his farm in Pike county, Mo., and came to Fresno, where he plied his trade in the town for some years. In 1892 he bought his present farm of twenty acres, six miles east of Fresno. It is devoted principally to horticulture, Mr. Rutherford having fifteen acres under orchard and vineyard, and the balance under general farming. Success has come to him, and he has not only made a delightful home, but has reared ten of his twelve children, giving them all a practical common school education and otherwise fitting them to fight their independent battles of life. The children were: Mary Eliza, Martha A., Sarah E. (deceased), William N., Frances L., Ellen, Julia, James L., Robert, John (deceased), Albert and Effie. Mr. Rutherford is a broad-minded and public-spirited man, popular with his neighbors and always ready to help those less fortunate than himself. He is independent in politics and a member of the Christian Church, which both himself and wife joined while living in Missouri.

JUDGE FRED G. OSTRANDER. Prominent among the attorneys of Fresno is Judge F. G. Ostrander. Prior to locating in this city, he had become well known throughout Merced county, having served as district attorney, and as judge of the superior court, positions which he filled with eminent ability. Of keen perceptive faculties, practical and logical, the finding of facts and the principles of law seldom elude his notice, and his decisions are invariably just. A native of California, he was born October 8, 1861, in Merced county, a son of H. J. Ostrander. His paternal grandfather, Peter Ostrander, came from old Knickerbocker stock, having been descended from one of three brothers named Ostrander that emigrated from Holland to America, and settled in New York in colonial times. He was a farmer by occupation and spent his entire life in the Empire state.

Born and reared in Petersboro, N. Y., H. J. Ostrander migrated to California soon after the discovery of gold was heralded through the country, coming through Mexico and Lower California, up through the San Joaquin Valley to the gold fields. After mining for awhile, he embarked in the stock business, becoming an extensive raiser of cattle and sheep. He had his headquarters in Merced county, of which he was one of the earliest and most prominent pioneers and Ostrander Lake and Ostrander Rocks, near Yosemite, were named in his honor. He has continued in business as a stock-raiser and dealer until the present time. Always ready to advance the agricultural interests of his community, he was one of the first incorporators of the Farmers' Canal Company, which was later known as the Crocker-Huffman Canal Company, and was one of the first to locate and active man of seventy-eight years, honored and respected by all. A Republican in politics, he served as presidential elector when Rutherford B. Hayes was made president, and in 1880 was one of the Yosemite Park commissioners, being appointed by Governor Markham. Going back to New York in 1852, H. J. Ostrander married Lydia A. Wheeler, who was born in that state, and the same year returned with his bride to California, coming by the Nicaragua route. She died on the home farm in Merced county. Of the five children born of their union, three are living, namely: Willis H., a prosperous business man of Chico, Cal.; Mrs. Thomas N. Crew, also of Chico, and Fred G., the subject of this sketch. F. M. Ostrander, the oldest son, was a member of the first class graduated from the Hastings law school. He was afterwards engaged in the practice of law in Merced county until his death, and was for some time district attorney. The father is a member of the California Pioneer Association.

Until five years old, F. G. Ostrander lived in Snelling, Merced county, and the following three years lived with his parents in Santa Clara. Going thence to New York, he attended the public schools of Ithaca six years, after which he continued his studies in Berkeley, Cal., two years, and then returned to Merced county, his early home. In 1879 Mr. Ostrander entered the University of California, where he remained until his junior year, when he left school to engage in farming in Merced county, an occupation in which he was employed for three years. The next five years he was court reporter for Merced and Mariposa counties, after which he studied law with his brother, F. M. Ostrander. In 1890 Mr. Ostrander was admitted to the bar, and in 1896 was admitted to practice in the supreme court. In 1892 he was the Republican nominee for district attorney, and, being elected, served from 1893 until 1895. Re-elected to the same office, he served from 1895 until 1899, when he was re-elected for the third term. In May, 1900, however, being appointed, by application of the entire bar of Merced county, judge of the superior court of Merced county, he resigned his position as district attorney and served as judge until the next general election, in January, 1901. In July, 1901, forming a partnership with Lewis H. Smith, Judge Ostrander became junior member of the firm of Smith & Ostrander in Fresno, where he has built up a good law practice, and is numbered among the citizens of prominence and worth. He still practices in Merced county, where he has a large clientele.

In Alameda, Cal., the birthplace of the bride, Judge Ostrander married Sarah Ellery, and into their home four children have been born, namely: Jasper, Edith, Gladys and Willis. In his political affiliations Judge Ostrander sustains the principles of the Republican party. Socially he is a member of Yosemite Parlor No. 24, N. S. G. W., of which he is an ex-president, and of the County Bar Association. Fraternally he belongs to the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, to the Ancient Order of United Workmen and to the Woodmen of the World.

CHARLES H. ADAIR, M. D. A practitioner of long experience, C. H. Adair, M. D., holds a position of prominence among the leading physicians of Fresno, where he has built up a fine practice. A son of John Adair, he was born October 7, 1848, in Logansport, Ind. His grandfather, Asbury Adair, was born and brought up in old Virginia, and was afterward a pioneer settler of three states, moving first to Kentucky, thence to Indiana, and locating in Kansas while it was yet a territory.

A native of Kentucky, John Adair moved to Indiana with his parents, and after attaining his majority followed the trade of a contractor and bridge-builder in Logansport. He died in the prime of life, in 1849, of cholera, being then fifty-two years of age. He married Margaret Stewart, who was born in Scotland, and is now living in Rochester, Ind. Three children blessed their union, namely: Frank, who served in the Civil war in the One Hundred and Twenty-eighth Indiana Volunteer Infantry, was wounded in battle, captured, confined in Andersonville prison until exchanged, and died soon after his release; C. H., the subject of this sketch; and Mrs. Mary Reniff, of Sublette, Ill.

After attending the public schools of Logansport, Ind., until thirteen years old, C. H. Adair worked for a time as clerk in a drug store. In 1864, running away from home, he made his way to Washington, D. C., where he enlisted as a private in Company C, Third Veteran Reserve Corps, with which he was at first stationed in Washington, and then in Johnson's Island until the close of the war, when, in July, 1865, he was mustered out of service. Returning then to Logansport, Ind., Mr. Adair attended school for awhile, after which he secured a position in the hospital department of the United States army, and for a year or more was in the employ of the Freedmen's bureau, dealing out rations, medicines, etc., to the negroes throughout the south. Resigning from the bureau in 1867, he entered the senior class of the medical department of the University of Philadelphia, from which he was graduated in 1868 with the degree of M. D. Locating at once in Salt Lake City, Dr. Adair practiced medicine there two years. Coming to California in 1870, he continued the practice of his profession in Stockton until 1872, when he removed to Roseburg, Ore. Locating there as a physician, he was soon after appointed surgeon with the rank of major of an Oregon regiment by the governor of the state, and served until the close of the war with the Modoc Indians. Returning to California in 1874, the doctor was successfully engaged in the practice of his profession at Colusa until 1887, being also pension examiner. The ensuing three years he practiced in San Francisco. Coming from there to Fresno in 1890, he has been very successful in the treatment of the many difficult cases placed in his charge, by his skill and knowledge winning the confidence of the community, and gaining a large and lucrative patronage. Dr. Adair has acquired considerable property, owning a ranch in the county, and having a fine residence on M street. For two years he served as county health officer, and for two years was city health officer.

In San Francisco, in February, 1888, Dr. Adair married Lena Cullum, a native of that city, and the daughter of one of its pioneer families. Two children have been born of their union, Charles P. and Florine. Fraternally Dr. Adair is a charter member of Fresno Lodge No. 439, B. P. O. E., of which he has been treasurer since its organization; he united with Roseburg (Ore.) Lodge, F. & A. M., with Colusa Chapter, R. A. M., and with Marysville Commandery, K. T., but is not now affiliated; and was made an Odd Fellow in Oregon. Politically he is a Republican. Mrs. Adair is a member of the Catholic Church.

ENOCH BIBBY. Prominent among the active and progressive citizens of Merced county is Enoch Bibby, proprietor of a ranch on the Bibby road, in Volta, and the head carpenter for the San Joaquin & Kings River Canal and Irrigation Company. He is a man of good business capacity, great intelligence and enterprise, a superior mechanic, and a thorough-going farmer. The son of an honored pioneer of California, he was born October 13, 1860, in Solano county, near Vacaville, where his father, Nicholas Bibby, whose sketch may be found elsewhere in this work, settled soon after his marriage.

The second child in a family of eleven children, Enoch Bibby received his first knowledge of books in the district schools of Napa county, where his parents lived for a time, prior to removing, in 1869, to Merced county. Completing his education in the Bibby Road district school, he began the battle of life for himself as a farmer, choosing the occupation to which he had been trained from childhood. Renting five hundred acres of land in 1878, Mr. Bibby carried it on for five years, raising grain. Endowed with mechanical talent and ingenuity, he had been familiar with the use of tools from his early boyhood, working much at the carpenter's bench. Turning his attention to carpentering in 1883, he worked at the trade until 1894, meeting with great success. At that time Mr. Bibby entered the employ of the San Joaquin & Kings River Canal and Irrigation Company, beginning as a workman, and showed such ability and proficiency that at the end of his first week's labor he was advanced to the position of head carpenter, and given charge of the carpentering department. Mr. Bibby has since had charge of that department along the entire line of the canal, and has given eminent satisfaction to all concerned. Locating on his present ranch of twenty acres, on the Bibby road, in 1881, he has made many improvements on it, transforming it into a good property.

In 1881, in Merced, Cal., Mr. Bibby married Eliza Stevens, who was born in Mariposa county. Her father, C. E. Stevens, a native of Connecticut, came by way of Cape Horn to California with the gold hunters of 1849, and was first engaged in mining, and later in stock raising. He is now living retired from active pursuits in Madera county. His wife, whose maiden name was Martha Jane Loy, died in Merced in 1878. Of the union of Mr. and Mrs. Bibby five children were born, namely: Clara; Walter, deceased; Edith, a graduate from Heald's Business College, San Francisco; Hazel, a pupil in the Los Banos high school; and Enoch Austin. Mr. Bibby is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and of the Fraternal Aid. In religion both Mr. and Mrs. Bibby are Christian Scientists.

JUDGE JOHN K. LAW. As one of the leading attorneys of the state of California, no man occupies a more assured position than Judge John K. Law, whose ability and achievements have won him eminent professional success. The possessor of great legal acumen, learning and courtesy, he invariably inspires respect and esteem in those with whom he is brought in contact. In addition to attending to his extensive general law practice, he has filled various official positions in a commendable manner, and as judge of the superior court for nine years added to the glory already reflected on the Merced county bench by his predecessors. Coming originally of French stock on the paternal side, he was born in Darlington county, S. C., which was likewise the birthplace of his father, E. A. Law. His paternal grandfather, William A. Law, was born and bred in Williamsburg county, S. C., but became an early settler of Darlington county of that state, where he owned and managed a valuable plantation. He married a Miss Du Bose, a descendant of a Huguenot family of prominence.

After his graduation from Union College, at Schenectady, N. Y., E. A. Law prepared himself for the legal profession, and was for more than four decades a practicing attorney, being senior member of the Darlington county bar at the time of his death, and one of the foremost lawyers of South Carolina. He filled many important official positions, serving as judge of the district court, as commissioner in equity for one term, and for one term was a member of the state legislature. He was a man of spotless reputation and unblemished character, and for more than thirty years was an elder in the Presbyterian Church. He married Sarah Elizabeth McIver, who was born in South Carolina, of Scotch ancestors, and there spent her entire life. Her father, Evander Roderick McIver, a planter, was major-general of the state troops of South Carolina, and married Eliza Cowan, of North Carolina, a sister of Gen. William Cowan, an officer in the war of 1812, and subsequently speaker of the North Carolina house of representatives. Of the eleven children born of the union of Mr. and Mrs. E. A. Law, eight grew to years of maturity, and five are living, Judge J. K. and T. C. being residents of Merced, and the only ones in California. The oldest son, E. M. Law, served as a major-general in the Confederate army, and was several times wounded in battle. He now resides in Florida, being the founder and superintendent of the South Florida Military Institute. Another son, Junius A. Law, who died in his native state, served in the Confederate army, first as captain of a company, and afterward as colonel of the Sixty-third Alabama Regiment. Still another son, A. E. Law, enlisted as a soldier in the Confederate army, and was killed at the siege of Petersburg.

The fourth child in succession of birth of the parental household, John K. Law, was born January 19, 1841, in Darlington county, S. C., and was educated in his native state. He was a student in the South Carolina Military Academy, at Charleston, when the Civil war broke out, and with his companions built a battery on Morris Island. During the summer of 1861 he spent his vacation in Virginia, being drill master in General Beauregard's corps. Returning to Charleston in the fall, Mr. Law resumed his studies at the academy, being frequently called out for military duty. The following vacation he again went to Virginia, where he served as aid on the staff of his brother, Gen. E. M. Law, and took part in the battle of Boonesboro, or South Mountain, and in the battle of Sharpsburg, or Antietam, in the latter engagement being wounded in the left ankle, and compelled to use crutches for eighteen months. Returning to the academy, Mr. Law was graduated there in April, 1863, and subsequently did some military service in South Carolina as captain of a mounted company, participating in repelling Potter's raid. Then entering his father's office, he studied law, and in November, 1866, was admitted to practice in the supreme court of South Carolina. The following three years, in company with his father, he practiced law, acquiring valuable professional experience.

Coming to California in 1869, Mr. Law taught a private school in Solano county, and afterward taught in the public schools of that and Mariposa counties. Locating in Merced in 1873, he resumed the practice of his profession, and also served as county superintendent of schools, being appointed to fill out an unexpired term. Being elected district attorney on the Democratic ticket in 1875, Mr. Law served until 1878, but declined a renomination, preferring to return to his general law practice. Receiving the Democratic nomination for superior judge in 1890, he was elected by a large majority, and took the oath of office in January, 1891. In 1896 Mr. Law was re-elected to the same high position over two opponents, and served as judge until April 27, 1900, when he resigned from the bench and again took up the practice of his profession. In 1902, at the state convention, he was the Democratic nominee for chief justice of the supreme court, but went down with his ticket. He was one of the organizers of the Merced Security Bank, and served as its attorney until taking his seat on the bench, and until that time was likewise attorney for the Crocker-Huffman Land & Water Company.

Judge Law married, in South Carolina, Mary L. James, the daughter of a planter, and the descendant of a family of prominence. She is of Revolutionary stock, her grandfather, Major James, fought under General Marion in the war of the Revolution, acquiring fame for having knocked down a British officer with a chair. Mr. and Mrs. Law occupy a fine residence at the corner of Canal and Twenty-third streets, where they entertain their many friends and acquaintances with true southern hospitality. Judge Law is an influential member of the Presbyterian Church, in which he has been an elder for more than thirty years. The Presbyterian congregation of Merced was organized in August, 1873, in Judge Law's house, and he was afterward chairman of the building committee that erected the present church edifice. He was moderator of the Stockton Presbytery one term, and also served one term as moderator of the Synod of California, and has the distinction of being the only layman that ever held that office. In politics he is a staunch Democrat.

JOHN W. RHOADS. The west, prolific of contrasts, of successes and failures, of adventure and monotony, of privation and plenty, presents to the student of history no greater evidence of its changefulness than the lives of those who represent the second generation from the pioneer. Especially is this the case with John W. Rhoads, capitalist, promoter and land owner of Hanford, whose career stands out in bold relief from that of his father, Daniel Rhoads, one of the best remembered and most widely respected and appreciated pioneers of 1846. The elder Rhoads gained his inspiration from mountain fastnesses, dire want, suffering and crude conditions, while his only living son has stepped into a waiting prosperity and has shown his mettle in knowing just how to apply his inherited and perfected ability to latter-day civilization.

Born in Gilroy, Santa Clara county, November 3, 1859, Mr. Rhoads followed the growing fortunes of his father for many years, having come to Kings county when an infant in arms. He attained maturity in a home atmosphere calculated to develop whatever of worth lurked in his nature, and in 1880 he had so far realized his ambitions that he established a home of his own by marrying Rosa A. Sanborn, a native of San Jose, Cal., who was reared and educated in Watsonville. Mrs. Rhoads' father, John L. Sanborn, was born in New Hampshire and became an early pioneer of California. She is the mother of two children, Ethel and Earl. Directly after his marriage Mr. Rhoads settled on a farm of his own four miles north of Lemoore, consisting of two hundred and forty acres, to the improvement of which, with the additional two hundred and forty acres deeded to him by his father, he devoted his time until removing to Hanford in 1897. He made many fine improvements on his land, spared neither time nor money in making it a valuable and productive property, a fact which affords him great satisfaction, as it does also the tenant who now occupies and manages it. Since removing to Hanford Mr. Rhoads has been unceasing in his effort to administer the estate of his father, valued at $200,000, and at the same time has taken an active part in many avenues of activity in the city and county. He was one of the organizers of the California Gas and Oil Company, now the California Limited, operating in the Coalinga field in Fresno county, and incorporated for $100,000. The company owned one hundred and sixty acres of land and put down three wells, eventually selling out at a large profit. Mr. Rhoads is also interested in other oil fields and companies, and is a silent partner in many concerns of commercial and industrial importance. He possesses organizing ability of a high order, and is one of the community's most generous and progressive citizens. Extensive travel has brought him into touch with people of corresponding culture and enterprise, and his friends include persons high in business and social life. Schools and churches, charitable organizations and social enterprises profit by his geniality and his means, and his influence extends into all avenues where honesty of purpose and correctness of judgment are needed and appreciated. Fraternally he finds a home with the Masons, the Woodmen of the World and the Independent Order of Foresters.

WILLIAM JACKSON BERRY. Noteworthy among the substantial residents of Fresno county is William Jackson Berry, one of the leading business men of Selma. He has been actively identified with the development and promotion of the oil interests of this section of the state, and it is largely owing to his energy and practical judgment that this industry has been so successfully launched and maintained. The agricultural prosperity of the locality is likewise partly due to his efforts in establishing irrigation and assisting in cutting ditches. A son of Hugh C. Berry, he was born June 14, 1840, in Washington county, Mo.

Hugh C. Berry was a man of education and culture, and a noted mathematician. During his early manhood he was a teacher in Washington county, Mo., and had among his pupils the young lady that subsequently married Mr. Apperson, and became the mother of Mrs. Phoebe Hearst. Moving to Texas after the close of the Civil war, he located on Fall river, near Granbury, and there, with his son Hugh, spent his remaining days, dying at an advanced age. He married Harriet A. Johnson, who was born in North Carolina, and moved with her parents to Washington county, Mo., when a child. She bore her husband nine sons and three daughters, of whom William Jackson was the third child.

Reared to manhood in his native state, William Jackson Berry acquired a practical common-school education. In 1861, with the bravery and ambition born of a daring spirit, he joined the party commanded by Captain Brawley, and came with ox-teams across the plains, following the wagon trail through Utah and Nevada. Stopping at Carson City, he secured a position as driver for the remaining distance, thus paying his way along. At Sportsman's Hall he was snowed in for a while, and chopped wood for his board. After a journey of five months he arrived in California, and the two following winters was employed in mining at Nigger flat and Smith's flat, Eldorado county. In the spring of 1862 he bought four yoke of oxen, the price being $1,034. Giving $180 in cash, he paid the balance on the installment plan, and embarked in teaming and freighting. In 1864 he located in Mendocino county, and on the completion of the railway sold his oxen and bought a tract of land in Little Lake valley. In 1874, with two companions, he drove to the present site of the city of Selma, and helped survey this part of Fresno county. In 1875 he also surveyed Mendocino school district, which he named for the county, and there took up at first one-half section of government land, and subsequently obtained possession of a whole section of railroad land. This party of surveyors in Fresno county located a stake in Kings river, and by measuring a wagon wheel, and locating a point, drove twelve miles, not missing the line a hundred yards, the accuracy of their survey being afterward tested and proved.

When Mr. Berry settled in Fresno county he bought three hundred and twenty acres of land lying three miles east, and two miles north, of Selma, and subsequently purchased a tract equally as large adjoining his original purchase, and began his career as a general farmer. At that time, in 1875, water being very scarce, he became one of twenty-four men to contract with the Fresno Canal and Irrigation Company for water rights for each individual member for cutting a ditch through the Long Cut, two and one-half miles above Centreville. When completed, the ditch was twelve hundred and forty yards long, thirteen feet deep, sixty feet on the bottom, and let water into Fancher creek channel, and from that into Lone Tree channel. In 1878 Mr. Berry helped cut the Centerville and Kingsburg canal, which still supplies that part of the county with water for irrigating purposes, and in 1883 was one of the promoters of the Fowler Switch canal.

Taking up his residence in the city of Selma in 1888, Mr. Berry built up a good business as a real estate agent, continuing it a number of years. Going with his sons to Alaska in 1898, he assisted them in locating and buying claims, being successful in his operations. On his return to Selma, in the fall of that year, he became identified with the development of the oil industry, becoming one of its organizers, and the president, of the Eldorado Oil Company, which leases four hundred and eighty acres of land from the Kern Valley Bank, and one hundred and sixty acres to the Kern River Oil Company, and to fifteen other companies. Mr. Berry is also actively identified with the management of several other leading oil companies, being a director in Our Own Oil Company; the Berry Oil & Development Company, which owns three sections of oil land in Kern county, and in the Washington City Oil Company.

In 1863, in California, Mr. Berry married Anna Coates, a daughter of George I. Coates, who came to California in 1862, and they have six children, namely: H. F., of Alaska; Clarence J., a sketch of whose life may be found on another page of this work; Henry, of Los Angeles; Frederick, living near Selma; Cora, wife of R. J. Skilton, of Selma; and Nellie, wife of Harry Smith, of Burlingame. Politically Mr. Berry was formerly an adherent of the Democratic party, but is now a strong Republican. He is very prominent in fraternal circles, being a charter member of three lodges, namely: Vine-land Lodge, No. 66, K. P., of Fresno; Kings-burg Lodge, No. 7, K.P., which he has represented in the Grand Lodge; and Selma Lodge, No. 155, K. P. He belongs to Fresno Lodge No. 439, B. P. O. E., and also the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Elks.

CLARENCE W. KELLOGG, M. D. For the practice of his profession Dr. Kellogg received a thorough preparatory training. It was his good fortune to enjoy not only such advantages as are afforded by excellent medical colleges in our own country, but also to attend clinics and engage in hospital work in Europe, where he studied the methods employed by some of the ablest physicians and surgeons of the day. Since 1900 he has made his home in Kern City and has acted as surgeon for the Southern Pacific Railroad, besides conducting a private practice. In addition, he has an office in Bakersfield, which he attends daily.

Dr. Kellogg was born in Quincy, Plumas county, Cal., October 25, 1866, and is a son of Hon. W. W. Kellogg, a native of Massachusetts, but a resident of California ever since early manhood, and still engaged in the practice of law at Quincy. In former years he was active in politics and served both as a member of the assembly and senate. The grammar school at Quincy, Cal., afforded Dr. Kellogg his primary educational advantages. At sixteen years of age he entered Santa Clara College, where he was a student for two terms. With the intention of entering Yale College, he studied under tutors in Massachusetts and Connecticut. However, instead of entering the university, he decided to take up the study of medicine and therefore matriculated in the Cleveland (Ohio) Homeopathic Medical College, from which he was graduated two years later.

Immediately after graduating Dr. Kellogg went abroad in order to extend his professional knowledge by study in the hospitals and universities of Europe. He matriculated in the universities of Berlin and Vienna, where he studied for two years, finding constant inspiration for his work through observation of the skillful methods employed by world-famous surgeons. On his return to the United States he entered the Cooper Medical College at San Francisco and immediately after his graduation from that institution he settled in Ventura. Two years later he removed to Lake county, where he had his office at Lakeport and Highland Springs. From there he came to Kern county in 1900 and has since practiced in Kern City and Bakersfield. For a time he was a partner of Dr. T. E. Taggart, but the latter removed from the county in May, 1903, and since then Dr. Kellogg has practiced alone. While in Germany he met and married Miss Minnie Rudolf, a native of Dresden, by whom he has one daughter, Kate Craig.

As might be expected, Dr. Kellogg is interested in the progress of associations connected with his profession, and we find him actively identified with the State Medical, San Joaquin Valley and Kern County Medical societies, also the Pacific Society of Railway Surgeons. His fraternal connections are extensive and include membership in the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, Native Sons of the Golden West, Knights of Pythias, Maccabees, Masonic fraternity and Eastern Star.

LEWIS HOWELL SMITH. Bringing to the practice of his profession an active brain, a well trained mind, great zeal and habits of industry, Lewis Howell Smith, although of the younger generation of lawyers, has already obtained an honored position among the leading attorneys of Fresno. A son of the late John Boyd Smith, he was born November 3, 1872, in Peoria, Ill. His grandfather, Rev. William Smith, was born in Pennsylvania of Scotch-Irish ancestry, and during the active years of his life was engaged in ministerial labors, being pastor of a Presbyterian Church.

A native of Sunbury, Pa., John Boyd Smith was reared and educated in that state. Coming to Illinois when a young man, he engaged in the banking business in Peoria, becoming one of the founders, and the cashier, of the Mechanics' National Bank, which afterward became the Merchants' National Bank of Peoria. Removing to Fresno, Cal., with his family in 1889, he became associated with the Fresno National Bank of which he was cashier until his death in 1893, at the age of sixty-four years. For more than forty years he was employed in the banking business, and was known far and wide as an able financier. He was quite active in public affairs, and while in Peoria served as alderman. He married Lucetta Howell, who was born in Peoria, and now resides in Fresno. Her father, Lewis Howell, an early settler of Peoria, Ill., was a man of great financial ability, and for many years was president of the Peoria National Bank. Six children blessed the union of Mr. and Mrs. John B. Smith of whom four are living, namely: Boyd, bookkeeper for the California Products Company; Mrs. W. E. Stone of Peoria, Ill.; Lewis Howell, the subject of this sketch; and Elsa, of Fresno. One son, Archie A., deceased, was made cashier of the Fresno National Bank in 1895, and retained the position until his death in 1899.

Leaving the Peoria (Ill.) high school while a member of the senior class, Lewis Howell Smith came with the family to Fresno in 1889, and for a year or more thereafter was in the government employ as a mail carrier. In 1891 he entered the Leland Stanford, Jr., University, from which he was graduated in 1895 with the degree of bachelor of law, having the distinction of receiving the first law diploma issued by that university. The ensuing year Mr. Smith spent in the superior court, working in the chambers of Judge Carter, with whom he was afterward in partnership from 1896 until 1898, the firm name being Carter & Smith. The following three years Mr. Smith carried on his professional labors alone, but in July, 1901, became associated with Judge Ostrander, whose sketch appears elsewhere in this volume, and has since been at the head of the well-known firm of Smith & Ostrander, which is now located in the Forsyth building. Mr. Smith is recognized as a most skillful lawyer and has been identified with some of the most important cases tried in the city or county. In the case of the People vs. McDaniels, a copy of which is transcribed in the California Reports and in the American State Reports, he served as attorney for the defendant, and won the case in the supreme court to which it was appealed, the supreme court reversing a former decision and establishing a constitutional precedent that has since been taken up in law journals throughout the land. He and his partner are attorneys for the Fresno National Bank, in which Mr. Smith is also one of the directors.

In Georgetown, Cal., Mr. Smith married

Maude E. Shepherd, a native of that city, and a daughter of B. F. Shepherd, who came to California in 1849, was for many years a prosperous merchant of Georgetown, but is now a resident of Fresno, making his home with Mr. and Mrs. Smith. Of the union of Mr. and Mrs. Smith two children have been born, Archia A. and Marylin Maude. Politically Mr. Smith affiliates with the Republican party. Socially he belongs to the County Bar Association, the Chamber of Commerce, the Sequoia Club, the Sigma Nu Society, at the Leland Stanford, Jr., University; and is a member of the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks.

J. S. CARDOZA. While every nation has its representatives in California, few citizens of Portuguese ancestry and birth are to be found within the limits of the state, and among these few doubtless none has been more successful than Mr. Cardoza, the owner of a valuable alfalfa and dairy farm situated two and one-half miles south of Newman. A record of his life shows what it is possible for a man to accomplish in this land of opportunity, even when he is hampered by poverty, inconvenienced by unfamiliarity with the language, and ignorant of the soil and conditions of the country. The place which by unaided exertions he has acquired lies in Merced county across the line from Stanislaus county and consists of one hundred and fifty acres under the canal. At the time of making his first investment here he bought eighty acres and later added to the size of his farm by purchasing an adjoining tract of seventy acres, all of which is in alfalfa. The trees on the land have been set out by him since 1888, and in 1903 he erected a neat farm house. Other buildings have been constructed from time to time, including two hay barns and a cow barn 120 x 48 feet. A pioneer in the dairy industry and an original stockholder in the New Era creamery, he has always been a believer in the possibilities of dairying, and by his early success he encouraged others to purchase dairy herds. In 1889 he started a cheese factory on his farm and until 1902 manufactured cheese for shipment to San Francisco, but in the latter year he gave up cheese-making and since then has used a separator, shipping his cream to the city markets. At this writing there are one hundred and thirty cows in his dairy and at times he milks as many as one hundred and ten, making his dairy one of the largest in the vicinity. Holsteins and Durhams are his specialties and fine specimens of each may be found in his herd. Each year he cuts about four hundred tons of alfalfa, all of which he uses on his farm. Not only is he an active and energetic man, but capable and resourceful as well, meeting every emergency with sagacious judgment and promptness of decision.

Mr. Cardoza is a native of St. George, Azores, Portugal, and was born October 12, 1859, being second among three children, of whom his only brother, Emanuel, is a resident of Nevada county, Cal. His parents, Anton and Anna (Sylvara) Cardoza, were likewise natives of Azores, where the former in the years of active life followed farm pursuits, but is now living retired. The mother died in 1869 when her son, J. S., was only ten years of age, and after her death the latter began to be self-supporting. Though too young to be given a man's work, he helped on a farm and his hours of toil were long and monotonous, with few pleasures to give him in his manhood any joyous recollections of childhood days. Looking about him he saw little to encourage him to remain in his native land. Conditions were unpromising and difficulties discouraging. However, he had heard of America as a country where the poor might hope to attain success and though a mere lad in years he decided to sail across the ocean to the new world. When fourteen years of age, in 1873, he arrived in New York, among strangers, with little money and no friends. Fortune favored him and he secured work on a farm in Rhode Island. His wages were so scant that when he came to California one and one-half years later he had scarcely more than enough to pay his passage. During December of 1874 he started for the western coast and on New Year's day of 1875 landed at San Francisco, with only twenty-five cents in his possession. However, a willing spirit and robust constitution will bring a livelihood and such he found to be the case. Working his way to the west side of the San Joaquin valley, he secured employment on a farm. Each year he economically saved his wages, by which means he was enabled in 1881 to embark in farming for himself. The first land which he leased consisted of one thousand acres well adapted to the raising of grain, and each year he added to his leasehold until he cultivated twenty-five hundred acres of grain land. About 1885 he bought one hundred and sixty acres of the Page tract, which he put into alfalfa, but this place he sold two years later upon buying his present homestead. On the organization of the Bank of Newman he became one of its original stockholders and he still remains a director in the institution. In addition he is a stockholder of the Rochdale Company, proprietors of a grocery in Newman. The marriage of Mr. Cardoza was solemnized at Centerville, Cal., and united him with Miss Mary Munyan, a native of that place. During the exciting days of 1849 her father, Frank Munyan, crossed the plains from the east and experienced all the hardships incident to frontier existence and a miner's occupation; after a time he abandoned mining and turned his attention to farming in the vicinity of Centerville. The children of Mr. and Mrs. Cardoza are Charles, Lena, Geneva, Carrie and Lenas, who under the supervision of their parents are being prepared for positions of usefulness in the future. Their father, having been deprived of educational privileges in his youth, is solicitous that they may have every advantage and may enjoy in their youthful days the recreations and innocent pleasures which found no place in his boyhood years of toil. Since coming to America he has familiarized himself with national institutions, has studied the issues before our country, and in the disputed questions of tariff, currency, etc., finds himself a believer in Republican principles. His fraternal connections are varied, including membership in the Knights of Pythias and Uniform Rank, Ancient Order of United Workmen and Degree of Honor, Woodmen of the World and Women of Woodcraft, United Portuguese Union and Knights of Honor.

JOHN W. SCOTT. Actively identified with the horticultural and agricultural interests of Fresno county is John W. Scott, proprietor of a small but well improved ranch, which in its appointments compares favorably with any in the community. A son of Joseph Scott, he was born October 3, 1839, in Limestone county, Ala. Born and reared in Tennessee, Joseph Scott removed to Alabama when a young man and lived there until after his marriage. Subsequently removing to Mississippi, he lived first in Monroe county and later in De Soto county, where his death occurred while he was yet in the prime of manhood. His wife, whose maiden name was Elizabeth Mays, was born in Virginia and died in De Soto county, Miss. Of their eight children, John W., the subject of this sketch, was the fifth in order of birth.

Brought up principally in Mississippi, John W. Scott there acquired his rudimentary education, and later, in order to prepare for the ministry, studied for a while at Bethel College, in Carroll county, Tenn. In 1862, in Arkansas, where he had been teaching school for three months, Mr. Scott enlisted in Company A, Tenth Mississippi Volunteer Infantry, as a private, and served until the close of the war. He took part in many of the important engagements of the conflict, including the battles of Shiloh, Missionary Ridge and Chickamauga, and Cairo, where he was captured and put on parole. He served first under General Bragg, then under Johnston, and later under General Hood. Toward the close of the war Mr. Scott was promoted from the ranks, being made chief color bearer, and in the battle of Atlanta he fell with the colors in his hands, while each of six guards surrounding him was shot down.

On returning to Mississippi Mr. Scott taught school in De Soto county for two or more years. Subsequently embarking in mercantile pursuits, he was in business at Fort Smith, Ark., until 1879, when he removed to Seattle, Wash., where he continued as a merchant for two years. Coming to California in 1881, Mr. Scott was a resident of San Francisco for four years, being at first employed as bookkeeper for the Judson Manufacturing Company of Oakland, and later for the Pacific Rolling Mills of San Francisco. Locating in Fresno in 1885, he purchased twenty acres of land, which are included in his present ranch, and has devoted his attention principally to berry raising and fruit culture, in which he has been successful.

In 1867, in De Soto county, Miss., Mr. Scott married Lida Beauchamp, who was born in Elkton, Todd county, Ky., a daughter of Milton Beauchamp. Her father, a native of Frankfort, Ky., came with the gold seekers to California in 1849, sailing around Cape Horn. Not meeting with success as a miner, he returned to Kentucky and was engaged in farming until his death near Lexington. Mr. Beauchamp married Mary Daniel, who was born near Elkton, Ky., the descendant of a family of wealth and prominence, and died in Texas. Of their nine children, Mrs. Scott was the fifth. Mr. and Mrs. Scott are the parents of seven children, namely: William Walter of Seattle, Wash., an insurance agent; Eula, wife of D. A. Stivers of San Francisco; Mary, wife of A. P. Jordan of Fresno; Wirt D., of Fresno; Lyda, wife of Harry Cornell of Watsonville; John Franklin, of San Francisco; and Gilman Winfield, living at home. Mr. Scott is an earnest supporter of the principles of the Democratic party, and is a member of the Christian Church of Fresno.

HON. J. ORRA TRABER. An able and successful attorney, and a man of prominence and influence, J. Orra Traber of Fresno is active in public affairs, and is now representing the sixtieth district in the State Legislature. A son of John W. Traber, he was born in 1872, in Mendocino county, Cal., where he spent his earliest childhood days.

A native of New York state, John W. Traber was born and educated near Albany, living there until twenty-three years of age.

Migrating to the Pacific coast in the early part of 1872, he located in Mendocino county, where he taught school two years. In 1874, with a brother and other relatives, he took up government land in Fresno county, not far from Selma, and embarked in agricultural and horticultural pursuits, engaging in general farming, stock-raising and fruit-growing, having one hundred and sixty acres of his land subject to irrigation. Forming, with twenty-three neighboring farmers, a stock company, now known as the Fresno Canal and Irrigation Company, he was one of the first to take water out of Kings river to irrigate the land. He continued his professional labors, however, and still teaches school during the winter terms, being one of the longest established and most respected educators of the county. He is a man of high moral principles, and a consistent member of the Methodist Church. He married Anna Kane, who was born in Vermont, a daughter of Dennis Kane. Mr. Kane, a native of Ireland, emigrated to New England when young, and settled first in Vermont. During the Civil war he was employed by the government as a railroad contractor, an occupation which he subsequently followed in Ohio and Michigan. He spent his last years in Indiana, dying in the northern part of the state. Of the union of John W. and Anna (Kane) Traber four children were born, namely: J. Orra, with whom this sketch is chiefly concerned; Charles H., a teacher of Fresno county; Roy C., of Fresno county, a farmer; and Cullen B., engaged in the oil business in Bakersfield, Cal.

Reared to manhood in Fresno county, J. Orra Traber studied under the supervision of his father until fourteen years old, when he entered the Selma high school, in which he completed the full course. Having as a boy of ten years decided to become a lawyer, he then set earnestly at work to accomplish his purpose, and having measured his ability he has since by persistent effort hewn his way straight to the goal thus early marked. Laboring at anything he could find to do for the next two years, Mr. Traber made and saved enough money to warrant him in entering the State Normal School at San Jose. After studying there two years, he obtained a teacher's certificate, and the following three years taught in the Riverside district, Fresno county, at the same time pursuing the study of law. Going to Ann Arbor, Mich., in 1895, Mr. Traber took the examinations, and entered the senior class in the law department of the University of Michigan, from which he was graduated in 1896 with the degree of LL. B. Remaining in Michigan another year, he obtained a practical knowledge of law in an office in Sturgis, and in 1897 returned to California, locating in Fresno, where he has since built up a large and most satisfactory practice of his profession, paying especial attention to civil law. Nominated on the Republican ticket, in 1902, as a Representative to the state legislature, Mr. Traber was elected by a majority of six hundred and forty-one, and in the session of 1903 assisted in re-electing United States Senator Perkins. He has served as chairman of the committee on fruit and vines, and has championed or introduced bills of importance, including a bill to protect the abandoned oil wells put down from surface water, and a bill to compel parties abandoning oil wells to fill them up.

In Bronson, Mich., July 31, 1899, Mr. Traber married Mayme Kane, a native of that city. Mr. Traber is a member of the Fresno County Bar Association; of the Fresno Parlor, N. S. G. W.; of the Knights of Pythias, and of the Uniform Rank, K. P. In politics he is a Republican.

HORACE E. BARNUM. One of the most worthy and highly esteemed residents of Fresno is H. E. Barnum, who is now serving his third term as county auditor of Fresno county. A man of strong personality, enterprising and persevering, he has won success in his active career by sheer persistency of purpose. A son of the late Philander Barnum, he was born May 9, 1854, in Barry county, Mich., near the city of Hastings, of English-German descent. His paternal grandfather, Elijah Barnum, was born in New England, but early in life removed to Barry county, Mich., settling in the wilderness. Clearing a space in the midst of the beach and maple trees, he erected a log cabin for himself and family, and from the unbroken forest cleared and improved a homestead, on which he spent his remaining days.

Born in the pioneer log house in Barry county, Mich., Philander Barnum followed the independent occupation in which he was reared, becoming an extensive and prosperous farmer. On retiring from active pursuits, he removed to Battle Creek, Mich., where his death occurred the following year. His wife, whose maiden name was Harriet E. Bidwell, was born in Albion, Mich., of New England ancestry, and died in Hastings, Mich. Of the four daughters and one son born of their union all are living, Horace E., of this review, being the fourth child, and the only one on the Pacific coast.

Having received a practical education in the public schools of Battle Creek and Albion, Mich., H. E. Barnum came to California in search of fortune in 1875, and spent the next three years principally in the Sacramento valley. Going then to Washington, he spent a year in that state. Returning to California, he settled in Woodland, Yolo county, where he was successfully engaged in agricultural pursuits for a number of years. In 1885 Mr. Barnum came with T. L. Reed to the San Joaquin valley. Leasing the South Mountain tract, he broke up the land, about seven sections in all, using from eight to ten horses on a plow. He was exceedingly prosperous in his venture, raising a very large crop of grain, which he hauled sixteen miles to market, using twelve eight-mule teams, ten six-mule teams, and several four-mule teams for the purpose. Trading his interest to Mr. Reed for one hundred and sixty acres of land in Tulare county the following year, Mr. Barnum there carried on farming for twelve months. Going then to Lemoore, he was engaged in the hotel business for a year, when he was burned out. After his heavy loss by fire, he returned to Reedley, where he again engaged in the hotel business, and bought twenty acres of land for an orchard. Just after making the first payment on his land, while returning from hunting one day, the gun fell in the buggy, accidentally shooting him in the left side and through the shoulder, inflicting a fearful wound. The arm was amputated and, contrary to the expectations of the surgeon, he recovered. Nothing daunted by his misfortune, he prepared the land for irrigation, set out an orchard, made a park on the river bank, and embarked in business as a hotel-keeper.

Soon afterward Mr. Barnum was appointed constable, and served a year, and was afterward road-master for two years. Urged to become a candidate for the office of county auditor in 1894, he was nominated on the Republican ticket, and elected for a term of four years, receiving a plurality of six hundred votes. Renominated in 1898 for the same office, he was elected over the Fusion candidate by a majority of one hundred and eight votes, being one of two Republicans who were elected that year. In 1902 Mr. Barnum was re-elected as county auditor by a majority of seventeen hundred votes, leading his ticket, and receiving the largest vote in the county. On first assuming the duties of his position Mr. Barnum removed from his ranch to Fresno, where he has since resided.

In Woodland, Yolo county, in 1894, Mr. Barnum married Mary Eva Deering, who was born in Lake county, Cal., a daughter of John and Eliza Deering, pioneer settlers of Yolo county. Her father is dead, but her mother survives, and is living in Tulare county. Mr. and Mrs. Barnum are the parents of two children, namely: Ida May, and Charles T., students in the Fresno high school. Mr. Barnum belongs to the Fresno Chamber of Commerce; and is a member of the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks; of the Knights of Pythias; of the Ancient Order of United Workmen; of the Independent Order of Foresters; and of the Woodmen of the World. In politics he is a Republican. Mrs. Barnum is a member of the Baptist Church.

JULIAN W. HUDSON. The lumber industry of the Pacific coast country furnishes employment for a large number of men, and has reached gigantic proportions. The Fasset Lumber Company, which carries on operations in Fresno county, although it has just completed its first year's operations in Selma, has made for itself an enviable reputation for promptness and reliability, and the volume of its business has already reached a point which places this company among the leaders of wholesale and retail lumber merchants of this vicinity. The company secured Julian W. Hudson as its manager in Selma, who opened a lumber yard and office at this city, April 27, 1903, and looks after the interests of the company. Being a man of broad experience in this line of work, Mr. Hudson is fully competent to fulfill all expectations, for his identification with the lumber development of this section of California makes him an authority on all subjects pertaining to this business.

Born February 17, 1868, in Shelby county, Mo., he is the youngest but one in a family of four children born to John L. and Sallie Crocket (Cardwell) Hudson, both of whom were natives of Kentucky, the former of Mercer county; the latter was a distant relative of the famous hunter, David Crocket. Both parents are now deceased, the mother having passed to her final rest January 17, 1900, at Fresno, Cal. She was followed to the grave by her husband November 21 of the same year.

In 1852 John L. Hudson left Kentucky for a home in Knox county, Mo., and subsequently moved into Shelby county, and for a number of years followed farm pursuits there. In 1882 he came to California and located in the vicinity of Fresno, and here also he farmed for several years, but during the latter years of his life he was a sewer contractor, doing most of the sewer-work in Fresno, having completed an extensive contract in the year 1900, a short time before his death.

Having attained the age of fourteen years when his parents moved to California, Julian W. Hudson attended school in Missouri, there completing the common school course. This was supplemented by a preparatory course in the high schools of both Fresno and Berkeley, and he afterward became a student in the State University at the latter place, but failed to complete his college course. Not having sufficient means to carry himself through college, he stopped to earn more money, but being taken ill soon afterward, was unable to resume his studies. He first became interested in the lumber industry in 1884, accepting at that time a position as clerk for the Puget Sound Lumber Company, at Fresno. In 1893 he became manager of the San Joaquin Lumber Company, at Delano, in Kern county, and during the four and a half years that he was in the employ of this company the lumber yards changed hands three times, and July 31, 1897, Mr. Hudson was transferred to Lemoore, in Kings county, and officiated as manager there for a couple of years. Discontinuing this line of work for a time, in 1900 he engaged in the fruit business for one season on his own account, packing raisins, etc., but in 1901 he returned to Fresno, having been selected foreman for the Fresno Flume & Irrigation Company, which position he filled in an able manner until April, 1903, resigning at that time to again enter the lumber industry as manager of the Fasset Lumber Company, at Selma, an office he still holds.

Mr. Hudson's lumber and timber business in no way covers the range of his business activities. He finds time to serve as notary public, as secretary and manager of the Hudson-Jackson Stove Company, and of the California Patent & Manufacturing Company; he is pre-eminently a promoter of Fresno county industries. Fraternally he is associated with Delano Lodge No. 309, F. & A. M., of Delano; Camp No. 265, W. O. W., of Selma; Court Selma No. 4215, I. O. F., of Selma, and is also a member of Selma Tent No. 67, K. O. T. M., of which he is Sir Knight Commander. In his religious views, Mr. Hudson is one of the most active members of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, of which he is ruling elder, and his political preference is given to the Prohibition party. He was united in marriage in Delano, Cal., January 17, 1894, with Geneviva N. Ward, a lady born in Kansas, and four children bless their union, namely: Lew Ward, Julian Wiley, Merle and Frances Bernice.

DENWOOD N. L. NEWBURY, M. D. Talented, skillful, and well acquainted with the most modern methods used in the treatment of diseases, Denwood N. L. Newbury, M. D., of Bakersfield, has won an assured position among the leading physicians and surgeons of Kern county. Although a general practitioner, he makes a specialty of surgery, and is considered an authority on women's diseases, which he treats with great success. A son of Edward S. E. Newbury, he was born December 24, 1867, in Lambertville, Hunterdon county, N. J. He is descended from a southern family of prominence, his grandfather, Joseph D. Newbury, a large plantation owner, and a man of influence, having been a life-long resident of North Carolina. He and one of his sons served in the Confederate army during the Civil war.

Born and reared on the North Carolina plantation, Edward S. E. Newbury ran away from home when young, and as captain of a company in the Twenty-second New Jersey Volunteer Infantry, was one of the bravest soldiers in the Union army. He served throughout the war, taking part in many important engagements, and was thirteen times wounded, once through the breast. He subsequently became a contractor and bridge-builder, and now, at the age of sixty-eight years, is living retired from active pursuits. He married Margaret L. Sprout, who was born in New York state, but reared in Lambertville, N. J., where her father was a large manufacturer. She died December 15, 1899, in her fifty-sixth year.

After acquiring a practical education in the public schools of Elizabeth, N. J., Denwood N. L. Newbury went to New York City, and for seven years was employed as a roadman in a wholesale millinery store. At the age of twenty-four years he entered the medical department of Columbia University in that city, and took a full course of three years. Passing the required examinations most creditably, he was for the next two years an interne in the St. Francis Hospital, and afterward visiting surgeon to the same. Subsequently Dr. Newbury was appointed one of the faculty of the Post Graduate College, being the youngest man ever thus honored, and for some time held the chair of women's diseases. During the time the doctor had a large private practice, his office being located at the corner of Sixty-fourth street and the boulevard. Leaving New York City in 1901, he came to California, and at once settled in Bakersfield, where he has established a good practice.

On September 21, 1898, in New York City, Dr. Newbury married Susan Chatfield, a native of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and they have one son, Denwood Wallace Newbury, born December 11, 1900. The doctor is liberal in his political views. Fraternally he belongs to the Masons, the Foresters and to the Eagles.

LUTHER BATTEN. Noteworthy among the prosperous agriculturists and horticulturists of Merced county is Luther Batten, who is pleasantly located on a well-improved ranch in Dos Palos colony. Becoming familiar with the theory and practice of agriculture when young, he has followed this branch of industry most successfully throughout his career. Intelligent, enterprising and public-spirited, he takes pleasure in identifying himself with the best interests of the piace in which he resides, and is eminently deserving of the high regard in which he is held as a man and a citizen. Coming from a long line of New England ancestors, he was born August 28, 1848, in Wisconsin, on the Eau Claire river, a son of John Batten, Jr. His grandfather, John Batten, Sr., a native of Massachusetts, moved to Vermont when young, and there spent the remainder of his long and busy life, dying at the age of seventy-three years. His wife, whose maiden name was Hannah Banfield, spent her sixty years of life in the Green Mountain state.

A native of Orange county, Vt., John Batten, Jr., was born September 8, 1805. After serving an apprenticeship of seven years with Ebenezer Crone of Springfield, a carriage-maker and wheelwright, he followed his trade in different parts of the country, finally going to Maryland, where he was connected with the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad as an employe for a while. He subsequently assisted in building a canal along the Potomac river, working until it was completed as far as Hagerstown. Locating then in Pennsylvania, he was engaged in transporting coal from Mauch Chunk to Philadelphia by canal boat. Resuming his trade, he was afterwards employed in New York City and Buffalo, from the latter city going to London, Canada, thence to Port Kent, where he embarked in the lumber business. Removing from there to Michigan, he settled near the present site of what is now the flourishing city of Monroe, but what was then but a straggling hamlet. In 1839, three years after his marriage, he removed to Galena, Ill., from there going, in the course of a year or two, to Grand Rapids, Wis., where as a pioneer lumber manufacturer and dealer he had the distinction of operating the first sawmill. He afterwards resided at Stevens Point, Wis., until 1870, when he went to Gar creek, Lincoln county, Neb., where he took up a tract of wild prairie land, from which he improved a good farm. Selling out in 1879, he purchased land at Oak Precinct, Lancaster county, where he resided until his death in 1891, at a venerable age. He was a man of much force of character, upright and honest, and an active Republican in politics.

In 1836, in Monroe, Mich., John Batten, Jr., married Sophia Allen, who was born in New York state and died in Wisconsin, at the advanced age of eighty-six years. She was a daughter of Samuel Allen and a cousin of Col. Ethan Allen of Revolutionary fame. She bore her husband seven children, one of whom, Hannah, born in Galena, Ill., died in early childhood. The other six grew to years of maturity, namely: Mrs. Mary Chapin, who died in 1903 in Nebraska; William, residing in Wisconsin; Clarissa, who died in Wisconsin; Luther, the subject of this sketch; John, of Waupaca; and Mrs. Adaline Dunbar of Wisconsin.

Receiving his early education in the public schools of Wisconsin, Luther Batten removed with the family to Nebraska in 1870, and two years later, in 1872, homesteaded eighty acres of land on Gar creek. Subsequently selling out in that vicinity, he bought one hundred and sixty acres of land at Oak Precinct, Lancaster county, where he settled with his family. He afterwards added to his landed possessions by purchase, becoming owner of two hundred and ninety acres, which he broke and improved, making it one of the richest and most productive farming estates in Lancaster county. He erected a substantial set of farm buildings, costing about $5,000, and carried on general farming and stock-raising with great success for many years. He also owned and operated a threshing machine for twenty-four years, at first using horsepower, but later having a steam thresher with all the modern appliances. As a farmer and a citizen he was very prominent and popular in the community and wielded a wide influence. He still owns this farm, which lies about eight miles northwest of Lincoln, Neb., but rents it. Coming with his family to California in 1894, Mr. Batten bought twenty acres of land in Dos Palos colony, and soon started an orchard. In April, 1895, he set out a variety of trees, planting three acres that spring, and has since greatly enlarged his operations, having now a fine orchard of eighteen acres, in which he raises a choice variety of apples, pears, peaches, walnuts, apricots, figs, etc., on one acre having thirty different kinds of trees. He has other land in his ranch, owning sixty acres in all. He raises alfalfa in large quantities, and also has a fine dairy, keeping about thirty head of cows. Mr. Batten is likewise interested financially in the local telephone company, and in the development of the G. A. R. park of ten acres, of which he is manager.

April 19, 1874, in Lancaster county, Neb., Mr. Batten married Helen Hermance, who was born in Scio, Allegany county, N. Y., a daughter of J. L. Hermance. Her grandfather, John S. Hermance, born in 1806, died in Cuba, N. Y., in 1885. He married Marion Bristol, who was born in Columbia county, N. Y., a daughter of Rev. John Bristol, a Baptist clergyman. J. L. Hermance was born in 1832 in Rensselaer county, N. Y., and as a young man was engaged in agricultural pursuits. May 9, 1861, he enlisted in Company C, Sixty-seventh New York Volunteer Infantry, and was on detached duty at the Douglas Hospital, Washington, until July, 1862, when, on account of ill health, he was honorably discharged. Recovering his normal physical vigor, Mr. Hermance re-enlisted, joining Company A, One Hundred and Eighty-eighth New York Volunteer Infantry, in which he served as color-bearer until the close of the war. In that capacity he was present at the surrender of General Lee, being color-bearer for the Fifth Army Corps. After the grand review at Washington he was mustered out of service and returned home. Removing with his family to Nebraska in 1872, Mr. Hermance took up a homestead claim nine miles north of Lincoln, and there improved a farm. He was shortly afterward appointed superintendent of the poor farm in that county, and served for six years. He subsequently bought one hundred and sixty acres within five miles of Lincoln, and there set out an orchard and made improvements of an excellent character, and is also possessor of various tracts of land in Lancaster county, having accumulated large wealth. He makes his home in Raymond, Neb., where he is held in high respect. He is a Republican in politics, a faithful member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and is prominently identified with the Grand Army of the Republic. March 28, 1852, he married Esther Hawkins, a native of Cattaraugus county, N. Y., and of the children born of their union two are living, namely: Ernest Hermance of Raymond, Neb.; and Helen, now Mrs. Batten. The union of Mr. and Mrs. Batten has been blessed by the birth of eight children, five of whom grew to years of maturity. Ernest LeRoy died in 1899, in Dos Palos; Carrie Addie died in 1901; Winnie died in 1903; Elmer and Fay are living at home. Politically Mr. Batten is a true-blue Republican, sustaining the principles of his party by voice and vote. Fraternally he belongs to the Knights of the Maccabees. Mrs. Batten is a member of the Ladies of the Maccabees and of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

GEORGE F. DREW. A well-known and respected citizen of Selma, and a progressive and prosperous farmer, George F. Drew is intimately associated with the advancement of the leading interests of this part of Fresno county. He stands high in the community as a man of ability and enterprise, who by persevering industry and thrift has won deserved success in his business career. He was born June 23, 1853, in Somerset county, Me., where his parents, Timothy and Abby (Taylor) Drew, passed their entire life. He was one of a family of fourteen children, ten of whom were boys, being the seventh child in order of birth.

Reared on the parental farm, George F. Drew attended the short terms of the district school as a boy, and under his father's instructions became somewhat proficient in the science of agriculture as carried on in those days on the Atlantic coast. Coming to California with a view of bettering his financial condition in 1873, he was employed in a sawmill in Santa Cruz county, near Watsonville, for three years. Settling in Sutter county in 1876, he rented a tract of land, and for five years was employed in grain-raising. In 1881 Mr. Drew came to Fresno county in search of a favorable location, and being pleased with the richness and fertility of the soil subject to irrigation from the Centerville and Kingsburg canal, purchased a ranch of forty acres, situated a mile and a half north of East Selma. Embarking in business as a horticulturist as well as agriculturist, Mr. Drew planted a vineyard of twenty-three acres, being one of the first to set out any special variety of vines, and set out an orchard of four acres, devoting the remainder of his ranch to the raising of alfalfa. In the care of his vines and trees he has been very successful, both vineyard and orchard being productive and remunerative. In 1887 Mr. Drew went with a party of one hundred men to Cook's Inlet, Alaska, and while there took up three claims, which proved valueless. He was not disappointed, however, as the trip was more one of pleasure than profit. He has mining interests in Fresno county, being sole owner of the Pajaro claim, near Trimmer Springs, where he is developing a gold quartz mine.

In Sutter county, Cal., Mr. Drew married Mrs. Lizzie (Young) Duley, a native of Wisconsin, where her birth occurred in 1851. Her father, the late Samuel Young, crossed the plains with his family in 1852, and settled in Butte county, Cal., where he was engaged in mining until his death. Politically Mr. Drew affiliates with the Republican party. Fraternally he belongs to Selma Lodge No. 277, F. & A. M.; to Fresno Lodge No. 339, B. P. O. E.; and to Selma Circle, W. of W.

LEMUEL F. CASTLE. One of the best-known and most prosperous stockmen of central California is Lemuel F. Castle, who owns and occupies an improved ranch in the Dos Palos colony. As a cattle breeder and dealer he has met with success, his judgment and business management being wise and his methods practical, systematic and progressive. During the time that he has resided in this section of Merced county the people have learned to look upon him as a man fully worthy of their confidence and as one who contributes materially to the agricultural and business prosperity of the community. His birth occurred November 14, 1858, at Forest Home, Amador county, Cal. He comes of substantial pioneer stock, his father, Welman D. Castle, and his grandfather, Isaac Castle, having both been among the early settlers of the state. The latter, who was a farmer and orchardist, died in San Jose.

Born in New York state, W. D. Castle lived there until after attaining his majority. In 1849, accompanied by his brother-in-law, Mr. Green, he started across the plains for California, coming the first part of the way by ox teams and the last part by pack horses. Like the greater part of those that came here in that year he was first engaged in mining, but in his search for gold was disappointed, and in 1851 he changed his occupation. Going to Santa Ynez, he bought a herd of cattle, which he drove to Sacramento, where he sold them at a good price. Succeeding so well in this business, he continued to buy and sell cattle and sheep for several years. Subsequently locating at Forest Home, Amador county, he erected a stone house on the old stage road and engaged in the hotel business, becoming proprietor of the Forest house, which is still standing, being one of the early landmarks of that locality. He continued as mine host until the construction of the railroad, when, in 1869, he removed to Milpitas, Santa Clara county, where he was engaged in the butcher business until his retirement from active pursuits. He still resides there, a venerable and respected man of four-score years. In Cornuna, Mich., he married Frances Farey, who was born in New York state of New England ancestry, and died in 1861 at Forest Home, Amador county. He subsequently married again. By both unions he became the father of nine children, five of whom are living, Lemuel F. being the youngest child of his first wife.

Removing with the family to Milpitas in 1869, Lemuel F. Castle there continued his studies for a while in the public schools, completing his early education in the San Jose Business College. Entering then the employ of his father, he went to eastern Oregon to buy cattle, which he drove from Crook county to San Jose and Marysville, Cal., making a number of trips each year. On starting in life on his own account, Mr. Castle located in Crook county, Ore., thirty-five miles east of Prineville, where he was successfully engaged in the cattle business for twelve years. At the same time, with his father and brother, Isaac N., he had a large cattle ranch at Hollister, Cal. In 1899, the partnership being dissolved, Mr. Castle drove his fine herd of cattle to Dos Palos, and, having purchased the Davis ranch on Center avenue, has continued in the stock business, buying and selling on a large scale. His home ranch contains fifty-five acres of land, nearly all of which he has planted to alfalfa, a sure and profitable crop. Mr. Castle also owns a cattle ranch of three hundred and twenty acres at Panoche, San Benito county, where he keeps much valuable stock, in addition to his own range leasing one thousand acres of land. His business is extensive and lucrative, his annual income being large.

Geo. H. Whitworth

In Saratoga, Santa Clara county, Mr. Castle married Kate Hartman, who was born and reared in San Jose. Politically he is a staunch Republican, and fraternally belongs to the Knights of the Maccabees and to the Ancient Order of United Workmen.

GEORGE HENRY WHITWORTH. In a meritorious service as member of the board of supervisors of Merced county, Mr. Whitworth has given proof of the fact that the material interests of a county may be trusted to its agriculturists. On the occasion of his first election to represent the Fourth district upon the county board he received a fair majority, and took the oath of office January 1, 1901. At the expiration of four years he was again a candidate subject to the decision of Democratic voters at the primaries August 6, 1904, and at the county convention a week later. During his administration as supervisor a number of improvements have been voted upon and adopted by the board. Probably the most important of these was the passing of the bill which authorized the erection of a county hospital, erected at a cost of $60,000. Another important measure was the building of the jail, which cost $30,000. The courthouse was also remodeled and other improvements adopted. Another improvement was a draw bridge over the San Joaquin river, near Dos Palos. With A. E. Clary, of the Fifth district of Stanislaus county, he became an original promoter of the measure for the building of a steel bridge across the San Joaquin river, and it was a source of gratification to him that the two counties finally erected the much-needed structure across the river.

Mr. Whitworth is of English ancestry, a son of Henry Whitworth, a native of Lincolnshire, England, who came to America in 1848 and landed in New York. From there he went to Chicago, then an insignificant village. In 1849 he went to St. Louis, and with a company of fifty people made up ox and mule teams and started across the plains. Molested by Indians and traveling through New Mexico and Arizona and up the coast to San Jose Mission, they crossed Pacheco Pass to Hill's Ferry, where they ferried the wagons and swam the stock across the river. They then went to the southern mines in Mariposa county, and from there went to Tuolumne county, where some of the party became prosperous. Henry Whitworth mined and teamed in Tuolumne county, where he was married to Ann Hall, a native of Lincolnshire, England, who came to America and California by way of Panama. In 1863 the family moved to Contra Costa county, where they farmed until 1868. That year the father came to Cottonwood district on the Quinto creek, where he pre-empted and later homesteaded, and finally bought more land till eventually he had nine hundred and twenty acres in one body, and eighty acres under the canal, adjoining his son George Henry's farm. He was an honored settler, interested in good schools, good roads, and good government. He was honored and respected by all who knew him and died on his home farm February 15, 1897, aged nearly seventy-three years. His wife died in March, 1877, aged forty-six years. She was the mother of three children: George Henry, John William, and Mary J., who married Robert Butts.

George Henry Whitworth is a Californian by birth as well as by patriotic spirit and loyal devotion to the state's progress. He was born at Dutch Bar, Tuolumne county, March 10, 1856, and passed his early childhood years in the county where he was born. During 1869 he came to the Cottonwood district, where he attended district school and aided his father on the home farm. At the age of twenty-one years, in 1877, he embarked in farming for himself, his first venture being as a renter of grain land. About 1880 he bought a farm in the Cottonwood district. Two years later he bought one hundred and twenty acres on the upper county road. This he put under ditch, suitable for the cultivation of alfalfa, which is his main crop. On his place there are one hundred and fifty head of cattle, of which sixty-five head are milk cows, and since 1896 he has made a specialty of the milk business, his dairy farm three miles south of Newman in Merced county being one of the best in the locality. Besides his home place he owns four hundred and sixty acres on Quinto creek, which is rented to tenants and utilized for the raising of grain. On the organization of the New Era Creamery he became one of its first stockholders, and afterward was chosen a member of its board of directors. He is still a stockholder in this laudable enterprise, which contributed so much to the county's prosperity.

In Santa Cruz, this state, occurred the marriage of Mr. Whitworth to Miss Agnes Mahoney, a native of San Francisco, and a daughter of John Mahoney, who was born in New York and became an influential business man in California. Mrs. Whitworth died November 28, 1903, leaving two sons, John Henry and George Hall. Another child, Carol, died at the age of six months. Fraternally Mr. Whitworth is connected with the Ancient Order of United Workmen and the Degree of Honor, also the Woodmen of the World, and his wife was identified with the Women of Woodcraft. The Democratic party has received his staunch support. In many ways he has promoted its progress in the locality where he resides. Since 1903 he has served as a member of the county central committee, and his election to the board of supervisors was upon the Democratic ticket, and November 8, 1904, he was re-elected to the office of county supervisor, having no opposition.

WILLIAM T. MAUPIN, M. D. Very early in the history of colonial Virginia members of the Maupin family went there from France and assisted in the development of the new country, being especially prominent in their home county of Albemarle. From that state Cornelius Maupin removed with his family to Kentucky and settled on a wild tract of land in Fayette county, later going to Missouri, where his last days were spent. His son, William Maupin, although a native of Virginia, spent his childhood days in Kentucky and as early as 1816 became one of the first settlers in Boone county, Mo., whither he journeyed by wagon. He settled in Columbia and built one of the first houses erected in that now populous university town. For more than sixty years he made his home on a farm six miles from Columbia, and there his death occurred at seventy-seven years of age. A man of public spirit and a firm believer in the benefits to be derived from a good education, he was a patron and friend of the institutions that were established in his home town for the education of the young.

By his first marriage William Maupin had three children, only one of whom survives, Mrs. Cockrell, of Great Falls, Mont. His second wife, Isabelle Lemon, was born in Georgetown, Ky., and died in Columbia, Mo., at seventy-seven years of age. Six children were born of that union, four of whom are living, Dr. W. T. Maupin, of Fresno, being next to the youngest. Another son, Judge R. L. Maupin, of Mobile, Ala., served as aide-de-camp to Gen. Frank Cockrell throughout the Civil war and was wounded at Atlanta. Dr. Maupin's maternal grandfather, Robert Lemon, was a native of Scotland and came to America prior to the Revolutionary war. In that historic struggle he bore an honorable part and in an engagement with the British received a sabre cut across the head. For years he had a farm in Kentucky, but became a pioneer of Boone county, Mo., and engaged in farm pursuits there. His life was spared to the great age of ninety-seven years.

On the homestead near Columbia, Mo., Dr. W. T. Maupin was born April 17, 1839. As a boy he was a pupil in the Columbia public schools and later studied in the William Jewell College, a Baptist institution at Liberty, Mo., where he completed the studies of the junior year. Under Dr. A. P. Spence, of Columbia, he took up the study of medicine. At the first call of Governor Jackson for troops, in 1861, he enlisted at Jefferson City under Colonel Singleton, and later was transferred to General Price's command. On retiring from the army in 1862 he resumed the study of medicine, taking a course of lectures in the St. Louis Medical College, and in 1864 graduating from the Jefferson Medical College at Philadelphia. Returning to Columbia, he opened an office for the practice of medicine and surgery and continued in the same city as a practitioner for twenty-three years. Meanwhile for years he was a member of the board of curators of Stevens College.

On his arrival in Fresno in 1887, Dr. Maupin found a city of scarcely four thousand inhabitants, yet bearing then, as it does now, the appearance of thrift, prosperity and enterprise. His ability was given ready recognition and he has held a rank among the leading physicians and influential men of the city. While acting as health officer he took advantage of the sanitary law of California and filled up the old mill ditch running through the town where Fresno street now is. His course aroused many protests and much opposition, but those who recognize the fact that the street is now one of the best in the city, concur as to the wisdom of his action. At one time he was honored with the office of vice-president of the State Medical Society, and for several terms he was president of the Fresno County Medical Society. On the organization of the San Joaquin District Medical Society he became one of its charter members and continues his association with it to the present.

In Columbia, Mo., Dr. Maupin married Miss Mary A. Mathews, who was born and reared in that city and graduated from Christian College with the degree of A. B. Her father, James Lawrence Mathews, went to Missouri from Virginia and became a pioneer business man of Columbia, where he died at the age of sixty-seven years. In the family of Dr. and Mrs. Maupin there are four children, namely: Lulu B., wife of H. U. Maxfield, a business man of Oakland; J. Lawrence, a graduate of the College of Physicians and Surgeons in St. Louis, later doing post-graduate work in New York City, and now a physician and surgeon in Fresno; Bettie B., at home; and Mary W., wife of A. O. Warner, a jeweler in Fresno.

In religious belief Dr. Maupin is a Baptist. He was made a Mason in Columbia Lodge No. 114, at Columbia, Mo., in 1865, and is now a member of the lodge in Fresno. His Chapter membership has also been transferred from Columbia to Trigo Chapter No. 69, R. A. M., at Fresno. The Knight Templar degree was conferred upon him in Columbia and he is now connected with Fresno Commandery No. 29, besides which he is identified with Islam Temple, N. M. S., of San Francisco. In politics he has always been a pronounced Democrat. As chairman of the county central committee and a member of the state central committee, he has rendered his party effective service. While living in Missouri, in 1880, he was a delegate to the national convention at St. Louis, which nominated Hancock for the presidency. An active friend of the public school system, he is a member of the Fresno Board of Education and, as a member of its building committee, took a leading part in 1903 in the erection of three school houses costing altogether more than $80,000. He is past commander of the Price Camp, Confederate Veterans' Association of Fresno. Since 1889 he has held the position of surgeon for the San Joaquin division of the Southern Pacific Railroad and, in connection therewith, is identified with the Association of Railway Surgeons of the Pacific Coast.

CHARLES D. SMITH, whose fortunes have been more or less intimately identified with the state of California since the fall of 1859, is now living in retirement in Fresno, enjoying the fruits of his early industry and toil. His life has been a varied and eventful one, and its record is entitled to a place in the history of California. He was born in Oakland county, Mich., August 21, 1839, a son of Addison and Caroline B. (Teeples) Smith. Both his parents were natives of New York, his father having been born in Onondaga county February 8, 1812, and his mother in Chautauqua county December 18, 1824. His father followed the occupation of carpenter, removing to Michigan in young manhood. After the death of his wife, which occurred January 7, 1857, he left Michigan for a home in Illinois, and the following year located near Galesburg. About a year after settling in Galesburg he again married, and soon afterward, in 1861, enlisted as a private in Company A, Sixty-fifth Illinois Volunteer Infantry. His service in behalf of the Union covered a period of nearly three years, his death occurring at Camp Nelson February 22, 1864.

Charles D. Smith received his education in the common schools of Michigan. After the completion of his studies he assisted his father in carpenter work until he was twenty years of age. In the spring of 1859 he joined a party bound for Pike's Peak, where it was widely reported gold had been discovered, but on arriving in that region they found that the reports regarding the existence of the precious metal there had been grossly exaggerated, and that time spent there would be wasted. He accordingly decided to push on to California with the other members of his party, which they accordingly did, arriving in Placerville September 7, 1859. The gold fever still surging through his veins, he continued prospecting and mining in the vicinity of Placerville for a short time, when, concluding that other occupations would be rewarded with more substantial returns, he abandoned his search for gold. Securing a position on the toll road between Lincoln and Bear River, in Placer county, he was thus employed for about five years. Upon the expiration of that time he returned to his old home in Michigan, and engaged in farming in the vicinity of Flint. In connection with farming he conducted a general store in Flint for about two years, with fair success. He continued to reside in Genesee county, Mich., until 1889, when he disposed of his business interests there and came once more to California, locating at once in Fresno county. Purchasing one hundred and sixty acres of unimproved land, located five miles west of Fresno, on the Whitesbridge road, he planted a vineyard and began the general improvement of the property. Subsequently he sold off eighty acres in twenty-acre tracts, and upon the balance engaged in the culture of the raisin grape until 1902. In that year he purchased a comfortable residence in Fresno, where he has since resided.

Mr. Smith affiliates with the Republican party. During his residence in Michigan he participated actively in municipal affairs, serving for six years as a member of the city council of Flint, but since settling in California he has left the conduct of public affairs to others. December 24, 1865, in Genesee county, Mich., he was united in marriage with Ellen Hodge, who was born in Clarendon, Ohio, March 4, 1845, a daughter of Chauncey and Fanny (Parks) Hodge, the former a native of New York. After marriage her parents removed from Ohio to Michigan, when Mrs. Smith was a child, locating for a time in Tipton, but afterward moving to Genesee county. Her father was a carpenter by trade, but also engaged in farming in connection with work at the former calling. Mr. and Mrs. Smith have been the parents of two sons, namely: Edwin A., who resides in Concord, Contra Costa county, Cal.; and William T., whose death occurred in 1900.

Mr. Smith is highly regarded by those who have been favored with his acquaintance. He takes a liberal view of public affairs, and may be depended upon to extend his assistance and co-operation toward the success of projects looking toward the advancement of the community.

REUBEN HENDERSON BRAMLET.

Closely associated with the advancement of the agricultural prosperity of Fresno county is Reuben Henderson Bramlet, who owns and occupies a choice and well-improved ranch, which is pleasantly located about five miles northeast of Selma. Well educated, talented and of undoubted business capacity, he has attained a place of influence in the community, and has established himself in the confidence of his friends and fellow-citizens, who hold him in high regard and favor. A son of Coleman Bramlet, he was born February 7, 1842, in Saline county, Ill.; he comes of patriotic stock, Reuben Bramlet, his paternal grandfather, having been a soldier in the Revolutionary war, and also in the war of 1812, taking part in the battle of New Orleans. After the Revolution he removed from Virginia, his native state, to South Carolina, thence to Princeton, Ky. In 1818, becoming a pioneer settler of Saline county, Ill., he bought wild land, and was there employed in tilling the soil until his death.

A native of Princeton, Ky., Coleman Bramlet lived there until sixteen years old, when, in 1818, he moved with his parents to Illinois. Selecting farming as his life occupation he took up land in Saline county, and was there successfully employed in the pursuit of agriculture until his death, February 28, 1889, at the venerable age of eighty-seven years and thirteen days. His wife, to whom he was married in 1823, bore the maiden name of Susan Upchurch. She was born in Tennessee, and died in October, 1889, on the home farm in Illinois. Of the ten sons and two daughters born of their union, Reuben H., the subject of this sketch, was the tenth child.

After coming to California from his Illinois

home, in 1867, Reuben Henderson Bramlet completed his education at the University of the Pacific, taking a special course of three years, partly paying his expenses by working during the vacations in Santa Clara. Removing to what is now Madera county in 1870, he taught school in Fresno flats for four years, being among the first teachers in Fresno county. The following two years Mr. Bramlet was county superintendent of the Fresno county schools, and served the following five years as county auditor and county superintendent. In 1883 he was again elected county auditor, and served ten years. Buying one hundred and forty acres of land in Fresno county, near Sanger, in 1893, he was there engaged in general ranching for a number of years. Selling out in December, 1902, Mr. Bramlet bought his present farm, lying five miles northeast of Selma, and is managing the eighty acres included in the purchase with success, raising fruit, vines and alfalfa.

At Kingriver, Fresno county, Mr. Bramlet married Euphemia Ellen Wren, who was born in Adams county, Ill., and came across the plains to California with her parents in 1863. Her father, John Wren, a native of Adams county, Ill., came first to California in 1849, and was for awhile engaged in mining, but was not very successful. Returning to Illinois, he remained there until 1863, when he brought his family to the coast, locating in Fresno, Cal., where he carried on a substantial business until his death. Of the union of Mr. and Mrs. Bramlet four children were born, namely: John C., who died at the age of two years; Eva, wife of C. M. Mannon, of Ukiah, Cal.; Dora; and Ellen, who died at the age of seven years. Politically Mr. Bramlet endorses the principles of the Democratic party, and religiously he is a member of the Baptist Church.

TRUMAN GEORGE HART. Prominent among the younger generation of business men of Fresno county is Truman G. Hart, of Fresno, a man well known throughout the San Joaquin valley, and everywhere respected. He is an excellent representative of the native-born sons of California, and in his every-day life exemplifies in a marked degree the influences of heredity, environments and training upon the mind. A son of Judge Charles A. and Ann (Brennan) (McKenzie) Hart, he was born April 9, 1866, in Millerton, Fresno county. For further ancestral history see the sketch of Judge Charles A. Hart, which may be found on another page of this volume.

Having obtained the rudiments of his education in the public schools of Millerton and Fresno. Truman G. Hart in 1882 entered St. Augustine's College, in Benicia, whence he was graduated in 1886. Locating then in Fresno, he became identified with the Fresno County Abstract Company, which he served as its business manager for a number of years. In 1894 he was elected county clerk of Fresno county on the Republican ticket, receiving the large majority of seven hundred votes. Taking the oath of office in January, 1895, Mr. Hart served most faithfully for four years, at the end of his term declining a renomination for the office. Becoming a pioneer in the oil industry, he was one of the organizers, and a director of the Producers' & Consumers' Oil Company, which put down wells on sections 20, township 19, range 15, and succeeded in finding a good flow of oil. Subsequently disposing of his stock in that company, Mr. Hart assisted in organizing the Oil City Petroleum Company, of which he is president. This company has a tract of three hundred and twenty acres, lying in section 28, township 19, range 15, on which are eleven finely producing wells, all of good capacity. He was also one of the organizers, and is president, of the Twenty-eight Oil Company, which owns one hundred and sixty acres of land in section 28, and has eleven wells in operation, each one having a capacity of four hundred barrels of oil per day. Mr. Hart is also identified with other financial enterprises, holding an interest in mining property in Madera county, and being president, and one of the incorporators, of the Fresno Realty & Agency Company, which lays out and builds up additions to the city, and handles real estate of all kinds. In advancing and promoting the interests of the numerous companies with which he is officially associated, Mr. Hart is the leading spirit, his business ability and judgment being unquestioned.

In Fresno, September 29, 1892, Mr. Hart married Augusta A. Trowbridge, who was born and reared in Illinois. Politically Mr. Hart is a staunch advocate of the principles of the Republican party, and socially he is a charter member of the Sequoia Club. In his religious belief he is an Episcopalian.

FRED BARTCH. With the energy and resource characteristic of the race from which he springs, Fred Bartch has hewn his way to a prominent place in the affairs of Stanislaus county, eliciting approval as manager of twenty-seven hundred acres of the Patterson ranch, as one of the most extensive land owners and grain growers in the county, as the chief stock holder and manager of the Rising Sun Warehouse Company, one of the largest purchasers and shippers of wheat in this section, and as a director in the Farmers & Merchants Bank of Modesto. Fraternally he is identified with the Masons, holding membership in Blue Lodge No. 236, of Newman, Chapter No. 49, of Modesto, Commandery No. 8, of Stockton, and with the Knights Templar. He is a Republican who has rendered useful and intelligent service to his party, both as an office holder and as representative of his district to state and county conventions.

For generations Mr. Bartch's ancestors were known as agriculturists and trades-people in the grand duchy of Baden, southern Germany, where he was born November 26, 1844, and which was the birthplace also of his parents, George John and Catherine S. (Faulholver) Bartch. When he was eight years old, in 1852, his parents brought their then small family to the United States, locating in New York state, where they lived on a farm and prospered for many years. In all, eleven children were born to them, five of whom are living, Fred being the third. In his search for a betterment of his prospects the father decided upon California as his future home, and after coming here with several of the children in 1884, engaged in farming near Santa Rosa until 1892. In the meantime his wife died, and in 1892 he removed to Tulare county, where he at present lives with his son, Louis Bartch, eight miles west of the town of Tulare. The cares of life have fallen lightly on his shoulders, and he reaps the reward of a moderate and evenly-balanced existence, retaining in excellent condition the majority of his faculties at the age of ninety years.

To his willingness to sit by candle light and ward off sleep until the small hours of the morning, Mr. Bartch owes whatever of early education and book learning he acquired. His father's farm failing to provide for so many mouths, he set out early to work his way on surrounding farms in New York state, finally finding himself in Erie county when the Civil war broke in fury over the country. Espousing the cause of the Union, he enlisted in Company E, One Hundred and Sixteenth New York Volunteer Infantry, in August, 1861, and as a drummer boy kept up the spirits of the company for three months. He next carried a musket in the soldier ranks of his regiment, and was with Butler and Banks at the battle of Port Hudson. Receiving his discharge in New Orleans in December, 1864, he improved his liberty by removing to Ionia county, Mich., where a change of occupation awaited him in the great lumber camps of that region. For two years he made his headquarters at Hubbardston, and in 1867 returned to Erie county, N. Y., later locating in Herkimer county, where he assisted in making the cheese for which the county is famous. Returning to Erie county he lived there a year, and in November, 1869, came by rail to California, soon afterward finding employment on a farm in Ventura county. In 1873 he began to work on the Patterson ranch in Stanislaus county, his ability soon elevating him to the position of manager, which he occupied for two years. He then leased six hundred acres of the Patterson ranch, and at the present time farms twenty-seven hundred acres of this same ranch, besides eleven hundred and twenty acres of his own. In all he is the owner of nineteen hundred and eighty acres in the western part of Stanislaus county, near Westley and Newman, sixty of which are under alfalfa. For years he has been one of the county's foremost wheat and grain raisers, and while thus employed became interested in the Rising Sun Warehouse project, in which he is a large stockholder and the present manager. He probably knows as much about wheat as any man in the county, and his judgment has come to be regarded as final in all transactions involving differences of opinion along wheat-raising lines. The Patterson ranch, as well as his own, are managed along practical and scientific lines, and are made to yield to the extent of their fertility and resource. Needless to say that the finest and most modern of implements are owned and used, or that the most admirable method and system prevails throughout. Mr. Barch has a pleasant country home, in which comfort and hospitality abound, and which owns as mistress she who was once Katie Nickert, formerly of New York state, and who was also born in Germany. Mr. and Mrs. Barch have no children. Mr. Barch is one of the substantial and influential men of Stanislaus county, and enjoys those advantages conferred by unquestioned integrity, business success, generous impulses and the affectionate regard of a large circle of friends.

FRANCIS MARION PRESTON. Among the prominent and enterprising business men of central California is Francis Marion Preston, who is actively engaged in agricultural pursuits, which he follows according to the most approved scientific methods. He makes a specialty of dairying, having a well stocked ranch, and raising large quantities of alfalfa for feeding his cattle. A son of C. J. Preston, he was born January 23, 1861, in Troy, Bradford county, Pa. His grandfather, Colburn Preston, the descendant of an old and honored New England family, was born in Vermont, and served in the war of 1812. He subsequently settled in Bradford county, Pa., and assisted in clearing the site of the present city of Troy.

A native of Pennsylvania, C. J. Preston grew to manhood on the home farm. Sailing by way of Panama in 1865 he came to California, and the following year took up one hundred and sixty acres of land in Contra Costa county. Succeeding well as a farmer, he sent for his family, who joined him in 1870, and he is still there employed in general farming and stock raising, now having three hundred and twenty acres of land in his home ranch. He married Melissa Woodard, who was born in Bradford county, Pa., where her father, Daniel Woodard, settled on removing from Vermont. Of the five daughters and two sons born of their union, all are living with the exception of one daughter, Francis Marion, the special subject of this biography, being the oldest child.

But nine years of age when he came to California to join his father, Francis Marion Preston was educated in the district schools of Contra Costa county. Choosing the free and independent occupation to which he was reared, he came to Merced county in 1886, settling near Newman, where he bought eighty acres of land on the Middle road, below the canal. With characteristic industry and thrift, he at once began its improvement, soon having it planted to alfalfa. He also enlarged his operations, from 1892 until 1900 raising grain on the Crittenden ranch, which consists of eight hundred acres of land, located above the canal. Mr. Preston subsequently purchased sixty-six acres of land lying near his original estate, and now has the entire one hundred and forty-six acres devoted to the raising of alfalfa. He is profitably employed, also, in dairying, keeping one hundred and forty head of cattle, and milking about sixty cows, chiefly Durhams and Holsteins. A man of much energy and keen foresight, Mr. Preston was one of the promoters and original stockholders of the New Era Creamery Company, which built the first creamery in the valley, and was a member of its first board of directors, on which he is now serving for the third consecutive year, in 1902 and 1903 being likewise president of the board.

In Contra Costa county, Cal., Mr. Preston married Ida Burress, a native of that county. Her father, Wilburn Burress, was born in Tennessee, and when eighteen years old came by way of Panama to Contra Costa county, where he followed general farming and stock raising until his death. He married Arvilla Morgan, who was born in Texas, and came from there to California with her father, Wesley Morgan, and they became the parents of three children, of whom Mrs. Preston is the oldest. Of the union of Mr. and Mrs. Preston two children have been born, namely: Marion and Lloyd. An active and loyal Republican in his political views, Mr. Preston takes great interest in local affairs, and for sixteen years has been a school trustee in the Canal district, and is now serving as president of the board. Fraternally he is a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen, and of the Woodmen of the World.

JOHN W. SHARP. A veteran agriculturist, and one of the earliest settlers of the San Joaquin valley, John W. Sharp has been a resident of this locality for half a century, and has been an important factor in developing its resources, and advancing its growth and prosperity. Coming here when the country roundabout was in its pristine wilderness, he endured the hardships and trials of pioneer life without murmur, helping to make straight and thornless the pathway of the coming generations. That he and his fellow-laborers succeeded in their efforts, the broad expanse of highly cultivated fields, the productive orchards, the well improved dairy farms, and the large herds of magnificent cattle and horses give ample evidence. A son of John Sharp, he was born October 27, 1835, in Bedford county, Va., of substantial ancestry.

Born and bred in old Virginia, John Sharp moved from there to Missouri, following a broken pathway through the woods and across the intervening prairies with wagons to Montgomery county, where he cleared and improved a farm. In 1850 he came with ox teams to California, and after working for two years in the mines returned by way of Panama to his Missouri farm, where he spent the remainder of his life. He was a man of great integrity, honored and respected by all, and was a faithful member of the Presbyterian Church. When a young man he was a captain in a company of militia, in those times when musters and training days were holiday events, and called out all of the people for miles around. He married Margaret Jeter, who removed with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Pleasant Jeter from Virginia to Montgomery county, Mo., and there resided during the remainder of her life. She bore him five children, all of whom grew to years of maturity, and four are now living, John W. being the only one on the Pacific coast.

Having first attended the district school, John W. Sharp subsequently continued his studies in the public schools of St. Louis and Palmyra, Mo. Entering the employ of Ambrose Stark in 1854, he drove an ox team across the plains, following the trail through Ogden, along the Humboldt, entering California by the Lawson route, arriving at Colusa, Cal., after a trip of six months. Making his way from there to Marysville, Mr. Sharp worked for a short time in the Yuba mines, and was then employed in teaming on the McCosma river, in Sacramento county. Locating at Hill's Ferry, on the San Joaquin river, in 1855, he worked for a number of years for Mr. Wilson, a cattle man, and then worked for John McPike, after which he turned his attention to ranching.

Embarking in the sheep business on his own account in 1874, he established a ranch on the Orestimba creek, buying out Mr. Reed, and continued as a sheep raiser and dealer for six years. Selling out his sheep in 1880, Mr. Sharp purchased cattle, and was subsequently engaged in stock raising in the same locality. He afterwards bought land on the valley bottoms, eleven miles from Newman, and in addition to his cattle business, was employed as a grain raiser. In 1893 he disposed of his cattle, and from that time until 1904 raised mules, having large herds. In March, 1904, he sold off all of his stock, and has since rented that land. Previously, in 1903, Mr. Sharp bought his present ranch of twenty acres of alfalfa land on the Middle road, about one mile south of Newman. He takes an active interest in local affairs, and is identified with the Democratic party, being an ardent supporter of its principles.

GEN. M. W. MULLER is one of the most prominent men in the military circles of the Pacific coast, being the ranking brigadier-general of the National Guard of California. He is also one of the leading business men of Fresno, being an extensive individual grain dealer in this part of the state. A man of strong mental vigor and of exceptional ability, he cordially endorses all enterprises calculated to advance the city's prosperity, being actively interested in its industrial, mercantile, military and political development. He was born in Germany, February 26, 1853, and came to the United States when a mere boy, his parents having lived in New Orleans, La., previous to that time where his father was engaged in the mercantile business for a number of years. He was educated in the public schools of San Francisco, the City College and the Pacific Business College. After his graduation from the latter institution he was engaged in the real estate business in that city for several years. In 1883, General Muller came to Fresno to take charge of the books of the Puget Sound Lumber Company, which had yards located throughout the San Joaquin valley. Having straightened out the books satisfactorily, he served as agent for the company until it sold out to Moore & Smith. Embarking then, in 1887, in the grain business, with headquarters in the Fresno National Bank building, General Muller has become one of the most extensive wholesale grain dealers on the coast. He handles grain by the carload, having agents in different parts of the valley and warehouses in Fresno, Caruthers, Herndon, Clovis and Sanger.

In 1874 General Muller began his military career in San Francisco, serving first as a private, through one term of enlistment, in Company F, First Regiment, California National Guard, and then through two terms of enlistment in Company F, Second Regiment. When Company C, Sixth Battalion—later Sixth Regiment—was organized in Fresno, in 1885, he was made captain of the company, receiving his commission from Governor Stoneman. November 10, 1891, he was appointed brigadier-general of the Third Brigade by Governor Markham and has served in this capacity ever since, having been re-appointed by Governors Waterman, Budd, Gage and Pardee. When General Muller assumed his present office, in 1891, the brigade had but eight companies, but now consists of eighteen companies of infantry and a cavalry troop.

In Fresno, General Muller married Minnie A. Clifford, who was born in Stockton, the daughter of Henry K. Clifford, a pioneer of California. General and Mrs. Muller are the parents of two children, Maude and Ruth, who are now attending Miss Hamlin's School in San Francisco. In politics General Muller is a staunch Republican; socially he belongs to the Sequoia Club and the Union League Club and is a member of the Chamber of Commerce.

J. B. HANCOCK. An early settler of San Joaquin valley, J. B. Hancock, now tax collector of Fresno county, is a native of Missouri and a descendant of old Virginia ancestry. His paternal grandfather, Benjamin Hancock, was born in Patrick county, Va., of English extraction, and during early manhood settled in St. Charles county, Mo., when St. Louis was an insignificant French hamlet. The remaining years of his life were passed in St. Charles county and there his son, John Calvin Hancock, was born and reared. When choosing an occupation for life the latter selected the science of medicine, the study of which he prosecuted in the Louisville Medical College. After his graduation with the degree of M. D., he opened an office in Columbia, Boone county, Mo., and there established a growing practice. His death occurred at an early age, when he was just beginning to reap the reward of years of study and devotion to his profession.

The wife of Dr. John C. Hancock was Serena Barton, who was born in Boone county, Mo., and died in San Joaquin county, Cal., leaving two sons, namely: Benjamin, a stockman residing on the Sycamore, Fresno county; and J. B., of Fresno. Mrs. Hancock was a daughter of Jonathan Barton, who was a native of South Carolina and a farmer of Kentucky, later becoming one of the earliest settlers of Boone county, Mo., and a pioneer in the Santa Fe trade. During 1849 he crossed the plains to California and took up the adventurous life of a miner. The country so attracted him that he resolved to settle in California permanently, therefore in 1852 he returned via Panama to Missouri for his family, who accompanied him across the plains the following year. Taking up land near Stockton, San Joaquin county, he entered upon the occupation of stock-raising, in which his remaining active years were spent. At the time of his death he had reached the age of eighty-four years.

In the Missouri county where he was born May 13, 1842, J. B. Hancock passed the first eleven years of his life. During 1853, with his mother and grandfather, he crossed the plains, starting from Independence in April, crossing the Kaw at the present site of Lawrence, Kans., later crossing the Blue and Platte rivers, thence proceeding via Sweetwater, Devil's Gate, South Pass, Salt Lake, down the Humboldt river and through Carson Cañon, thence over the Sierras and on to the San Joaquin valley, where the party arrived in September, after a journey with their ox-teams of five months and three days. In those days schools were few. The first which Mr. Hancock attended in this state was held in a canvas-covered tent in San Joaquin county and was of the old-fashioned subscription nature. Having little opportunity to attend school, he began to earn his own livelihood at an age when most boys are completing their educations, and at sixteen embarked in the stock business, selected a brand for his own use and took his part in all of the round-ups of his neighborhood.

Selling out his cattle interests in 1865, Mr. Hancock started east with a party of nine, traveling on horseback and using pack-mules for conveyance of supplies. At Fort Bridger they were stopped by troops and joined a company of fifty men from Idaho. Indians were hostile and the danger to white travelers great, therefore the expedition was heavily armed and ready for attack at any moment. After leaving Austin, Nev., they followed the Bitter Creek route and the overland trail, going from Julesburg to Nebraska City along the route now followed by the Union Pacific Railroad. Notwithstanding dangers seen and unseen, Mr. Hancock arrived safely at Columbia, and from there went to Wisconsin, where he remained a year. Later travels took him to other portions of the United States, but nowhere did he find a spot that suited him as well as California. He therefore returned to the coast and in 1870 settled in Fresno county, where he first was employed at lumbering and then engaged in farming in the Dry Creek country. Successive years of drought caused him to give up the land, after which he purchased one hundred and sixty acres in the Lone Star country, six miles southeast of Fresno, and began to raise fruit and raisins, also alfalfa. The entire tract being under irrigation and well improved was sold at an excellent profit. Another purchase of similar acreage he still owns, the land being divided between vineyard and alfalfa fields.

Since 1899 Mr. Hancock has made his home in Fresno, where he owns residence property on N street. He is a member of the Fresno Chamber of Commerce. In politics he votes with the Democratic party. In 1898 he was nominated for county tax collector by the Populists, endorsed by the Democrats, and won the election by a majority of three hundred and thirty. At the expiration of his first term he was nominated by the Democrats for the same position and elected by a majority of five hundred and twenty-five. His wife, whom he married in Fresno county, was formerly Alice Donahoo, and was born in Iowa, whence she came to California in 1873 with her father, Peter Donahoo. The six children of Mr. and Mrs. Hancock are as follows: Clarence, a farmer of Fresno county; Nellie, wife of Isaac Harris, of Fresno; Claude, who is engaged in farming in Fresno county; James L., a student in Fresno Business College; Albert Sidney and Hattie Serena.

CHARLES LATHAM. Foremost among the successful general farmers and fruit raisers of the vicinity of Hanford is Charles Latham, a man of varied experience in the west, who crossed the plains in 1862, at the age of twenty-one, bringing with him assets consisting chiefly of a strong constitution and the reliable characteristics of the sturdy families of New England. He was born in Livingston county, Ill., May 17, 1841, a son of Lyman S. and grandson of Cyrus Latham, both of whom were born in Connecticut, and were of English descent. His mother was Mary A. (Gallup) Latham, also born in Connecticut, and who died in Contra Costa, Cal., at the age of eighty-four years. Lyman S. Latham was somewhat of a wanderer in early life, for after his marriage he removed to Pennsylvania, and four years later to Illinois, and in the spring of 1858 to Nebraska, locating five miles from Omaha. He was one of the earliest settlers in his county in the territory of Nebraska, and lived there until the spring of 1862, when he made preparation to cross the plains with his wife and children, equipped with ox teams, provisions, and sufficient furnishing to begin housekeeping in the west. The journey was uneventful compared to that experienced by earlier emigrants. Upon arriving in California they settled in Sutter county, west of Marysville, where the father took up government land, but later sold it and purchased land on the Sacramento river. There he engaged in general farming and stock raising until his death, at the age of sixty-three. From a business standpoint he was fairly successful, but he lost by reason of his unsettled condition of mind, rarely staying in a place long enough to become thoroughly identified with it. He was a member of the Presbyterian Church, and in politics was a Republican.

Charles Latham was one in a family of eight children, and his early advantages were such as might be expected to fall to the lot of one in his circumstances. He knew more of hard work than of recreation or education, and whatever of general knowledge has come his way has been acquired through later application. In 1861 and 1862 he was engaged in driving ox teams in freight trains for Major & Russell from Omaha to Denver, and during this period had many exciting experiences on the plains. He left the home ranch soon after reaching the coast, and after three years of working by the month on different farms in Sutter county, bought a squatter's right in that county and began to raise stock on a small scale. In time he added to his property and finally had a thousand acres, which he occupied and managed until 1883. A sagacious business man, and excellent judge of stock, he made the most of his opportunity, and upon disposing of his farm and stock in the fall of 1883, realized a gratifying profit. March 11, 1868, Mr. Latham married Frances E. Wemple, a native of Schenectady county, N. Y., who came to California in 1860. Of this union six children have been born, of whom Jennie is the wife of Richard Montgomery, a rancher of Kings county; George is a rancher in the same county; Fred C. is also engaged in farming and stock raising in Kings county; Mary A. is the wife of Oscar Railsback, of Kings county; Grace is the wife of Arthur R. Raymond, of Los Angeles; and Hearold is assisting his father on the home ranch.

After selling his stock ranch Mr. Latham went to College City to educate his children, remaining there five years, then purchasing his present farm of one hundred and sixty acres, to which he soon afterward added an equal amount of land. Half of his land is under fruit and vines, and the balance under alfalfa. He has also rented four hundred and eighty acres three miles southwest of Hanford for ten years, and from this derives a substantial income, as it is all under alfalfa. He has added to the original improvements of his home farm, and now has a valuable and productive property, and ample facilities for caring for his various products. He has been interested in oil development in the surrounding counties, and owns an interest in the Knob Hill Oil Company, of Kern county. Mr. Latham is a Republican in politics, but has never held office, and fraternally is connected with both the Masons and Independent Order of Odd Fellows. He is a substantial, painstaking man, thoroughly honorable in all of his dealings, and of a pronounced public spirit. He represents the type of strong, persevering, and practical early settler who has laid the foundation of the agricultural prestige of the coast.

WILLIAM GIBBINS URIDGE. Whatever their nationality or previous environment the citizens of Fresno are one in their admiration for their home city and their faith in its possibilities. Among all of them none is more loyal to the city or more enthusiastic in its praise than William G. Uridge, who has made his home in California for a long period and has witnessed the gradual development of local industries as well as the steady growth of population. Of English birth and lineage, his settlement in Fresno was somewhat an accident, but his continuance here is from choice. He is a grandson of Henry Gibbins, who for many years and until his death acted as vice-chairman of the board of directors of the Prudential Assurance Company of London, England, his successor now being Sir Henry Harben, a cousin of Joseph Chamberlain, the colonial secretary of England.

From the homestead of the Uridge family in county Sussex, fifty miles south of London, William G. Uridge started for the United States in the spring of 1885. Though intending to settle in this country, he had no definite point in view. While on shipboard he met a family en route for California and from them he heard for the first time concerning Fresno. On inquiring as to the place, they drew an attractive word picture of comfortable homes surrounded by vineyards and fig trees lying within a sun-kissed valley. Attracted by the description, he at once resolved to visit the place, and May of 1885 found him investigating conditions and prospects at Fresno. The favorable impression at first formed has been deepened during his residence here and he has found his liking for the city, like good wine, increases with age. More than ever before, he now believes in its great future. While business and pleasure have caused him to visit many parts of California, he still believes Fresno to be the best county in the state. This is not alone from the standpoint of a capitalist seeking a field for investment, but he believes the place to offer particularly great advantages for a poor man, on account of the twenty-acre system.

As a member of the Chamber of Commerce Mr. Uridge has been connected with various movements for the benefit of the city. He is the owner of real estate not only here, but also in other parts of the county. Soon after arriving here he bought a tract of raw land, which he set out in a vineyard and then sold. Later he bought another unimproved tract at Orangedale, Fresno county, where he now owns one hundred and twenty-six acres under cultivation to oranges. As an addition to Fresno he laid out North Park and North Park Extension, comprising twenty acres altogether, all of which has been sold out in town lots, and at this writing promises to be the best residence part of the city at no distant day. Besides his fruit interests he is connected with other enterprises. He was one of the incorporators of the Central California Redwood Company, and also the Western Pacific Lumber Company, and is at this writing president of both companies, being thus actively associated with the building of the companies' mills in Tulare county, east of Porterville, where the companies engage in the manufacture of redwood and pine lumber. Another enterprise which he assisted in incorporating is the Golden Gate Brick Company, in which he holds the office of president, and which has its plant at Antioch, Contra Costa county. The company's specialty is the manufacture of sand lime brick, which is practically an artificial sandstone.

Reared in the faith of the Church of England, Mr. Uridge is now connected with the Fresno Episcopal Church and holds the office of senior warden therein. Socially, he was one of the organizers in the incorporation of the Sequoia Club and is now its vice-president. Since becoming a citizen of the United States he has affiliated with the Republican party. He was married in Fresno to Mildred, the daughter of John Finnell, of Napa county, Cal.

PROF. J. N. SPROUSE. Occupying a foremost position among the educational institutions of the San Joaquin valley is the Fresno Business College, of which Prof. J. N. Sprouse is the owner and proprietor. When he came to Fresno in 1897 he was for a time connected with the institution as principal of its commercial department, but resigned in 1898 and opened Sprouse's Commercial College. Two years later he purchased the Fresno Business College and consolidated the two institutions, which he has since successfully conducted, having now an annual enrollment of more than two hundred students in the stenographic and commercial departments. At the time he purchased the college its enrollment was small and its indebtedness large, but under his energetic and judicious management debts have been paid, and the college occupies well-lighted, commodious quarters, equal to any business college on the coast. The six rooms utilized by the college are furnished neatly and comfortably, and supplied with all of the necessary equipment for work. While a majority of the students are from Fresno, there are also many from different parts of the entire valley. Positions are secured for students when they have reached a point in their studies where they can be recommended for accurate and reliable work, and such has been the demand for clerical help that a large majority of the students leave before graduation to accept remunerative situations. In the shorthand department the Pitman system is taught, and graduates are prepared to take positions as private secretaries, amanuenses, stenographic law clerks and court reporters. Many of the stenographers now holding positions in Fresno received their training in the college under the conscientious and efficient instruction of Mrs. Olive J. Sprouse, principal of the shorthand and typewriting department. A recent innovation is a course in advertising, a new business, offering golden opportunities to those who master it now. An expert advertiser has been secured by the college, who instructs the regular students in the science of advertising without extra cost to the pupils, except the cost of necessary stationery.

Near Mount Vernon, Ill., Prof. J. N. Sprouse was born September 30, 1867, being the eldest child of Rev. David and Millie (York) Sprouse. His father, who was a native of Ohio, in an early day accompanied his parents to Illinois and settled on a farm in Jefferson county, where he grew to manhood. During the Civil war he was a member of an Illinois regiment and fought in the memorable battle of Shiloh and the siege of Vicksburg. On his return from the army he took up farm pursuits, but also gave much time and attention to the work of a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church. From Illinois in 1876 he removed to Kansas and settled on a farm in Butler county, where he remained for some years. Since retiring from active cares he has made his home at Southwest City, Mo. He is a member of the Grand Army of the Republic. His wife, who was born near Nashville, Tenn., grew to womanhood in Kentucky and is still living. Of their five children, three are living, J. N. being the only one on the Pacific coast. He was nine years of age when the family settled in Kansas and afterward aided in the clearing of the home farm, also attended the high school at Chetopa, of which he is a graduate. In 1891 he taught a term of school, after which he studied for a year in Park College at Park-ville, Mo., later taking a course in the Wichita Commercial College, from which he was graduated in 1893. Later he taught in the commercial department of Soule College until 1897, when he came to Fresno and has since been identified with educational work in this city. The school of which he is the head is located on the corner of J and Tulare streets.

In Fresno Professor Sprouse married Miss Jennie Sumner, who was born at Gold Hill, Nev., and came to California with her father, John M. Sumner, a pioneer rancher in Central Colony, Fresno county. In religious connections Mrs. Sprouse is a Presbyterian. The family residence stands three-quarters of a mile from Fresno, where Prof. Sprouse bought twenty acres of raw land and planted it in raisins, peaches and figs. Since coming to this city he has been initiated into the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. Republican in politics, he is, however, not a partisan, and has not identified himself with political affairs.

WILLIAM R. McQUIDDY. As a practicing attorney of Hanford, Kings county, Mr. McQuiddy is intimately associated with the legal history of that section of California, where he has made his home for many years. Born in Coffee county, Tenn., April 8, 1849, he is a son of Major Thomas J. McQuiddy, a sketch of whose interesting pioneer life in California will be found on another page of this volume. When William R. McQuiddy was about one year old the family took up their abode in Missouri, but a few years later returned to Tennessee, this time making their home in Bedford county. It was in the common schools of Missouri and Tennessee that William R. received his initial training, and it was later his good fortune to supplement the knowledge there gained by attending Manchester College, in Manchester, Tenn. When about nineteen years old he began teaching school, following this congenial occupation for the ensuing five years, or until 1874, which year marks his arrival in California. Locating in the Mussel Slough district, Tulare county, now a part of Kings county, he continued teaching for a time, and was later similarly engaged in the neighboring county of Fresno and for three years was a member of the board of examiners of Tulare county.

In 1880 Mr. McQuiddy discontinued teaching and engaged in farming on one hundred and sixty acres of railroad land located seven miles northeast of Hanford. Not realizing his anticipations in this direction, however, he sold his farm three years later and moved to Hanford, which has since been his home. While prosecuting a fairly successful business in the line of fire and accident insurance Mr. McQuiddy began the study of law, and thus laid the foundation upon which his present substantial practice has been built. For two terms he served as justice of the peace and for two years as deputy sheriff, serving the best interests of his constituents while occupying these positions, at the same time keeping up his study of the law. His indefatigable efforts were rewarded in 1893 by his admission to the bar of Kings county, which has since been the field of his legal labors.

In 1872 Mr. McQuiddy was united in marriage with Miss Ida C. Putnam, and two years later the young people came to California. Mr. McQuiddy was one of the incorporators of the Settler's Ditch Company, which was organized to divert the water from Cross creek, and thus enrich the surrounding country, which was very dry and hence unprofitable from an agricultural standpoint. The death of Mr. McQuiddy's first wife occurred in 1874, and five years later, in the fall of 1879, he was united in marriage with Rebecca McMillan, a native of Louisiana, but who was reared in Tennessee, in the vicinity of Mr. McQuiddy's early home. Mr. and Mrs. McQuiddy have two children, Inez, a graduate of the state university at Berkeley, Cal., and Edna R., a graduate of the high school at Hanford.

In his political sympathies Mr. McQuiddy allies himself with the Prohibition party, steadfastly supporting its principles, and with his wife attends the Christian Science Church, of which they are both members. In May, 1903, Mr. McQuiddy was elected secretary of the Board of Trade of Hanford, and for the past twenty years, or ever since taking up his residence in Hanford, he has been secretary of the People's Ditch Company, one of the most important factors in the making of Kings county. In addition to the varied interests already mentioned Mr. McQuiddy owns interests in oil lands, in which venture he has been fairly successful.

SAMUEL L. HOGUE. During an early period in the settlement of America the Hogue family became identified with the history of Virginia. From that state the grandfather of Samuel L. Hogue migrated to Illinois and settled in Warren county, where he held the office of sheriff at the time that Stephen A. Douglas was circuit judge, and the two were warm friends. Thomas Gibson Hogue, who was born while the family lived in Virginia, spent his early manhood years in Illinois, but during the '60s came to California. For a time he engaged in mining and lumbering in Nevada county, and later was similarly engaged in Fresno county, where he died about 1893. During his active years he was a prominent local worker of the Republican party. His wife, who bore the maiden name of Mary Elizabeth Reed, was born in Kentucky and died in Illinois, leaving four children. Through her father, Richard Reed, a native of Massachusetts, she traced her lineage back to the Mayflower, while her mother was a member of the Merrifield family, of southern lineage.

In the family of four children, all still living, Samuel L. Hogue was the eldest. He was born near Monmouth, Ill., July 21, 1857, and in 1872 came to California to join his father. He was then fifteen years of age, alert and ambitious to make his own way in the world. For a time he assisted his father in lumbering and mining, but he made a specialty of shake-making and while working at Pine Ridge he established a record by splitting seven thousand shakes in ten hours. Meanwhile, however, he had not neglected educational matters. In 1877-78 he attended the San Jose Normal School, and later taught school in Fresno county for five years, the last term being principal of the Selma schools. As an instructor he was painstaking, accurate and energetic, skillful in the imparting of knowledge and a wise disciplinarian.

Ever since coming to Fresno county Mr. Hogue has been more or less interested in politics. Loyal to the Republican party at all times, he has been a leading local worker in its ranks. The first Republican ticket placed before the voters of Fresno county contained his name as candidate for county auditor, but in those days Republicans were largely in the minority and he suffered defeat. Later he was elected justice of the peace, serving four years in Selma and two years in Fresno. His next position was that of deputy county auditor under H. E. Barnum. It is worthy of note that he has served as a delegate to almost every county and state convention since he attained his majority, and has also been a leading member of the Republican state central committee, and identified with the executive committee of the State League of Republican clubs. For some years he acted as secretary of the Fresno Board of Education, in which capacity he proved a helpful factor in the promoting of the city schools. March 1, 1900, he was appointed and commissioned deputy collector of internal revenue, for which work he was qualified by his experience as a special deputy during the Spanish-American war. The counties included in his district are Tuolumne, Mariposa, Merced, Madera, Fresno, Tulare, Kings and Kern. His selection for this responsible position gave satisfaction to the people of Fresno, where he has a host of warm personal friends in both parties. A man of fine physique, he creates a favorable impression at first acquaintance, and this invariably deepens into esteem upon closer companionship. His methods in business and politics have ever been conscientious, upright and honorable, and his many quiet acts of kindness prove him to be the possessor of a generous heart.

In 1881 Mr. Hogue married Effie H. Brown, who was born in Yolo county, her father, J. W. Brown, having crossed the plains from Illinois, making the journey with a team of oxen and settling in Yolo county. In the family of Mr. Hogue there are two sons and two daughters, Lassen E.; James E.; Hazel and Lucile. Fraternally Mr. Hogue was made a Mason in Fresno Lodge No. 274, F. & A. M., of which he has been secretary. In addition he is connected with the Ancient Order of United Workmen, Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, and Independent Order of Foresters, having officiated as high vice-chief ranger of the latter organization.

HON. ELIAS JAMES EMMONS. One of the most erudite and painstaking exponents of legal science in Kern county is Hon. Elias James Emmons, state senator, and since January, 1893, the recipient of an extensive patronage in Bakersfield. Mr. Emmons was born in Greytown, Nicaragua, March 1, 1859, his father, William David Emmons, being at the time a prosperous merchant of that city. The elder Emmons was born and reared in Missouri, but eventually became the victim of a pioneering fever when the gold excitement in Nicaragua was at its height. He took a more practical view of the situation than did the miners, and established a general merchandise business, which in time more than verified his glowing predictions. As became a man well on the road to fortune, he established a home, marrying in the South American republic Elizabeth J. Miller, a native of the state of Texas. Two children came to gladden the home, Elias J. being the older. Henry William, the younger, is now engaged in the oil business in Bakersfield. The withdrawal of the Vanderbilt Transit Line from Nicaragua brought stagnation to business in that part of the country, and Mr. Emmons was face to face with financial ruin. With his wife and children he came to California in 1862, but this state, usually one of solace and rest for those whose health has been undermined, failed to perform its mission in his case, for he died soon after locating in Vacaville, Solano county, at the age of thirty-two years.

In 1864 the mother of Mr. Emmons married again and removed to Antioch, Contra Costa county, where the sons were educated in the grammar school, but were permitted no further educational advantages. Elias J. relieved his parents of the necessity of supporting him at an early age, accepting a position as clerk in a law office in San Francisco, where he gained his first insight into the intricacies of the science. His taste and inclination glided into this avenue of activity with perfect ease, and in 1882 he was admitted to practice at the bar of California. Locating at Chico, Butte county, he practiced with an increasing clientele until January, 1893, the date of his arrival in Bakersfield. For a time he had as partner F. M. Graham, later practicing alone, and in 1902 formed his present partnership with Rowen Irwin. Many of the most important cases in this and the adjoining counties have been tried by Mr. Emmons, who is a sagacious and practical lawyer, adhering always to the highest tenets of his profession, and winning patronage by the force of his character and the sincerity of his motives.

Since attaining his majority Mr. Emmons has taken a keen interest in Democratic politics, and in addition to minor offices was elected to the state assembly in 1897, and to the state senate in 1902. While living in Chico he was united in marriage with Margaret J. Wooden, a native of Vallejo, Cal., and the mother of two children, Elias Carroll and Edith June. In his rise to his present prominent position Mr. Emmons has evidenced those strong and forceful characteristics which are bound to win success over less industrious competitors.

EDWIN LUTHER MOOR. In tracing the causes which have led to the development and present prosperity of California, the student of history discovers that the citizenship of men from the states to the east has been a leading factor in the results now visible. Numbered among the business men of Merced who, by excellent business judgment and untiring energy, have contributed to the growth of the city and county, mention belongs to Mr. Moor, who came to the Pacific coast from Michigan. The family which he represents came originally from Scotland, but has been established in America since a very early period in the nation's history. His father, Stephen, a native of Steuben county, N. Y., followed farming there and in Michigan. The lady whom he married, Mary Ann Drake, was born on the Hudson river, at Newpaltz, Ulster county, N. Y., and died in Michigan. Through her father, Gilbert Drake, a farmer, she traced her lineage to an old colonial family allied to the noted English family of that name.

In a family of thirteen children, all of whom attained mature years, and seven are still living, Edwin Luther Moor was the youngest in order of birth and is the only one to settle in California. Three of his older brothers were soldiers in the Civil war, Eli, Robert and George, all of whom were members of Michigan companies, and George died during the period of his service. Near Tekonsha, Calhoun county, Mich., Edwin L. Moor was born April 2, 1857. As a boy he alternated attendance at school with work on the home farm. In addition to a common school education he had the advantage of a course of study in Albion College. When eighteen years of age he started out in the world for himself, his first employment being that of clerk, and later he became interested in a fruit and shipping business. When he came to Merced in 1891 he secured work by the day in the Merced Grange warehouse, where, through efficiency and energy, he won a recognized position and was made assistant book-keeper. At the expiration of two years he went to Athlone as manager of a warehouse owned by the company with which he had been connected in Merced, and there he remained for two years, later continuing for another year with the company and in addition buying grain on his own account.

On his return to Merced in 1896 Mr. Moor embarked in the grain business, which he has since conducted, buying through all parts of Merced, Stanislaus and Madera counties, and making shipments from his warehouse in this city. In addition he engages in an insurance and real estate business, with offices in the Pedreira building, where he negotiates sales of city property and farms, also secures loans of money in sums large or small, as desired; and in the insurance line represents the North American, German Alliance, Citizens of Missouri, Aetna and Northwestern National. Like all public-spirited citizens, he gives due attention to matters affecting the political and material welfare of the country. In political views he is a pronounced Democrat, in whose interests at one time he served on the county central committee. The work of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church receives his fostering aid, through his efficient service as a ruling elder and member of the board of deacons, and at one time he served as Sunday school superintendent. While living in Calhoun county, Mich., he married Miss Ellen L. Johnson, a native of New York state and a valuable assistant to him in home, church and society. Since coming to Merced he has allied himself with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and at one time officiated as noble grand of the lodge in this city. Other organizations with which he holds membership are the Woodmen of the World, Beavers, Ancient Order of United Workmen (in which he is past master workman), and Modern Woodmen of America (in which he has held important official positions). Pleasant and genial in disposition, upright in character and energetic in business affairs, he forms a distinct and valuable addition to the citizenship of Merced.

WALTER E. LILLEY, M. D. In the professional circles of Merced county, W. E. Lilley, M. D., occupies a position of importance and influence, being one of the most active and skillful physicians and surgeons of the city of Merced. Noted for his keen intellectual and mental attainments and for his professional knowledge and enterprise, he has met with satisfactory results in his practice of medicine and surgery, and since coming to the Pacific coast has gained an extensive patronage throughout this part of California. His office is on Main street, in the Barcroft building, where he also has a private sanitarium and an operating room. His office is fitted up with all the modern appliances and conveniences used by the profession, including an electric static machine and an X-ray machine. The doctor was born November 5, 1866, in Portland, Chautauqua county, N. Y., a son of Abner Lilley.

Abner Lilley was born at Sandy Creek, N. Y., but was bred and educated in Pennsylvania, and was there engaged in business as a lumber manufacturer and dealer during his earlier life. Subsequently removing to Portland, he purchased land and was employed in agricultural and horticultural pursuits until his death, in 1890, aged eighty-three years. He was twice married, by his first union having five children, of whom two sons served in the Civil war, and both were killed in battle, one being shot in the battle of Gettysburg. He married for his second wife, Olive Pratt, daughter of William Pratt, a Pennsylvania farmer. Six children were born of this union, namely: Abner, living in Erie county, Pa., a prosperous farmer; Henry, engaged in the fruit business in Westfield, N. Y.; W. E., the subject of this brief sketch; Morris and Charles, residents of Vermont; and Frederick. Frederick Lilley was graduated from the College of Physicians and Surgeons in Baltimore, Md., and subsequently engaged in the practice of his profession in Merced, Cal., where he died November 2, 1899, from blood poisoning contracted while performing an operation. At the time of his death he was serving as county coroner and public administrator.

Acquiring a practical education in the public schools, and being well trained in the various branches of agriculture by his father, W. E. Lilley remained at home until after attaining man's estate, following the independent occupation to which he was reared. In 1890 he visited California, making a short stay in San Diego. Returning east, he entered the Baltimore Medical College, from which he was graduated in 1894 with the degree of M. D. The following year he practiced medicine at Findley Lake, N. Y., and then located in Barnard, Windsor county, Vt., where he built up a large and successful practice, remaining there three and one-half years. Coming to California in December, 1899, Dr. Lilley continued his professional labors in Modesto for six months, and then opened his present office and sanitarium in Merced. A close student, ever ready to test the merits of new medical or surgical discoveries, inventions or appliances, he keeps abreast of the times in regard to his profession and is numbered among the foremost physicians and surgeons of Merced county, his patronage being extensive and lucrative.

In Chautauqua county, N. Y., Dr. Lilley married, at Mayville, Miss Mabel Crossgrove, a native of that city, and they have two children, namely: Harold and Ivan. The doctor is very prominent in medical organizations, belonging to the State and to the American Medical Associations; to the San Joaquin Valley Medical Society, of which he was formerly president; and to the Merced County Medical Society, of which he is secretary. In politics he is a staunch supporter of the principles of the Republican party. He is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and is a member and medical examiner of both the Woodmen of the World and the Modern Woodmen of America. In his religious views he is a Baptist.

WILLIAM OSBORNE MOORE. Not many years after the United States had achieved independence, Jesse Hopkins Moore, the son of a Revolutionary soldier, left his home in North Carolina and took up a tract of land in the newer country of Tennessee, where he followed the life of a planter and trader. The homestead that he built up became the nucleus of a village, which was named Mooresburg in his honor. Among his children was a son, James Madison Moore, who was born on the plantation at Mooresburg, Tenn., in 1810, and remained a lifelong resident of his native village, where he conducted a general store and superintended a plantation. The title of colonel, by which he was always known, came to him through official service in the Tennessee National Guard. His death occurred in Mooresburg in 1859 when he was forty-nine years of age. In his marriage to Mary T. Cobb he became connected with an old-established Virginian family, her grandfather having migrated from that state to Tennessee, where he founded Cobbsford on the Tennessee river; and in that vicinity her father, Jesse, a native of Tennessee, devoted his active years to the occupation of a planter. For more than twenty years Mrs. Moore survived her husband, her death occurring in Tennessee in 1881. In religious belief she was a faithful adherent of the Presbyterian Church. Her family comprised six sons and two daughters, namely: Hugh Alexander, a cattle-raiser in Texas; Jesse Hopkins, a farmer in Texas and at this writing a commissioner of his county; Carrie, Mrs. Williams, who continues to reside at Mooresburg; J. M., a cattleman, who died in New Mexico; J. P., residing at San Antonio, Tex.; Mrs. Margaret Taylor, who died at Persia, Hawkins county, Tenn.; William O., under sheriff of Merced county, Cal.; and Stephen A. D.

At the old homestead in Hawkins county, Tenn., William O. Moore was born August 29, 1858, and there he attended local schools and St. Clair College. In the spring of 1876 he went to Missouri, joining his brother, J. M., who was then engaged in the stock business in Cass county. After three years he went to Colorado at the time of the excitement caused by the discovery of gold mines at Leadville. For a time he prospected in the San Juan country, but later entered the employ of Meyer, Simmons & Co., railroad contractors, with whom he continued at intervals until 1881. His next location was in Utah, where he remained one winter, and then traveled through Idaho, Montana and the Northwest Territory. The year 1882 found him at Spokane, Wash., and in 1883 he arrived in Merced county, Cal., where he now makes his home. For eleven months he was employed in teaming for C. H. Huffman, and then became bookkeeper for Olcese & Garibaldi, with whom he continued for eleven years and eight months. After one year with R. Barcroft, January 5, 1903, he received the appointment of under sheriff to John S. Swan, since which time he has devoted his attention to the duties of the office, doing much to assist the sheriff in making this office one of the best conducted in the entire state. From 1890 to 1892 he served as city clerk of Merced. In 1898 he was chosen secretary of the Democratic county central committee, holding the position until 1900, since which time he has acted as chairman of the committee, a position of responsibility and one which he has filled in a manner satisfactory to the leaders of his party. In December, 1896, Governor Budd appointed him secretary and a director of the thirty-fifth district of the State Agricultural Association, to which office he was again appointed four years later under the administration of Governor Gage. Fraternally he is associated with the Knights of Pythias, Woodmen of the World and Modern Woodmen of America. Domestic ties, established at Merced in 1890, united him in marriage with Miss Theresa Branson, who was born in Mariposa county, her father, John Branson, a native of Tennessee, having crossed the plains to the Pacific coast in 1851 and for a time engaging in mining, but later turning his attention to agricultural work.

BREWSTER S. GURNEE. The Gurnee planing mill of Hanford, Kings county, takes first rank among the substantial enterprises of this thriving town, doing an annual business of $60,000 in the manufacture of windows, doors, moulding and bank fixtures of every description, and in connection conducts a barley mill, preparing the grain for the market by the roller process. Mr. Gurnee's identification with Hanford dates from December, 1891, coming to the west from New York City, where he had established himself in a well-paying manufacturing business. His present success, however, has not been gained without discouraging experiences. In addition to the mill which he established upon locating in Hanford he also owned a fruit farm, but during the panic of 1893-94 he lost both mill and farm. In 1899, on borrowed capital, he again became owner of the same mill and has since been managing it with profit. The Gurnee mill is one of the finest and best equipped plants in the lower end of the San Joaquin valley and the commodities manufactured have more than a local reputation, finding their way into all parts of the state.

Mr. Gurnee was born in Stony Point, Rockland county, N. Y., May 26, 1859, a son of Walter F. B. Gurnee and grandson of Mathew Gurnee, both of whom were natives of New York state, and could trace their ancestors to the Pilgrim Fathers who came to this country in the Mayflower. The former was a farmer and also engaged in the manufacture of brick. He served in the Civil war as a private for sixty days, when he was compelled to return home on account of sickness, and died when about fifty-five years of age. The mother of Mr. Gurnee, before her marriage Mary M. Smith, was also a native of New York state, and is now making her home in Rye, Westchester county, N. Y., at the age of seventy-two years.

Until about eighteen years old Mr. Gurnee remained at home with his parents, attending school and gaining a fair education as a start in life, and at that age went out into the business world. His first experience was in Washington, N. J., where, with the Beaty Organ Company, he began to learn the organ-maker's trade. After mastering the trade he went to New York City and found employment in a piano manufactory, but within two years he was obliged, on account of his wife's poor health, to relinquish the business and seek a climate less harsh than that of the east. Upon coming to the west he first located in Fresno, Cal., where after working in a planing mill for about a year he became foreman in the large planing mill of M. R. Madary, remaining in this capacity for about four years, when he purchased a half interest in the business. After two years of successful business life there he sold his interest, in December, 1891, and came to Hanford, with whose business and social life he has since been identified.

While still a resident of the east Mr. Gurnee was united in marriage with Eugenia A. Van-Valer, a native of Stony Point, N. Y., and they became the parents of five children, one of whom died in infancy. Those living are: Mary, Minnie, Candace and Adelia, all of whom are at home with their parents. The Republican party claims Mr. Gurnee as one of its staunch allies, although he has never been persuaded to hold public office. He takes a deep interest in fraternal affairs, belonging to Hanford Lodge No. 279, F. & A. M.; Hanford Chapter No. 74, R. A. M.; Knights of Pythias, and Woodmen of the World, all of Hanford, and to the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, of Fresno, Cal.

MRS. ANNA SILMAN. The influence wielded by Mrs. Silman, both as a teacher and in her present position as county superintendent of schools has been of the highest importance in the development of the schools of Merced county. Possessing the tact, broad knowledge and unerring sagacity of the true educator, in selecting her life occupation she followed the bent of her talents, and the high standing she has attained in the profession proves her exceptional fitness for the work of an instructor. During almost the entire time since she was four years of age she has been in the schoolroom, either as pupil or teacher, and in this period has become thoroughly conversant with the true spirit and aim of pedagogy.

Born in Platteville, Wis., Mrs. Silman is a daughter of Moses and Sarah Ann (Borah) Stewart, the former a native of county Down, Ireland, and the latter born near Bowling Green, Ky. Her father, Moses Stewart, came to America at an early age and settled in Wisconsin, where he engaged in general farming and stock-raising near Platteville, and served as a member of the county board of supervisors there. The maternal grandfather, Samuel Borah, was a member of an old Kentucky family and died in that state. After the death of Moses Stewart, which occurred near Platteville on his farm, his widow came to California and spent her last years in Merced county. Eleven children were born of their union, eight of whom attained mature years, and three reside in Stockton, viz.: J. A. and E. C., who are business men of that city, and Mrs. Gaines, a teacher. The eldest of the children now living is Mrs. Silman, who received her primary education in grammar schools and later had the advantage of study in the Platteville normal school. In order to defray the expenses of an education she began to teach in girlhood, using the money earned to promote her work of preparation for the teacher's profession. Where many thus situated would have been content with a common-school education, she was satisfied only with the most thorough education and aimed at the highest and best. With the advantage of a special course in the Oshkosh normal school, she entered upon the career of an educator.

At the time of coming to California in 1881 Miss Stewart was employed as principal of schools in a Wisconsin town and for a time after settling in the west she was engaged in teaching in the Union school at Lathrop. At Stockton, in 1883, she was married to L. H. Silman, a widower with one daughter, Fannie, and by their union a son, Stewart, was born. Mr. Silman was born in Illinois and accompanied his parents to California in boyhood. For a time he was employed in driving stages in the San Joaquin valley and mountains, his route being in Merced and Mariposa counties. For some years past he has been engaged in stock-raising on his farm ten miles south of Merced. In fraternal relations he is connected with the Masons, Knights of Pythias and Independent Order of Odd Fellows.

Since 1884 Mrs. Silman has made her home in Merced. For fourteen years she was connected with the grammar school of that city, first as vice-principal and later as principal. In 1902 she was nominated on the Democratic ticket for county superintendent of schools and was elected by a majority of three hundred and twenty, taking the oath of office in January, 1903, for a term of four years. Her entire attention is given to the oversight of the schools, each of which she visits at least once a year. In the county there are sixty school districts and two high schools, with eighty-five teachers engaged in educational work. It is the ambition of Mrs. Silman to promote the welfare of these schools and so systematize and grade their work that the pupils may make the most rapid yet thorough advancement possible. Realizing that by far the larger number of children receive no educational advantages except such as the common schools afford, it is her aim to make these so useful that boys or girls who have completed their studies will be prepared for such responsibilities as life may bring them. In religious faith she is connected with the First Presbyterian Church of Merced, and socially holds membership in the Order of the Eastern Star.

LEVI LUKENS GILL. The standing attained by L. L. Gill, one of Tulare county's prominent and successful stockmen, is the result of well-directed effort accompanied by ability and energy. He was born in Pickaway county, Ohio, June 23, 1837, the descendant of English ancestry. His great-grandfather came to the United States prior to the Revolutionary war, in which he participated, and afterward became a pioneer settler of Ohio, then the western border. His son, John, was born in that state December 9, 1806, and in manhood followed farming in that locality until his death. In his family was a son, Samuel, who was a native of Pickaway county, where he engaged in farming and stock-raising for many years. He finally immigrated to California, where his death occurred in 1887. His wife, formerly Elizabeth Lukens, was a native of Pennsylvania and the daughter of John Lukens, also of that state, who became a farmer in Ohio, where his death occurred. Of their three daughters and two sons Levi Lukens Gill, of this review, was the oldest.

In the common schools of Ohio L. L. Gill received his education, and after attaining years of maturity he engaged in the stock business in Ohio. For some years he bought and sold, traded and shipped, as well as raised cattle for the markets, and met with a success in his work. In 1864 he removed to Iowa and located in Ringgold county and continued the same occupation for nine years. He then came to California, and located in Tulare county on the Yokohl river, homesteading and pre-empting land, and also bought until he owned twelve hundred acres. He followed the raising of stock in that locality until 1883, when he bought twenty-four hundred acres for stock purposes in Frazier valley. Later he sold that property and in 1887 bought that where he now makes his home. His home ranch is also in Frazier valley, located six miles northeast of Portersville, and consists of four thousand acres all in one tract. This is justly classed among the fine grain and stock farms in Tulare county, and the success which Mr. Gill has achieved since locating here has given him a place among the representative citizens of the community.

In Pickaway county, Ohio, in 1858, Mr. Gill was united in marriage with Eliza A. Harriman, a native of that state. Her father, Aaron Harriman, a native of New Hampshire, went to Ohio at twenty years of age, and made that state his home until his death. His wife, formerly Harriett Mitten, a native of South Charleston, Ohio, also died in that state. He was a graduate of a medical college of Cincinnati and practiced his profession for many years. To Mr. and Mrs. Gill were born the following children: Charles Oscar, John Elsworth (deceased), William, Fred, Lewis, Julia, Proda, Frank, Levi, Mattie and Ora, all of whom reside in the vicinity of their childhood's home. In his political convictions Mr. Gill is a staunch Republican, and for many years has served as school director.

HIRAM J. WELLS. The rapid development and growth of Fresno county as a fruit-growing region has to a great extent enriched many men by the increase in value of their lands and productions. Prominent among the individuals who have been actively identified with this wonderful growth is Hiram J. Wells, a man of enthusiastic zeal and ambition, who has acquired valuable tracts of land in this section of the state, and is known as one of the most successful vineyardists of Fresno county. A son of Abram Wells, he was born October 26, 1866, in Illinois. His grandfather, James Wells, and his great-grandfather, Abram Wells, were both natives of New York. The latter, a farmer by occupation, served in the Revolutionary war, and afterward settled on a farm in Delaware county, N. Y., where he died at the age of fourscore years.

Born and brought up in Delaware county, N. Y., James Wells succeeded to the occupation in which he was reared, becoming a tiller of the soil. Removing to Berrien county, Mich., in 1841, he bought land, and there continued general farming until his death, in 1849. He married Abigail Stearns, who was born in Pennsylvania and died in Iowa, where she had removed a few years after the death of her husband. Of their family of ten children, four boys and six girls, Abram was the sixth child.

A native of New York, Abram Wells was born in Delaware county, February 2, 1835. Going with his parents to Michigan when a child, he received his elementary education in the common schools, and at the age of seventeen years entered the Kalamazoo Baptist College, which he attended three years, when he was forced to leave on account of ill-health. Going to Illinois in 1860, he bought land near Kirkwood, Warren county, where he resided eight years. Continuing his march westward, he settled in Osceola, Clarke county, Iowa, in 1868, and was employed in farming until 1873. Removing thence to Redcloud, Neb., he resided there until 1890, when, with the John Brown colony, for which he was traveling agent, he came to California for the purpose of establishing a settlement near Madera. Unsuccessful in the effort, Mr. Wells bought eighty acres of land lying two miles northeast of Selma, and has since resided on the place. Going in debt for the ranch when he bought it, he began raising fruit, vines and alfalfa, having ten acres of trees, ten acres of vines, and five of alfalfa, and has since paid off the debt of $8,000, and in 1901 erected his present attractive residence. He married Mary J. Wray, a native of Maryland, and they have seven children, namely: Alma Rosalia, wife of Frank Boran, of Kansas; Cassius M., of Nebraska; George E., of Selma; Hiram J., the special subject of this sketch; Frank E., of Selma; Charles, of Del Rey, and Warren, of Hanford, Cal. Mr. Wells' children are all married, and he has thirty-three grandchildren. He is a strong Prohibitionist, and is a member of the Christian Church.

Going with his parents to Nebraska in 1869, Hiram J. Wells received his rudimentary education in Webster and Adams counties, completing his studies at the college in Fairfield. Coming to California with the John Brown colony in 1891, he lived for ten months in what is now Madera county. Removing to Fresno county in 1892 he purchased forty acres of land lying two miles northeast of Selma, along the line of the Center-ville and Kingsburg ditch, and immediately embarked in fruit and vine growing, planting a vineyard of five acres and an orchard of fifteen acres, devoting the remainder of his ranch to alfalfa. In the care of his land, he met with signal success from the start, and has since become the owner of one hundred and forty acres of land here. Three miles south of Fowler, Fresno county, Mr. Wells owns another ranch of sixty acres, ten acres of which are planted to vines and fifty acres to fruit trees, an estate that he bought in 1902; he also owns an alfalfa ranch of forty acres, which he bought in 1902, located four miles northeast of Selma. He manages his land so as to produce the best-paying crops with the least outlay of money, and in addition to caring for his own ranches superintends the one hundred and sixty-acre ranch of J. M. Merrill, of San Francisco. As a vineyardist and fruit-grower he is skillful and successful, and has also had excellent success as an apiarist, at the present time having eighty stands of bees.

On January 20, 1891, in Hastings, Neb., the day previous to starting for California, Mr. Wells married Allie Milner, a native of Iowa, and they are the parents of three children namely: Earl, Freddie and Walker. Politically Mr. Wells is identified with the Republican party, sustaining its principles by voice and vote. Fraternally he belongs to Selma camp, W. of W. On the ranch two miles north of Selma, Mr. Wells erected a commodious residence in 1900, and there he and his wife delight to entertain their many friends and acquaintances.

ROBERT JINKENS COOPER. As an energetic, industrious and thorough-going business man, Robert Jinkens Cooper of Selma is intimately identified with the leading industries of Fresno county. He is a native-born son of California, and a worthy representative of the sturdy agriculturists who have so largely assisted in the material development of the state, and who are drawing from the soil the important elements of their present prosperity. A son of Robert Bruce Cooper, he was born March 8, 1858, in Calaveras county.

A native of Mississippi, Robert Bruce Cooper was born in January, 1822, living in that state until eighteen years old. Going thence to Texas, he was employed in agricultural pursuits in Harrison county for several seasons. Coming, via Mexico, to California in 1850, he worked in the mines for a few years, accumulating some money, which he invested in land near Milton, Calaveras county, where he improved a small ranch. In 1889 he came to Fresno county, making his home with his children until he moved to Santa Cruz. He married Alta Zara Lewis, who was born in Arkansas and died in Calaveras county, Cal., in 1871. Of their union five children were born, namely: Samuel B. of Fowler, Cal.; Joseph H. of Selma; Mary, wife of Frank Cleary, who is engaged in the oil business and resides in Santa Cruz; Robert J., the subject of this sketch; and Henry E., residing in Fresno county.

Brought up on a farm and educated in the common schools, Robert J. Cooper became a resident of Fresno county in 1875. Searching for a favorable location, he bought his present ranch of forty acres, situated about one mile northeast of Selma, and at once began its improvement. By persevering labor and wise management, he has met with most satisfactory results in farming, having now a good-yielding vineyard of eighteen acres and an excellent orchard of fourteen acres, while the remainder of his ranch is used in raising alfalfa. His land is fertile and productive, being well watered by the Centerville and Kingsburg ditch, which he assisted in building. In 1890 Mr. Cooper moved to a ranch ten miles west of Paso Robles, San Luis Obispo county, where he engaged in raising grain for a period of five years, after which he returned to Selma. He has other interests of financial value, being a stockholder in the two different oil companies operating in Coalinga, Cal.

On December 24, 1883, in Visalia, Cal., Mr. Cooper married Kate L. Mann, who was born February 19, 1864, in Contra Costa county, Cal. Her father, Elson Mann, was born in Indiana, and was one of the pioneers of California, coming across the plains from Missouri with the gold hunters of 1849. After mining for a few years, he settled in Hollister, San Benito county, and lived there until 1881, when he moved to Tulare county. Coming to Fresno county in 1896, Mr. Mann resided here until 1901, when he removed to his present home in Santa Rosa, Sonoma county. He is a veteran of the Mexican war, having enlisted in 1846, under Colonel Doniphan.

JOSEPH BARCROFT. Both through his intimate association with the Republican party in Madera county and through his efficient service in the office of justice of the peace, Mr. Barcroft has become well known to the people of this part of California. Few men of his party are better posted than he concerning its history, its principles and the platform upon which it stands, and he is therefore qualified to take a leading position in matters relative to its local organization and management. In 1900 he was chosen secretary of the Republican county central committee and continued to hold that responsible position until 1902, meanwhile accomplishing much in the interests of the party.

The genealogy of the Barcroft family appears elsewhere in this volume, in the sketch of Fred Barcroft, a brother of the subject of this article. Their parents, R. W. and Rafila (Orosco) Barcroft, were natives respectively of Cadiz, Ohio, and southern Arizona, the latter being of Spanish family. The homestead was at Hornitos, Mariposa county, Cal., and there Joseph Barcroft was born June 27, 1870. The days of his boyhood and youth were quietly and uneventfully passed in attendance upon local schools.

When he came to Madera, in August of 1887, he entered his brother's store and there acquired a practical knowledge of the hardware business. Feeling, however, that his education was incomplete, he resigned his position and entered Chestnutwood Business College at Santa Cruz, where he took the regular course of study. On leaving college he again took up work in his brother's store and continued in the same position (with the exception of two years in the mines of Mariposa county) until he was elected justice of the peace. His election to this office occurred in November, 1902, when he was chosen to serve for the third township of Madera county, and received a majority of eighty-one. January 5, 1903, he took the oath of office for a term of four years. Four-fifths of all the cases in the county come before him and his court, which occupies a room in the county court-house, is in session all of the time. As a justice he is strictly impartial, efficient and painstaking, and his service has been eminently satisfactory to all concerned.

The marriage of Mr. Barcroft was solemnized in his native town of Hornitos and united him with Harriet Collins, who was born and reared in that city, being the daughter of English parents who came to California in an early day and bore a part in the pioneer development of the state. Justice Barcroft, with his wife and their two children, David and Isabella, occupy a comfortable home in Madera and are respected throughout the entire circle of their acquaintances.

WILLIAM S. FOWLER, M. D. Conspicuous among the active and able physicians and surgeons of Bakersfield is William S. Fowler, M. D., who has had a wide and most successful professional experience. Although now engaged in the general practice of medicine, he has made a special study of diseases of the eye, ear, nose and throat, and is considered an authority on all questions connected with the treatment of these delicate organs. A native of Connecticut, which was also the birthplace of his father, Edwin Fowler, he was born April 28, 1857, in Guilford, New Haven county, coming from substantial New England ancestry.

Having acquired his elementary education in the district schools of his native town, William S. Fowler subsequently attended the grammar and high schools of New Haven. He afterward learned the machinist's trade in that city, and for a short time thereafter worked as a journeyman. On attaining his majority, he went to New York City, where he entered the store of a manufacturing jeweler, hoping to learn the business. Beginning in the very lowest position, he served first as janitor and clerk, gradually working himself upward, and at the end of two years was put on the road as commercial salesman, and in the nine years that followed he traveled extensively throughout the Union. During this time he stored his mind with a useful fund of knowledge by reading and observation. Subsequently locating in Chicago, Ill., Mr. Fowler began the manufacture of spectacles on a large scale, borrowing $20,000 to start with. Three years later, when owing to business depression his debtors were unable to pay their bills, he was forced to fail, his liabilities amounting to $360,000. Turning the business over to his brother, he continued with him as a clerk, and at the same time read medicine, making a special study of ophthalmology that he might treat diseases of the eye, and fit spectacles to their patrons, he and his brother being the first to make compound lenses in the west. Entering then the College of Physicians and Surgeons, he was graduated in 1885, standing fifth in a class numbering eighty-five students. Subsequently Dr. Fowler was a special teacher of ophthalmology in two watch factory schools, and an assistant teacher in the post-graduate class of the medical college for two years. The following two years he spent in traveling with his wife, who was an invalid. Finally locating in Wheeling, W. Va., he remained there as a physician for a few months, continuing in practice until the death of his wife. Returning to Chicago the year of the Columbian Exposition, Dr. Fowler practiced there as an eye specialist for four years.

Coming to California in 1897, Dr. Fowler bought a citrus fruit ranch of seventy-six acres near Ventura, and began the cultivation of lemons and oranges. The water supply giving out at the end of six months, he resumed the practice of his profession, opening an office in Ventura, where his friend, Dr. Cephas L. Bard, was located, and devoted his entire attention to diseases of the eye, ear, nose and throat. Removing to Bakersfield in 1901, the doctor continued his special work until May, 1903, when he purchased the good-will and practice of Dr. T. E. Taggart, and has since devoted his attention to the treatment of diseases of all kinds.

Dr. Fowler married May Bogardus, who died in West Virginia. His second wife was Laura Nye, a native of Ohio. Politically the doctor is a staunch advocate of the principles promulgated by the Democratic party, and though not an aspirant for public honors is now serving as health officer for Kern county. He is an active member of various medical associations, including the San Joaquin and the Kern County, of which he is also secretary, and the American, the State, and the Southern California societies. Fraternally he is a member of Bakersfield Lodge No. 266, B. P. O. E.

CICERO M. BATES

DR. CICERO McLEAN BATES. The death of Dr. Cicero McLean Bates, November 18, 1898, at his beautiful country seat near Fresno, terminated a career of exceptional usefulness, and one in which heart, brain and keen understanding were unfalteringly utilized in an effort to establish the highest possible professional and sanitary standards in the state of California. While his presence in the mining camps was a boon for the motley crowds assembled to wrest wealth from the earth, his name will be more emphatically associated with the early professional history of San Francisco, where his record, from the standpoint of actual good accomplished and zeal in the prosecution of many salient reforms, had no equal at the time and place.

A son of Ezekiel Bates, he was born in Cleveland, Tenn., August 15, 1831, and was educated in the public schools, at O'Clare Academy and Hiawassa College, his professional training being received at Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia, from which he was graduated in the class of 1850. Returning to Tennessee, he engaged in practice for a number of years, in the meantime chafing in an atmosphere stagnant to one of his force and determination. Disposing of his interests in Tennessee, he arrived in San Francisco November 14, 1860, at once going to Nevada City, then the most active center of mining in the state. Success came to him from the start, and in an atmosphere foreign to his culture and refinement he accumulated wealth, and was glad of the ambition which had led him to the Pacific coast. The fire of 1865, which practically laid Nevada City in ashes, devoured about all that he had in the world, and in 1868 he returned to San Francisco, where, with characteristic forgetfulness of past trouble, he threw himself into the vortex of its crude and varied activity. His mind was too practical and far-reaching to content itself with a practice which astonished even himself with its rapid growth, and he began to look around to better the condition of those who were too intent upon money-getting to have any thought for sanitation or laws of health. He took upon himself the task of drawing up a bill providing for extensive sanitary improvements, and through his vigorous determination secured its passage in the legislature of 1870. Upon the organization of the state board of health, he was elected the first health officer, holding the position four years, and during that time working wonders in his department. In the face of all manner of opposition, and even after personal threats had been directed against him, he unfalteringly strode to his goal, enforcing all of the ordinances, and maintaining the most rigorous oversight of sewerage and general health conditions. His sense of justice was aroused from the fact that many charlatans made the town a Mecca, and he accordingly presented a resolution to the San Francisco Medical Society, petitioning it to appoint a committee to draft a bill for the legislature, regulating the practice of medicine in the state of California. The bill met with the approval of the society, and Dr. Bates was made chairman of the committee, and, with the late Dr. Henry Gibbons, drafted the bill which became a law April 3, 1876. He was a member of the state board of health for six years, and for two years was its chairman. Subsequently he was elected to the chair of clinical practice in the Toland Medical Institute, was appointed visiting physician to the City and County and St. Luke's hospitals. He also was commissioner of the insane for several years, and for a long period served as visiting physician to the Hebrew Orphan Asylum of San Francisco.

In 1882 Dr. Bates' health began to fail, so earnestly and self-sacrificingly had he striven to better the conditions of those around him. Compelled to give up practice, he visited many resorts in search of the boon of health, and finally found, at Highland Springs, Lake county, Cal., that which he desired. Recovering, he purchased the place and installed himself as manager, and under his wise rule it became one of the foremost health resorts in the state. In 1888 he sold the property and purchased the place now occupied by his wife, four and a half miles southeast of Fresno, on North avenue. From time to time he invested in city property, but disposed of the same as the market seemed to warrant. His home place of eighty-six acres supplied the work and interest which his enthusiastic nature craved, and he made of it as nearly an ideal country home as exists in Fresno county. About sixty acres were set out in raisin grapes, twenty in Zinfandel grapes and he had two hundred and fifty orange trees.

Dr. Bates was united in marriage in Tennessee with Virginia Ernest, and of this union there are two surviving children: Fred L. Bates, now in the Klondike, and Dr. Walter E. Bates, a practicing physician and surgeon of Woodland, Cal. Two children are deceased: Kittie, a graduate of Mills College, who died at the age of eighteen, and Cicero, who died when four years old. For his second wife Dr. Bates married Mrs. Eusebia (Reynolds) Worth, widow of William E. Worth, a native of Albany, N. Y., and the founder of the Fulton Iron Works of San Francisco. When his health began to fail his wife established, on Rincon Hill, San Francisco, the Worth house, the first select family hotel to be opened in San Francisco, and received the patronage of the leading people of the Pacific Slope. Mrs. Bates was born in Binghamton, N. Y., and is a woman of keen intelligence. She finds her greatest pleasure in keeping in good order the delightful home which speaks so eloquently of her gifted husband. So extensive are her holdings, now including one hundred and ninety acres, that she employs a foreman and from five to ten men the year round.

Too much cannot be said of the high moral character of Dr. Bates, nor of his prominence among the mental giants who helped to establish law and order on the western slope. In keeping with his brain and heart, his physique was large and commanding, and his manner dignified and reassuring. He was too generous and disinterested to accumulate a large fortune, for he found it impossible to turn a deaf ear to an appeal which seemed to him just and worthy of his help. One of his finest traits was his loyalty to friends, and it is recalled that he once said: "I would scale a burning mountain barefoot to serve a friend." He was a Mason and Knight Templar, and a man of pronounced social tendencies, being a good story teller and a wonderful inspiration in a sick room. His knowledge of medical and surgical science was exhaustive and clear, and he invariably maintained the best tenets of his absorbing and ever-widening profession.

ABNER BUEL CROWELL. Persistent application of intelligent methods of energy and resource are requisites indispensable to the man who would become, and remain, a success. This truth has been illustrated in the career of Abner B. Crowell, who carried to a financial triumph an enterprise, and which awaited but the touch of his well directed energy to make of it a substantial factor in the community. Reference is made to the Hanford cheese factory, which represents ten years of Mr. Crowell's life work, and which, during its time of greatest prosperity, did more to advertise Hanford and vicinity than any other enterprise. When Mr. Crowell first took charge of the factory he found failure written on its books and little promise of its betterment in the future. From the start it flourished under his management, and the Hanford Cheese Manufacturing Company, with himself as manager, was conducted under the most auspicious circumstances. The new management ascertained and profited by the pitfalls of its predecessors, added new machinery, depended upon the best possible materials for manufacturing, and soon established a reputation for its products second to none in the state. Later he acquired a controlling interest in the concern and he continued his policy of improvement, opening every avenue for the making and distribution of a thoroughly high-class article. While factories in Kings and adjoining counties were losing prestige because of want of patronage, the Hanford factory was turning out from two hundred to four hundred pounds of cheese a day, and shipping it not only to cities throughout the state, but as far east as Chicago. Mr. Crowell made cheese-making his constant study, and exerted every nerve to build his business up to the highest possible standard. It was while his expectations were being realized in a most gratifying manner that the factory burned to the ground August 6, 1903, and the labor of years was brought to an abrupt termination. Nevertheless his effort stands forth as one of success and importance, and its influence upon the growing fortunes of the community cannot be overestimated. It represents the greatest ambition in the life of a good and capable man, and that he succeeded in its fulfillment gives evidence of the possession of those traits most needed and appreciated in the business world.

In reviewing the earlier life of Mr. Crowell it is found that he is of English extraction and a member of an early Massachusetts family, in which state his paternal grandfather, Samuel Crowell, was born. This sire served with credit in the war of 1812, and in time moved to Virginia, where he owned and operated a farm. After settling in Sandusky county, Ohio, he led a typical pioneer existence for many years, finding upon his arrival Indian trails instead of roads, and wigwags instead of the huts of the settlers. His own was one of the first houses in the county, and he was obliged to hew down timber in order to erect it. His public spirit led him to work for the Whig cause in his adopted state, and he served the county as sheriff for two terms. His son, John M., the father of Abner, was born in Virginia, and was a boy of tender years when the family emigration to Ohio took place. His education was acquired in the public schools and at an academy which numbered among its students ex-President Rutherford B. Hayes. His marriage in Sandusky county with Ann Thraves gave him an added incentive to make a success of his life, and he continued his farming operations with the assistance of a practical wife. The oldest child in his family, Abner B., was born March 9, 1849, and in 1851 John M. Crowell came to California to investigate the prospects, and for a time combined mining and merchandising in Yuba and Eldorado counties. So well was he pleased with the climate and opportunities of the west that he returned east for his family in 1855, and thereafter continued his former occupations in Yuba county until 1865. He then went to the Hawaiian Islands and engaged in the sugar industry until shortly before his death in 1881, at the age of fifty-five years. His was a strong and forceful character and left the impress of his individuality in the community where he resided. He had gained courage and fearlessness during service in the Mexican war, in which he gained the rank of corporal, and he was always outspoken in his opinions upon general subjects of the day. He represented Yuba county in the state legislature for one term, and served as associate judge for several years. Fraternally he was connected with the Masons. He had one son and two daughters, the youngest daughter, Lizzie, being the widow of Eugene Covey of San Francisco; and Mary is the wife of John R. Kennedy of Camptonville, Cal.

Abner B. Crowell was six years old when he came to California, and nineteen when he returned to Fremont, Ohio, to attend school, his fellow students including the sons of ex-President Hayes. After completing his education he spent a winter in Indiana and one in Ohio, and after returning to California taught school in Yuba, and the adjoining counties, being one of the pioneer educators of this part of the state. When he arrived in Grangeville, now in Kings county, but then in Tulare county there was as yet no sign of Hanford, or of a railroad, or other signs of human activity not purely pastoral. For a term and a half he taught school in Grangeville, and in 1873 took up his present farm of one hundred and sixty acres, which, at that time, was a dreary and unpromising property. There were scarcely any settlers for miles around, and only two within sight of his farm, and a deal of work was required to render it homelike, pleasant or profitable. In this he was ably assisted by the wife whom he married May 3, 1874, and who was formerly Mary Kanawyer, a native of Iowa, and a daughter of Peter Kanawyer, who was born in Indiana. The Kanawyer family came to California in 1869, settling near Grangeville, where Mr. Kanawyer bought railroad land, and became a prominent rancher of the district. He was one of the supporters and originators of the People's Ditch, and assisted in the building of this important waterway. Mr. Crowell also became interested in the great ditch, contributing his share of money and personal effort toward its building. In time he bought the cheese factory previously mentioned, managing and controlling it in connection with the cultivation of his home property. At the same time he has been prominent in politics, and especially forward in educational matters, serving as a director of the Hanford Union High School since its organization, and as president of the board four years. He was also trustee of the school district one term. He is fraternally connected with the Masons. Nine children have been born into the Crowell household, of whom Letus N., an attorney in Hanford, and Alvin, who died at the age of twenty-two years in 1900, were both graduates of the law department of the University of California. Charles C. is a farmer near Turlock, Cal.; Leo C. is a cheese-maker by trade, in the employ of the San Joaquin Ice Company; Arthur G. is a farmer near Turlock, Cal.; Mary is a student at the State University of California; and Lizzie, Clarence V. and Beulah are living at home. Mr. Crowell is engaged in general farming, dairying and stock-raising, and has about one hundred and twenty acres under alfalfa. He prefers Holstein cows, and his dairy contains about fifty of this reliable breed. He is one of the most highly honored of the early settlers of Kings county, and has been one of its most interested and helpful upbuilders. His faith in its future was but recently indicated anew by his purchase of another farm of three hundred and fifty acres in Stanislaus county, which is worth about $60 an acre. Thus has he traveled the weary way of the pioneer, and the prosperous way of the successful business man of to-day, turning his opportunities to good account, and impressing his worth upon a community educated partially through his efforts to a high standard of moral and financial well being.

ANDREW J. WELLS. Although a resident of California for almost a quarter of a century, A. J. Wells is united by close ties to West Virginia, for it was in that state that he was born August 3, 1851. His father, the late Benjamin Wells, whose recent death in 1902 deprived California of one of her most successful agriculturists and esteemed citizens, was born seventy-five miles from the city of Wheeling, W. Va. A son of John Dusty Wells, of Virginia, he wedded Miss Teresa Conaway, a native of the same state. By occupation a millwright and an expert in his line, Mr. Wells ran a mill in the east until 1880 and then came to the Pacific coast country.

The first year of his residence in California was spent in Solano county, and the following year he took up his residence in Fresno county, purchasing at that time (1881) one hundred and sixty acres of land near Del Rey, and here it was that he spent the remainder of his life busily engaged in the cultivation of his land. At the time of his demise he had attained the advanced age of seventy-nine years, and of his children three are still living, namely, Andrew J.; Alfred; and Emma, the latter two residents of Virginia.

Reared and educated in his native state, Andrew J. Wells accompanied his father to California and spent a couple of years in ranching in Tulare county, prior to settling permanently upon the place he now occupies in Fresno county. Purchasing eighty acres, six miles to the southeast of Sanger, he planted extensive orchards and vineyards. He has thirty-five acres in vines and twelve acres are devoted to other fruits, the balance of his farm being used in producing alfalfa and cereals. The marriage of Mr. Wells took place in West Virginia in 1880, and united him with Miss Elizabeth Underwood, of West Virginia. Four children blessed their union, Florence E., Emery A., Bessie R. and Frank R. Mr. Wells is an intelligent and public-spirited citizen and is highly respected in his community. Like his father in politics, he is a firm supporter of the Republican party.

JOHN Q. DRUMMOND. Distinguished alike as an early pioneer of California, and as one who has been actively and prominently associated with the wonderful growth and development of this grand commonwealth, John Q. Drummond, of Ingomar, holds an honored position among the esteemed and valued residents of Merced county. A man of sterling character and worth, he has won well-deserved success in his active career through his own ability, wise management and honest dealings, and the respect in which he is held by all gives evidence of his upright and manly life. A son of Andrew Drummond, he was born June 20, 1827, in Licking county, Ohio, of substantial ancestry.

Born and reared in Pennsylvania, Andrew Drummond became an early settler of Ohio, and for a number of years was engaged in farming in Licking county. Removing to Illinois in 1838, he took up land in Ogle county, and there pursued his chosen vocation until his death. He married Elizabeth Lutzenhizer, who was born in Pennsylvania, and died, at the age of sixty years, in Illinois. She bore him eleven children, five of them being boys, and of these John Q. was the sixth child in order of birth.

John Q. Drummond acquired a practical education in his native district, attending school in the little log cabin, with its customary puncheon floor, shake-covered roof, and slab benches. Settling in Ashton, Lee county, Ill., when a young man, he was there successfully employed for a time as a merchant and grain dealer. In 1850 he came to California with the gold seekers, crossing the plains with ox-teams, and being six months en route. Locating in Eldorado county, he worked in the Georgetown mines for nine years, meeting with average success. Then, after making a visit in Illinois, he located in Sacramento, and for three years was engaged in freighting to the Washoe mines, in Nevada, and while thus employed hauled the first battery for crushing ore used in Virginia City, an undertaking that took him six months, being snowed in on the way. Losing his horses by drowning in 1862, Mr. Drummond entered the employ of the Central Pacific Railroad Company, and assisted in grading the bed from San Jose to Gilroy, from San Quentin Point to San Rafael, and other parts of the road, and also helped in the building of the road through the Livermore mountains. Coming to the San Joaquin valley in 1871, Mr. Drummond took a prominent part in the construction of the Kings River canal, beginning work as foreman of a gang of men, becoming superintendent of construction, and later was general manager of the work, his services in all covering a period of eighteen years. Turning his attention then to agricultural pursuits, Mr. Drummond bought three-fourths of a section of land near Ingomar, and has since purchased additional land, having now six hundred acres irrigated by water from the ditch, one hundred and sixty acres in the mountains, and three hundred and twenty acres in the Panoche district. As a stock-raiser and dairyman he is carrying on a large and lucrative business, and is also financially interested in the Ingomar warehouse.

In 1852 Mr. Drummond married, in Illinois, Eliza Jane Rosecrans, a native of Ohio and cousin of Gen. William S. Rosecrans, who acquired fame in the Civil war. She died, in Sacramento, Cal., in 1866. Of the four children born of their union, two are living, namely: Lucy, wife of J. E. Hollingsworth, of Ingomar; and Arthur W., a well-known farmer of Ingomar. Politically Mr. Drummond uniformly cast his vote with the Republican party, and for one term served as county supervisor. Fraternally he is a member of Los Banos Lodge, F. & A. M.

ROBERT L. STOCKTON. The superintendent of schools of Kern county needs no introduction to the people among whom he has been known as an efficient educator since 1881. His present position is perhaps the truest test of both his ability and popularity, for, not being a politician in any sense of the word, he was elected in November, 1902, by a majority of over one thousand votes. Several years of service on the board of education had given convincing proof of Mr. Stockton's practical theories of education, and the many students now occupying positions of trust and responsibility throughout the state, who owe their educational privileges to his guidance, as well as the many warm friends drawn to him by the force of his genial and helpful personality are factors which have brought him within range of the appreciation of his ability.

Josie M. Ritchie.

J. M. Ritchie

Mr. Stockton is a comparatively young man to stand so high in his responsible calling. He was born in Santa Rosa, Sonoma county, October 25, 1863, and is one in a family of nineteen children, fourteen of whom are still living. His parents were Dr. Isaac and Louise (Spiller) Stockton, natives of Illinois and Tennessee respectively, and his paternal grandparents were Robert and Phoebe (Whiteside) Stockton, natives of Kentucky, and the latter a cousin of General Whiteside, of historic fame. The paternal great-grandfather, a pioneer of Kentucky, located in and improved a part of the fertile valley which still bears his name. At the age of sixteen Dr. Stockton enlisted for service in the Black Hawk war, serving in a home regiment. From the public schools he went to Shurtleff College, near Alton, Ill., and his medical education was acquired at the Physio-Medical Sanitarium College at Cincinnati, Ohio, from which he was graduated in 1838. He practiced medicine in Illinois for eight years, married there, and afterward lived in both Kansas and Texas. In the latter state he was waylaid by robbers and shot seven times, but owing to a sound constitution and plenty of grit he recovered and continued his practice until coming to California in 1856. Dr. Stockton selected Sonoma county as his future field of endeavor, and developed the well-known Stockton orchard, since associated with his name. In 1872 he removed to Kern county and improved the Stockton ranch in the southern part of the county, afterward making his home in Los Angeles, where he practiced medicine, and whence he returned to the ranch where his death occurred at the age of eighty-three. He was one of the honored and resourceful pioneers of Kern county, and his whole life bears tribute to the worth of high ideals, whether applied to civil, professional or private life. His wife lived to be fifty-seven years old.

Robert L. Stockton was nine years old when he came to Kern county, and he was educated in its public schools, and in the Los Angeles Business College. An apt pupil and studious, he received a teacher's certificate in 1881, when eighteen years old, and has ever since been identified with the schools in different parts of Kern county. At the same time he has been interested in stock-raising, owning, with his brother, three thousand acres of hill land, upon which he lived until the nature of his duties as county superintendent of schools necessitated his removal to Bakersfield in 1903. Upon his assumption of the office of superintendent of schools, the city of Bakersfield and the rest of the county had different courses of instruction. This was found to work a hardship upon the people residing in the county, but the courses have since been harmonized, and are now uniform throughout the county.

December 27, 1885, Mr. Stockton married Frances Engle, who was born in Kern county December 24, 1866, a daughter of the late David Engle, one of the pioneer stockmen of Kern county. The eight children born to Mr. and Mrs. Stockton are: Ralph T., David Denton, Francis Warren, Marion Jewett, Irving, Jesse DeWitt, Clara Roberta and Frank. Mr. Stockton is a staunch Democrat, and is connected fraternally with the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks and the Native Sons of the Golden West.

JAMES M. RITCHIE. The importance of its bearing on the industries of the world, and the necessity of individual effort in maintaining a standard of agricultural excellence, is thoroughly understood by James M. Ritchie, one of the foremost promoters of grain production in Stanislaus county. His association with this section began in 1868, when he supplemented an extended wholesale grocery business in both Scotland and America by identification with ranching interests in San Joaquin county, engaging as foreman on a ranch near Stockton for many years. In the meantime he had become impressed with the many advantages of climate and soil around him, and in the western part of Stanislaus county purchased fourteen hundred acres in the foothills, operating the same as a sheep ranch for three years. The next nine years were spent on his wife's ranch near Stockton. His present ranch of sixteen hundred and forty acres came into his possession in 1883, and this has been his home since New Year's day of 1884. As a grower and shipper of grain and barley he has been successful beyond his expectations. Mrs. Ritchie's ranch consists of three hundred and twenty acres, where general farming is conducted under the direction of Mr. Ritchie. Improvements of a labor-saving and modern nature have succeeded each other since Mr. Ritchie became a land owner, and that he has taken advantage of all that appealed to his ideas of practicability and utility, is the best evidence of his progressiveness and success. Notwithstanding his extreme industry and business shrewdness in making every part of his property count for its full value, he is one of the most enthusiastic advocates of the latter-day comfortable and pleasant country life, surrounding himself and family with those aids which modern ingenuity has devised for bringing to the fields the advantages of the city resident. His fine home, erected in 1900, carries out the plan of a refined and progressive mind, externally and internally, leaving little to be desired by its rural occupants. The house is two stories in height, and presents a cheery picture of convenience and quiet elegance. Mrs. Ritchie was formerly Mrs. Josie M. Merwin, of Stockton, and a native of Peoria, Ill., where she resided until coming to California in 1870. Of her first marriage she has one son, Milton D. Merwin, who resides at home. Two children have come to brighten the Ritchie home, David M. and Josie Belle, the latter of whom is the wife of E. M. Lightner, an oil merchant of Fresno county. David M. Ritchie married Florence Finney, of Oakland. He is engaged in speculating in the gold mines of Goldfield, Nev.

The first recollections of Mr. Ritchie are centered in the mountainous and picturesque midland county of Perth, Scotland, where he was born May 18, 1844. While his ancestry was associated with the tilling of the soil and the herding of flocks, his father departed from the family tradition sufficiently to master the science of civil engineering, in which capacity he was employed by his government for many years. His mother, May (McDonald) Ritchie, was also a native of Perthshire, her family being one of those long established in the midlands. There were three sons and four daughters to share the resources of the father, and each received the practical common-school education compulsory in the land of simple living and vigorous constitutions. James M. began at the bottom rung of the ladder in a retail grocery business in Glasgow, Scotland, and after three years of increasingly responsible experience, immigrated to the United States in 1866, locating at Keokuk, Iowa, where he engaged in the grocery business for about three years. His removal to California in the fall of 1868 was the realization of a long-thought-out plan, the wisdom and satisfaction of which he has never had cause to question. His entrance into the opulence of the west through the portals of agriculture has proved his financial upbuilding, and his association with the political and general undertakings of his county has demonstrated the possession of altogether genial and influential traits of character. Mr. Ritchie is a Republican, but the uncertainties of office-holding have never held any charm for him. He is a thorough-going, practical landsman, and though conservative, as are the majority of his countrymen, is graciously adaptive to the customs and people among whom his later life is being passed.

JUDGE DAVID S. COVERDALE. Few more consistent, practical, or well balanced careers have contributed to the pioneer and later development of Delano than that of Judge David S. Coverdale, veteran of the Civil war, and well known as a justice of the peace, notary, health officer, president of the board of trade, promoter of waterways, and extensive real estate operator. From a long line of English ancestors Judge Coverdale inherits those substantial and conservative traits which have been of inestimable value in his work in a growing community. His father, Jonathan Coverdale, spent the first fifteen years of his life in England, and then came with his parents to Lower Canada, where he lived until attaining his majority. In Canada he married Sallie Brisbon, a native of Lower Canada, and of Irish-German descent, with whom he removed to a farm in Lapeer county, Mich. He found the country a stranger to the improvements of man, and set about with characteristic energy to clear his land, and establish a general farming and stock-raising enterprise. Six children were born into his family, of whom David S. was the eldest. He was born March 16, 1835, in Detroit, Mich., his mother being there temporarily. In 1850 Jonathan Coverdale crossed the plains in an ox-train for California, by way of Council Bluffs, Salt Lake City and the Platte river, and in Sacramento, Cal., engaged in teaming and the building of levees. His dream of western success was not destined for fulfillment, for a year after arriving on the coast he was taken ill and died, at the age of about forty-five years. Subsequently his wife married again, and died in Michigan at the age of fifty-five.

After his mother's second marriage David S. Coverdale started out on his own responsibility, armed with a common school education, and with a determination which is bound to win results. Settling in Goodhue county, Minn., then a territory, he worked on a farm by the month for his uncle, and while thus employed won the confidence of his relative to such an extent that he subsequently made him manager of his ranch, located near Red Wing, Minn. Having friends in the railroad business, he secured the position as station agent of the Northwestern Stage Company for a couple of years, and then engaged in an agricultural implement business at Winona, Minn., for several years. While in this town the Civil war broke out, and he enlisted as a private in Company K, Second Minnesota Volunteer Infantry, and because of meritorious service was soon promoted from private, becoming in consecutive order corporal, sergeant, second lieutenant, first lieutenant and captain in the same company and regiment. During the war he participated in the following engagements: Mill Springs, Fort Donelson, Pittsburg Landing, Iuka, the campaign under Buell, Stone River, Crab Orchard, Chickamauga, Missionary Ridge and Lookout Mountain. At the battle of Chickamauga he was wounded in the right thigh, and left on the field without anything to eat for three days, and after being taken prisoner made his escape at night by crawling on his hands and one knee. At Missionary Ridge and Lookout Mountain he commanded his company, although he was obliged to walk with a cane. The regiment veteranized for the balance of the war, taking part in the battles of Tunnel Hill, Mill Creek, Dug Gap, Resaca, Adairsville, New Hope Church, Kenesaw Mountain, Marietta, Smyrna, Peachtree Creek, Atlanta, Altoona Mountain, Peavine Creek, Ringgold, first and second Tunnel Hill, first and second Rocky Face, Dalton first and second, second battle of Resaca, Snake Creek Gap, New Hope Church, Big Shanty, Pine Ridge, Kenesaw Mountain, six days' siege; Kalbs Mountain, Kenesaw Mountain, second battle, two days' siege; Marietta, Chattahoochee, Altoona Mountain, second battle, and Ezra Church. Also the company was with Sherman in his march to the sea, at the taking of Savannah, the campaign in North and South Carolina, the capture of Goldsburg and Raleigh, and the final surrender of the Confederate army. To Richmond, Washington and Fort Snelling, where he was discharged as captain of Company K, Second Minnesota Volunteer Infantry.

In 1866, September 12, Judge Coverdale married Nellie Gould, a native of New Jersey, whose parents settled in Minnesota at Winona at an early day. One daughter, Florence, was born to Judge and Mrs. Coverdale. From Winona, Minn., Judge Coverdale went to Eau Claire, Wis., where he owned and operated a hotel for two or three years, removing from thence to Willmar, Minn., where he again ran a hotel for three years. Selling out here he went to Burlington, Iowa, for a short time, then to Bloomington, Ill., where he operated a small grocery for three years. Again selling out he went to Lena, Ill., bought and conducted a hotel for two years, when he became identified as commercial traveler for a large advertising concern, remaining with them three years. He next engaged in an implement business in Peoria, Ill., for a few years, and November 1, 1887, arrived in Delano, Cal.

In Delano the judge signified his intention of remaining by erecting a home, planting trees, and becoming as comfortable as the crude conditions then existing permitted. He engaged in real estate business from the first, and heartily entered into various lines of activity suggested by the peculiarities of climate and soil. He became one of the promoters and the treasurer and manager of the Poso Irrigating Company, financed the same to a large extent, and when the contractor failed, ably directed the enterprise through the hard times, sold most of the stock, and succeeded in digging one hundred and twenty-five miles of the ditch and six miles of flume. This undertaking took four years, and the water was secured for the district as agreed upon in the terms of contract. Judge Coverdale is treasurer of the enterprise at the present time, and much regrets the internal strife which prevented the completion of the canal as originally decided upon. He has been active in Republican politics for many years, but has always been averse to office holding. He is prominent in fraternal circles, being a member of Winona Lodge No. 18, F. & A. M., and of the Wawatonna Chapter, R. A. M., and Cyrene Commandery No. 9, K. T., of Wawatonna. He was a member of the Grand Army of the Republic in Delano until it burned out. He is a man whose mental superiority is borne out in his physical stature, which is six feet three inches in height; and he still carries himself like a soldier, bearing with dignity and modesty the reverses and honors which have broadened his life.

GEORGE WASHINGTON HOLMES. Occupying an honored position among the many worthy citizens of Fresno county is George W. Holmes, who is now serving as postmaster at Selma. A man of integrity, industry and sterling worth, he has been successful in his business enterprises by earnest effort acquiring a fair share of this world's goods. A son of Jacob Holmes, he was born March 3, 1846, in Fayette county, Ohio.

A native of New Jersey, Jacob Holmes was born May 10, 1806. He was reared and educated on the Atlantic coast, living there until 1840. Following the surging tide of emigration westward in that year, he moved to Fayette county, Ohio, where he took up land, from which he improved a farm. Going thence to Highland county, Ohio, in 1857, he there continued in agricultural pursuits during his active career, living in that part of the state until his death, March 2, 1896, in his ninety-first year. He married Sarah Worden, who was born in New Jersey, in 1810, and died in Ohio, in 1892. Six sons and an equal number of daughters blessed their union, and of these three children died in infancy, five sons and four daughters growing to years of maturity.

The ninth child in order of birth to his parents, George W. Holmes was bred and educated in Ohio. Removing to Illinois in the fall of 1865, he found employment in Biggsville, where he became manager of the lumber yard for the Criswell Lumber Company, after which he was clerk in a mercantile house for two years. Then, in company with a friend, he bought out his employer, and four years later purchased the interest of his partner in the business. He established a large and remunerative trade as a general merchant, continuing there until his store and its contents were destroyed by fire in 1883. Migrating then to Nebraska, Mr. Holmes bought one hundred and sixty acres of land in York county, near York, and was there engaged in farming from 1883 until 1891. Coming to California in that year, he purchased forty acres of land on the McCall road, three and one-half miles north of Selma, and began the culture of fruit and grapes. In 1896 he bought a ranch of forty acres, lying south of Selma, and was there engaged in business as a dairyman for six years. In 1902 Mr. Holmes was appointed postmaster at Selma, and, obtaining his commission February 15, 1902, has since served in that capacity, performing the duties devolving upon him with ability and fidelity.

While a resident of Illinois, Mr. Holmes was married in 1866 to Catherine Baxter, a native of Maryland, and they have seven children living, namely: Sarah Elizabeth, wife of Walter Fisher, of Los Angeles; John A., of San Francisco; Viola, wife of E. H. Eskew, of Los Angeles; Minnie, wife of J. D. Greene, of Selma; Lela, wife of Charles Heiguira; Helen, assistant postmaster at Selma; and Ralph Harrison, at school in Los Angeles. Mr. Holmes is a sound Republican in politics, and while in Nebraska served two terms as county assessor of York county and two terms as county supervisor. He is a man of deep religious convictions, and is an active member of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

WILLIAM ROBINSON. John A. Robinson, Sr., now retired, is an able representative of the family of that name who had long been identified with Boston, Mass. The ranch of this honored pioneer, about twelve hundred acres in extent, skirting the Merced river, and in the vicinity of Snelling, is now managed by his sons, and is one of the fertile and valuable properties which bespeak the wise and practical rule of the pioneer. His family numbers seven children, namely: Charles A., the oldest, a United States deputy surveyor, also mineral deputy surveyor; William, of this sketch; John A., Jr., a stock-raiser of Merced county; Mrs. F. B. Collins, of Seattle, Wash.; Fred G., on the home ranch; Walter H., an educator; and George, living at the home place and attending the University of California.

John A. Robinson, Sr., was born in East Malden, Mass., April 9, 1825, and came to California in 1849, with his cousins, Charles and Gus Hall. The long journey around the Horn was in no way remarkable for adventure. Mr. Robinson went to the mines along the American river, achieving more than average success in both Placer and Mariposa counties. His operations were somewhat retarded by an accident to his leg, sustained by a falling piece of rock, which had proven an inconvenience for many years and finally was amputated. Owing to this injury Mr. Robinson gave up mining, turning his attention to cultivating a rented farm near Snelling. In 1866 he had made such headway that he was able to purchase his home ranch of two hundred acres, and this has been increased to twelve hundred acres of land on the Merced river. His land proved particularly fertile, much of it being rich bottom-land, and he placed it under fruit and stock and pasture, devoting his energies practically to this industry the balance of his active life. His original purchase was one of the first fruit farms of the county. He impressed his vigor and influence upon the community which he did so much to improve, and now, in his eightieth year, he finds himself surrounded by the esteem and affectionate regard not only of the older, but of the younger generation. He lives with his son and namesake, John A. Robinson, Jr., of Merced county, his wife, formerly Agnes Graham, having died in 1902. Mrs. Robinson was born in Ireland and reared in Massachusetts.

William Robinson was born in Merced county October 29, 1862; his earlier years did not differ from those of practically all of his schoolmates in Merced county, for he worked hard on the home farm, and regarded the opportunity of going to school a luxury to be used wisely and thoroughly appreciated. When through with school he devoted his entire energies to farming and stock-raising, and this early application, with desire to do his work well, is responsible for the large measure of success which has come his way. In 1896 he rented three hundred and seventeen acres, which he has since purchased, one hundred and four acres of which is rich bottom-land. The lowlands are devoted to corn, and the uplands to grain and pasture. Many improvements signalize his industry and progressive spirit, and his standing in the community is the best proof of his ability, integrity and worth. Mr. Robinson is of a social turn of mind, and for years has been a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. In politics he is a staunch Republican, and in connection with the political attitude of his family, it is interesting to know that his father was one of five men in Merced county to raise the Union flag in 1862 and keep it floating over his home during the war.

WILLIAM B. CHARLES, M. D. A few links in the ancestral chain of our subject takes us back to colonial days. For it was before Washington's command of the army or the signing of the Declaration of Independence that Jonathan

J. R. McDonald

The grandfather, Nathan Charles, who was a devout Quaker, was born in Maryland, and with his parents removed to North Carolina, where he was married. In 1818 he went to what is now known as Washington county, Ind., and in that new and unsettled country engaged in farming and also followed the saddler's trade. He attained a venerable age, dying in 1868, when ninety-one years old.

The father of Dr. Charles, Levin Charles, was born in North Carolina and went to Indiana with his parents when a child of four years, receiving his training in the latter state, and in fact spending his entire life within its confines. He became an agriculturist of some importance for those early days, and passed away when in his sixty-sixth year. First a Whig, on the formation of the Republican party he joined its forces and was at once one of its staunchest allies. He married America Rodman, a native of Shelby county, Ky., whose father, Hugh Rodman, also a native of Kentucky, settled in Washington county, Ind., about 1825. He served in the war of 1812 as a commissioned officer and died when in his seventy-sixth year, having spent his active years as a tiller of the soil. His father, Hugh Rodman, Sr., was born in Bucks county, Pa., and settled in Kentucky in a very early day, in 1786, going by boat down the Ohio river. He was a descendant of Scotch ancestors. Mrs. America Charles died in Indiana in 1875, at the age of fifty-two years, having become the mother of eleven children, of whom William B. was the sixth in order of birth.

Dr. Charles was born in Salem, Washington county, Ind., March 12, 1857. After attending the schools of the latter city he received a higher training in an academy, and subsequently began teaching school. It was while thus employed that he began reading medicine and for five years diligently followed this method of self-instruction. Later entering the University of Louisville, he graduated from that institution March 1, 1887, and entered upon the practice of his profession in Norcatur, Kans., where he remained for eight years. In 1894 he identified himself with Kings county, Cal., locating in Hanford in March of that year, and has ever since made it his home, building up a lucrative practice and endearing himself to all by his thorough understanding of the medical science and by his winning personality.

The marriage of Dr. Charles and Carrie S. Wildfang, a native of Wisconsin, was celebrated in Norcatur, Kans., November 30, 1887, and they have two children, Ethel and William Gordon, who are at home with their parents. While Dr.

Charles is a very busy man, he has time to devote to measures which tend toward the betterment of his home locality and withal is a loyal, public-spirited citizen. He is a Republican of the deepest dye, and on the ticket of that party was elected to the office of county physician, a position which he has filled with credit for the past five years. His interest in his profession is deep and sincere and he keeps in touch with the progress and improvement which medical science is constantly making. Fraternally he is a Mason, holding membership in Hanford Lodge No. 279.

JAMES R. McDONALD. Honored among the early pioneers of the state, James R. McDonald will long be remembered both as a political and business factor of the country, and a citizen whose moral influence it would be impossible to measure. For more than a half century he gave his best efforts toward the development of natural resources, the promotion of all enterprises calculated to advance the material welfare of whatever community he made his home, and the moral uplifting of all with whom he came in contact. In Grayson, San Joaquin valley, where he lived for more than thirty years, his memory is revered by old and young, for it is here that his efforts in behalf of the country's interests were most successful. To those who knew him best the record of his life will be regarded with affectionate interest; to those whose paths have not crossed his, such a record will contain all the interest which attaches to the lives of the early pioneers.

The McDonald family is of Scottish origin and in the lives of the western emigrants have been demonstrated the splendid qualities which distinguish that sturdy nation. The head of the family, Alexander McDonald, was born April 12, 1789, in Belead, Scotland, and in manhood married Helen Sturten, who was born August 12, 1792, in the same locality. A farmer by occupation, he first leased a farm known as Belead and later one called Pitkur, the latter being about twelve miles from Dundee. This was a valuable property, well improved and cultivated, and for many years he carried on farming successfully. It was in 1834 that he decided to try his fortune among the greater opportunities of the western world, and accordingly with two sons, John and Alexander, he took passage for the United States, with the understanding that the family were to follow in another year, after a home had been prepared for them. Their first information was received from the emigrants several months later, stating that the location selected for a home was in the neighborhood of Jacksonville, Ill., and for the family to prepare to make the trip in the spring of 1835. It was no small undertaking for the mother to make the journey with the care of nine children, the youngest of whom was about three years old. However, the journey was safely accomplished, by steamer to London, thence by the Canada to New York city (the latter trip occupying six weeks), by rail to Pittsburg, by boat down the Ohio river to Cairo, then up the Mississippi river to Alton, then the Illinois to Naples, landing them within fifteen miles of their new home. This consisted of a thousand acres of prairie land, and four hundred acres of timber land, the latter located four miles southwest of the home farm. This property had been entered by Mr. McDonald shortly after his arrival in the state, and for the temporary shelter of his family he erected a log house, afterward putting up another of brick, the brick being burnt upon the farm. Success attended Mr. McDonald's efforts, but during the family's first year in the state, nearly every member was taken ill with fever, which was then prevalent throughout the country. All recovered with the exception of the father, who passed away in 1835, and is now buried in Bethel Church cemetery, three miles from the old home. Alexander McDonald was a man of remarkable character, strong common sense and a determination that brought him success in whatever line he attempted. The mother, left alone with the care of her large family, bent every effort to rear her children and train them to ways of industry and honest manhood and womanhood. That she succeeded a record of the McDonald family will show beyond doubt. Her death occurred in the early part of the year 1845, taking from the home a loving and always faithful mother, from the circles of the Presbyterian Church a consistent and helpful member, and from the community a pioneer woman who had done no little to uplift the standard of social intercourse. She was the mother of twelve children, namely: Elizabeth, born January 7, 1814; William, February 4, 1816; Jane, May 12, 1818; John, September 11, 1819; Alexander, June 13, 1821; Andrew N., April 14, 1823; Charles, February 13, 1825; a twin of Charles, who died in infancy; Maria S., November 27, 1826; James R., September 17, 1828; Sarah F., October 19, 1830; and Thomas E., April 20, 1832. All but one or two of the family married and reared families, members of which have attained honored places in the various professions, business and political circles, and have ably upheld the standard of honor set by the first emigrant of the name in America.

James R. McDonald was born in Belead, Scotland, the seventh son and tenth child born to his parents. He was only six years old when the home was changed to the prairies of Illinois, and in that location he spent his childhood and boy-hood. He found his boyhood a very busy and active one, beginning to plow at the age of eleven years and in many ways assisting in the farm work. He received only a limited education, the school he attended (a subscription school) being in session about three months in the year, and held in a rough building of unhewn logs, with puncheon floor, and slabs for benches and desks, and a huge fireplace occupying the entire end of the room. After the death of his mother, which occurred when he was about seventeen years old, the property was divided and the home broken up, the six children left going to make their home with the married members of the family, while John McDonald was appointed administrator of the estate and guardian of those still minors. Each of the children had about $700 in property and cash. James R. McDonald made his home for about a year with his sister Jane, helping on the farm when there was work to be done, at other times working for neighboring farmers. During the winter of 1846-47 he attended the public school at Manchester, and while located in that place joined a class in geography, the lesson being learned by singing—a unique method, but Mr. McDonald has always said that he accomplished more in those twelve lessons than he ever had in the same length of time, employed in any other way. Through the influence of the gentleman with whom he boarded, Dr. Nettleton, Mr. McDonald was induced to attend Jubilee College, located in Peoria county, Ill., near the forks of the Kickapoo creek. He remained there for one year, when he was notified by his guardian that his funds were exhausted. On leaving school he cast about for some congenial occupation, and having considerable mechanical ability he decided to learn the trade of carpenter. This plan was opposed by his brother Charles, who had entered commercial life, and who finally induced him to take a clerkship. A position was secured with the firm of Stevenson & Lurton, with whom he remained for six months, when he became connected with his brother Alexander in the same capacity.

For some time Mr. McDonald was satisfied with the peaceful life he led as a clerk in Jacksonville. However, the report of the great gold discovery in California, where it was said fortunes could be made in a day, ended his contentment and he longed to come west, as some of his neighbors were then preparing for the trip. He was induced by his brother John to remain in Illinois and take charge of affairs while he himself should make the westward trip. Circumstances, however, prevented John from leaving, so James McDonald came instead. In company with seven others, George Hufnagle, Braxton Davenport and Bazzel, his brother, Sit and W. L.

Reed, William A. Sanders and James Brown, on April 9, 1850, he started upon the long and perilous trip. The party was thoroughly equipped with everything of first-class quality, wagons, harness, mules, provisions, etc. Were it possible in this brief space to recount the history of their trip as written down by Mr. McDonald himself, it would make a story of unsurpassed interest. Suffice it to say that on August 28, four months and nineteen days from the time they left Jacksonville, they reached Ringgold, the first mining camp on the trip. Several of their company had left them at the Humboldt sink and they finished the journey alone. An incident of interest was the return of Mr. McDonald in 1886 to his old home in Illinois, when he made the journey in four days and at one-half the cost of his first trip across the continent.

After disposing of their superfluous articles and stock, the party then returned to Ringgold from Sacramento, where they had spent a few days, and putting up a cabin proceeded to engage in various occupations, some teaming and some mining, during the first winter. Two men with whom Mr. McDonald had associated that year were T. B. McFarland, now justice of the supreme court, and Ross Sargent, of Stockton, who then kept the American hotel in the town. In the spring of 1851 the Reeds and Mr. McDonald concluded to try their fortunes north on the high Sierras, and accordingly disposed of their property in Ringgold and with a mule each started for the new location. They spent some time at the American river and Nevada City, after which they joined a party of old eastern friends and went to the Feather river and entered upon mining operations. One trying experience which Mr. McDonald had during this time was a journey made to Marysville for provisions. Shortly afterward they located on Poorman's creek near Onion valley and there made considerable money, the largest nugget taken out being worth $1,800. For three years following his arrival in California Mr. McDonald continued in the occupation of mining, meeting with just enough success to continue in the hope of finding his fortune some day. Finally the Reeds and Mr. McDonald went to Tuolumne county, each to visit relatives and at the same time cast about for a better location than they had. It was there the old friends separated, each going his own way in an effort to earn a livelihood. The mining ventures of Mr. McDonald were ended by a letter from his brother Charles, written from San Francisco and asking him to come and meet himself and wife, who had just arrived. Accordingly he joined them in that city and eventually he and his brother engaged in farming operations in Alameda county. This venture did not prove much of a success financially, although the profits were fair at that time and would be considered excellent at the present. In the fall of 1856 they discontinued farming and bought out the mercantile establishment of the Winton brothers, at Haywards, and conducted this business together for about a year, when Charles sold his interest to Alexander Allen and returned east. Late in the fall of 1859 Mr. McDonald sold his interest in the business to his partner, closing up the partnership on the 1st of January, 1860. Following the settling up of his affairs Mr. McDonald made a trip to Illinois via Panama as a delegate to the Republican convention held in Chicago that nominated Abraham Lincoln for president of the United States.

Upon returning to the west again, Mr. McDonald's first venture was the purchase of a steam thrasher, the first introduced on that side of the bay. However, it was both too new and too expensive an undertaking to be a success financially, so he sold out and spent the winter of 1861-62 on his sheep ranch in the Livermore hills on the eastern edge of the valley. The following spring he accepted a position with the California Wool Growers to look after their packing house in San Francisco, but remained there only a few months when he returned to Haywards, going from there to Walnut Creek, Contra Costa county, and establishing a general merchandise store. Largely through Mr. McDonald's influence a postoffice was established at that place, his appointment to the postmastership naturally following. In all public movements he took a most active interest, and did much to advance the general welfare. Becoming dissatisfied with his business ventures Mr. McDonald located in Healdsburg, Sonoma county, and established a general merchandise store. All this time he had been acting as a partner of Charles Whitmore, and during his residence in this place of about four years they dissolved the partnership and Mr. McDonald continued alone. In April, 1869, Mr. McDonald left Healdsburg in search of a better location, finding it in Grayson, Stanislaus county, where he purchased a store and in conjunction with W. J. Tiley began in business May 20, 1869. They continued together until the 1st of January, 1874, when Mr. McDonald purchased his partner's interest. During these years the little city of Grayson had been gradually growing; houses were built and places of business established, among them the Wells-Fargo Express Company, of which Mr. McDonald held the agency for many years. An impetus to the general business prospects of Grayson was given by the discovery of quicksilver in the mountain range west of the town. A number of the citizens then formed a corporation, of which Mr. McDonald was chosen president, and with a large capital stock to insure financial prestige, mining operations were begun. Not meeting with the success anticipated the mine was eventually abandoned. This same mine and many others have been developed of recent years and are very successful. Very shortly after his location on the west side Mr. McDonald realized that the great need was a water supply to make the land productive. In 1871 the San Joaquin and King's River Canal Irrigation Company had begun a canal at the junction of the Fresno slough and the San Joaquin river, but for some reason it was never extended beyond Crow's Landing. In 1874 the irrigation question became one of the most absorbing interests in the various granges of the country, and eventually led to a mass meeting (which was held in Mr. McDonald's warehouse, as that was the only building large enough to accommodate the people), when a committee of three was appointed to formulate some plan whereby the country could receive its much needed improvement. This committee consisted of Gilbert Fisher, of Crow's Landing; W. B. Hay, of Ellis, and Mr. McDonald, each of whom was to draw up a plan and present it at the next meeting of the convention. Mr. McDonald's plan was that which is today known as the Wright law, being the district plan of irrigation, which was approved and adopted and has since been in force.

The political career of Mr. McDonald was one of intense interest, and embraced a participation in many of the important movements in the early history of the state. He was always a staunch Republican and gave his best interests to the support of the principles which he endorsed, though personally he was never desirous of official recognition. In 1857 he was elected public administrator of Alameda county by five votes over his opponent, in a county strongly Democratic, being nominated without his knowledge. With the passing out of existence of the Whig party and the inauguration of the Republican, Mr. McDonald, after a careful consideration of the new platform, announced himself a supporter of the old principles under a new name. When he decided to return east, where he visited New York city, Niagara Falls, and other places of interest as well as his old home, he was induced by friends to try for the office of delegate to the national convention which was to be held at Chicago, Ill., in 1860. He therefore attended the state convention at Sacramento, but afterward withdrew for delegate and contested for alternate, which position he won. Mr. McDonald made the trip by way of New Orleans, in Louisiana visiting his sisters, who were conducting a private school in the Red river district. Traveling on to Illinois he found the entire state wild with the prospect of the coming convention, and eager to propose the name of the man who stood so prominently before the public at that time.

During the convention several honors fell to the lot of Mr. McDonald, and in all positions he carried himself in perfect honor and dignity. The nomination of Abraham Lincoln followed, and after the close of the convention Mr. McDonald went to Jacksonville, Ill., and spent one year among his old friends and relatives. The following year he went to Washington to witness the inauguration of Lincoln and also to seek an appointment, but was unsuccessful in the latter. After visiting his old home once more, he took passage for California via the isthmus, arriving in San Francisco the last of May.

In 1890, although advanced in years, Mr. McDonald was nominated and elected state treasurer, discharging the duties of this office for a period of four years, with entire credit to himself and to those who had honored him with their support. In 1894 he was a very popular man in the Republican convention, but was finally defeated in his efforts for governor of the state.

Mr. McDonald was married twice, his first wife being Clarissa Jane Cox, the daughter of E. H. Cox, of San Ramon, Contra Costa county, Cal., and of this union were born two children, Mark E., and Paul, the former of whom was associated for years as his father's partner in the business interests of Grayson, while the latter is a prominent lawyer of San Francisco. The mother of these sons died July 21, 1876, and is buried in the Grayson cemetery. His second marriage united him with Emma J. Cooper, who was born in Sonoma, Cal., the daughter of James Cooper, a native of Scotland. James Cooper ran away from his native land when a mere lad in years, following a sea-faring life and in time becoming mate of a vessel. He came to California in 1845 and located in San Francisco, after which he went to Sonoma and conducted a hotel, and also engaged in farming and stock-raising. He became a prosperous and successful man, in addition to his accumulation of land winning the esteem and respect of all with whom he came in contact. He died in that locality in 1857, at the age of thirty-five years. His wife, formerly Sarah Bigelow, was a native of Nova Scotia, and died in 1886, in Sonoma, aged sixty-three years. She crossed the plains with her sister, Mrs. Emma Smith as early as 1846.

To Mr. and Mrs. McDonald were born three children, namely: James R., Jr., who is interested in the store at Grayson; Ruth B., at home; and Hayward, at home. In his religious convictions a Presbyterian, Mr. McDonald was identified with that denomination for something over a half century and to no man is greater credit due for the establishment and upbuilding of Presbyterian churches throughout this section of California. At the same time that he was sent as an alternate to the Republican National convention he was also representing the California Presbyterians as commissioner to the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church which was held at Pittsburg, Pa. An incident of note in the life of Mr. McDonald was his connection with the famous vigilance committee of San Francisco, which was brought about in this wise: In 1856 the state authorities attempted to put an end to this organization, which was of a necessity deemed unlawful. The vigilantes, therefore, to offset the efforts of the state to suppress them, sent agents through the counties near the bay to enlist those favorable to their cause, and among those who signed an agreement to go to their assistance should the necessity arise was Mr. McDonald, for though always active in the maintenance of law and order he knew enough personally of this organization to believe in its efficacy. He was also active in the establishment and upbuilding of a division of the Sons of Temperance, which flourished for some time in Haywards. Having been made a Mason in Jacksonville, Ill., in the spring of 1850, he was afterward connected with the Masonic lodge at San Leandro, Cal. In Grayson Mr. McDonald was very successful as a merchant and business man. In an early day this city was practically the head of navigation, and enormous quantities of grain were shipped from this place. In addition to raising large quantities of grain he was also interested in raising sheep. He owned about three thousand acres of land but his home always remained in Grayson. His death occurred October 14, 1902, when seventy-four years of age, and with him passed one of the remarkable landmarks of Stanislaus county. He was liberal in religious toleration and social and friendly in his manner,—a man who loved his fellow men. This article would not be complete without mentioning Mrs. Emma J. McDonald, a woman endowed by nature with many talents and a strong mentality that has enabled her to uphold with honor and credit the position of this remarkable family, one of the strong arches in the structure of a great western empire.

OLIVER CROMWELL BROWN. Since the year 1879 Mr. Brown has made his home in the Golden state, locating in that part of Tulare county which has since been incorporated in Kings county. His first purchase of land consisted of eighty acres of prairie, four acres of which he set out to fruit trees, and the balance was devoted to the raising of wheat. Prospering in this small venture he enlarged the scope of his holdings until he had two hundred and ten acres under his control, the entire tract being devoted to the raising of raisin grapes, peaches, apricots and prunes. Until 1899 he made his home on the ranch, but in that year he moved into the city limits of Hanford, and has since lived retired from the cares and stress of an active business life. The ranch is located eight miles southwest of Hanford, and is now rented, Mr. Brown receiving one-half of the gross proceeds.

Oliver C. Brown is a native of Illinois, born near Hillsboro, Montgomery county, February 24, 1829, a son of John Brown, who was born and reared in Kentucky. After his marriage he went to Montgomery county, Ill., where he took up raw timber land, and made his home for several years. Later he sold this land and invested in a tract of prairie land and in the course of time owned a fine farm of two hundred acres, which was his home until his death, when about fifty-two years old. As a private he took part in the Black Hawk war, and in politics he was a Democrat. Although a comparatively young man at the time of his death he had accomplished much in the course of his life, gaining the competence which he left to his heirs solely by his own efforts. His father, Richard Brown, was a native of Virginia, removing from that state to Kentucky when it was as yet a new country. From his plantation in the latter state he went to Illinois in an early day and purchased a farm, upon which his death occurred when he was in his seventy-eighth year. The grandfather was a descendant of English ancestors who located in the south many generations ago. The mother of Oliver C. Brown was Sarah Craig prior to her marriage, and was a native of Kentucky. In Adair county, that state, occurred her marriage with John Brown, and she died in Illinois when about seventy-four years old, having become the mother of nine children, of whom Oliver Cromwell was the eldest.

In the public schools adjacent to his father's farm in Illinois Oliver C. Brown gained a good education, and when nineteen years old began teaching school. Until reaching his twenty-first year he gave his father the benefit of his services, at that time purchasing an adjoining farm, although he continued to live at home until his marriage, which occurred when he was twenty-three years old. Until 1872 he made his home in Illinois, but in that year he began to work his way toward the west and for seven years resided on a farm in Fillmore county, Neb. After suffering from the grasshopper plague for three seasons he decided to make a change of location and wisely chose Tulare, now Kings county, Cal., as offering the best advantages from an agricultural standpoint, as well as affording a good home for his family.

In St. Louis county, Mo., in 1850, Oliver C. Brown was united in marriage with Elizabeth Kelso, who became the mother of ten children, the eldest of whom died in infancy. John W., born September 15, 1853, is a rancher near Selma, Fresno county; Sarah E., born July 20, 1855, died October 14, 1875; Artesia, born January 30, 1858, died October 15, 1875; Franklin James, born January 4, 1860, is also a rancher near Selma; William H., born March 1, 1862, is conducting a fruit ranch near Selma; Mary M., born March 7, 1864, died February 10, 1881; Edward E., born April 26, 1866, is a rancher near Chico; Charles C., born October 24, 1868, conducts a fruit, stock and grain ranch near Durham; and Cora M., born March 13, 1871, is the wife of Elmer Young, a rancher near Hanford. The mother of these children died December 26, 1893, at the age of sixty-five years, seven months and twenty-four days. For his second wife Mr. Brown married India C. Mezick, who though born in Illinois was reared in Indiana. Politically Mr. Brown is a Democrat in national affairs, and in local matters votes for the men best fitted to serve the public good, regardless of party. He has always refused to accept any office within the gift of his fellow citizens, preferring to keep out of public life, although he takes a keen interest in the welfare of his home town. He is a self-made man in the best sense of the term and may well be proud of the success which has attended his efforts since making his home in the Golden state.

BURTON SMITH. As superintendent of the San Joaquin & Kings River Canal and Irrigation Company, Burton Smith occupies a leading position among the business men of Merced county, having won distinction as a man of unusual ability in the line which has held his attention throughout the greater part of his life. A native of California, he was born in Visalia, Tulare county, June 17, 1872, the fifth in a family of nine children, seven of whom are now living. His parents, George W. and Nancy (Parker) Smith, are mentioned at length in another part of this volume. In the public and high school of Visalia, Burton Smith received his education, just before completing, taking a special course in mathematics, which has been of great service in his life work. When eight years of age he began spending his vacations in working with his father in surveying, first carrying the flag until capable of being advanced to a more important position. He remained with his father in irrigation work until he was eighteen years of age, when he entered the employ of Jasper Harrell of Tulare county, who owned one of the largest ranches in that section. This had formerly consisted of wild and desolate land, but by the system introduced by the St. Johns River Association, five thousand acres were reclaimed.

He retained the position of superintendent of this ranch until his father's death, when, in 1897, he resigned and took up the work of surveyor and civil engineer, continuing, however, the conduct of his ranch, which consisted of six hundred acres. He held the position of deputy county surveyor, and for three years, from February, 1899, to February, 1902, was superintendent of the St. Johns River Association. April 20, 1902, he entered the employ of Miller & Lux, and was engaged in surveying for them in Kern county until June, 1903, when he was transferred to the west side of Merced county and continued in the same capacity. In January, 1904, he received the appointment of superintendent of the San Joaquin & Kings River Canal and Irrigation Company, and immediately assumed charge of the same. The main canal of this company is seventy-one miles long, extending from the San Joaquin river, the outside canal is forty miles in length, and Colony canal and its branch is thirty miles. The position is one of importance and responsibility, but Mr. Smith has upheld the standard of excellence noteworthy in all his work and has enhanced the high regard in which he was universally held.

In 1904 Mr. Smith built his residence in Los Banos which is presided over by his wife, formerly Edith Hemming, with whom he was united in marriage in his native city. She is a native of Clayton, Contra Costa county, and daughter of W. B. Hemming, who is engaged in the fruit-canning business. Mr. and Mrs. Smith have one daughter, Gladys. Fraternally Mr. Smith was made an Odd Fellow in Mountain Brow Lodge, I. O. O. F., of Los Banos, and a Mason in Los Banos Lodge No. 312, F. & A. M. He also affiliates with the Woodmen of the World. In his political convictions he adheres to the principles advocated in the platform of the Democratic party.

EPHRAIM W. AUSTIN. Adaptability is a trait to which Ephraim W. Austin is largely indebted for his beautiful ranch and comfortable home life in the vicinity of Bakersfield. Reared to a life of luxury and comparative indolence in the Hawaiian Islands, where he was born at Hilo, October 11, 1869, the change to an undeveloped ranch, with its physical and other exactions, as well as the more strenuous life in a thriving, progressive community, has furnished abundant test of his mettle. The Austin family has been prominent in the judicial and governmental life of the Hawaiian Islands for many years, being equally honored under the new as well as old administration. The immigrant to the Pacific-swept lands was Stafford L.

Austin, father of Ephraim, who was born in Saratoga, N. Y., April 10, 1824. Under his father, Benjamin H. Austin, he studied law, later attending Oberlin Law School, from which he graduated. On a whaler he made one trip to the Arctic regions before the mast, and on the return trip stopped at Honolulu. In 1860 he was given a minor office under the monarchy, and in 1870 was appointed judge of the Third Judicial District of the islands. In the meantime the sugar industry, in which he had become interested, had grown apace, but 1885 proved a disastrous year, and he lost the bulk of the fortune won by his business sagacity and perseverance. To a certain degree he received compensation for financial losses in the honor conferred upon him by his adopted government, and lived to be an old man, to the last vigorous and active, giving promise of indefinite usefulness. Judge Austin died of heart disease while holding court, October 2, 1896, aged seventy-two years. He married into one of the very early families of the islands, his wife, formerly Caroline Clarke, being a daughter of Rev. Ephraim Clarke, who went there in 1828, and became renowned as a missionary and translator of foreign languages. Mrs. Austin is still living in Honolulu, and is about sixty-seven years old. She became the mother of seven children, one of whom is deceased. The oldest, Franklin H., resides in Los Angeles; Herbert C. was auditor of the islands after they became an American colony, and before that was assessor and collector for several years, at present being one of the prominent and influential men of Honolulu; Stafford W. is in the United States land office at Independence, Inyo county, Cal.; C. Jonathan is superintendent of the government gardens at Honolulu; Ephraim is a rancher of Kern county; and Harriet, formerly in the employ of the government, but since her resignation has held the position of bookkeeper for the board of Congressional Evangelists in the islands.

Educated at Oahu College, Hawaii, Ephraim W. Austin came to California in 1888, resolved to make his own living under the Stars and Stripes. For a time he was variously employed in San Luis Obispo county, and in August, 1888, came to Kern county to take up swamp land. Owing to the Kern lake excitement he was obliged to abandon his property soon afterward, and removed to the vicinity of Bakersfield, where he has since lived the greater part of the time. During 1889 and 1890 he spent nine months in Fresno county, on his return settling on the ranch which he now owns, and which consists of about forty acres, twenty of which he has placed under fruit. He has found the horticultural business unsuccessful, owing to the quality of his land, and is now arranging to place it all under alfalfa, which will undoubtedly prove more remunerative. For a couple of years Mr. Austin engaged in a livery and veterinary business in Bakersfield, with a partner. He is an active Democrat, particularly for his friends, and has himself served as clerk of the school board since its organization, having been appointed to the board of trustees by County Superintendent W. C. Doub. Fraternally he is connected with the Woodmen of the World. In 1893 Mr. Austin was united in marriage with Beulah McKinzie, of Bakersfield, and four daughters have been born of the union: Caroline V., Miriam, Harriet A., and Mary H.

ERNEST E. SOUTHWICK. Among the respected and highly esteemed residents of Dos Palos, E. E. Southwick holds an assured position. A skillful mechanic, and an experienced engineer, he has assisted in installing different pumping plants, and now, as an employe of the Pacific Coast Oil Company is engineer at the Dos Palos Pumping Station, which, with its pipe line was erected under his careful supervision. A son of the late Edmund Z. Southwick, he was born May 13, 1855, in Angola, Erie county, N. Y.

A native of Erie county, N. Y., Edmund Z. Southwick succeeded to the free and independent occupation of his ancestors, and was engaged in agricultural pursuits in western New York until the fall of 1884. His health becoming impaired, he then removed with his family to California, and here lived retired until his death, in 1894, at Niles, Alameda county. He married Marietta J. Clough, who was born in Erie county, N. Y., the daughter of Horace Clough, a prosperous farmer. She now resides in Pasadena. Of their four children, two survive, E. E., the special subject of this sketch, being the eldest.

Brought up on the home farm, E. E. Southwick received excellent educational advantages, attending the public schools and the Angola Academy. He subsequently learned telegraphy, and at the age of seventeen years accepted a position on the line of the Buffalo, New York & Pittsburg Railroad, for eighteen months being agent and operator at Liberty, Pa. Entering then the employ of the Tidewater Pipe Line Company, Mr. Southwick helped to build that entire line, and afterward, with his old superintendent, H. C. Beamer, assisted in the building of the Rock City and Buffalo Pipe Line. On its completion, he took charge of a station belonging to the Standard Oil Company, built a pipe line, and installed a plant, putting it in good running order. Continuing then in the employ of the company he traveled throughout the country as car tracer and private detective until after his marriage, when he took charge of a pumping station at Richburg, N. Y. At the end of a year, Mr. Southwick resumed work on the railroad, but eighteen months later resigned his position.

Coming to California in December, 1884, Mr. Southwick bought a small fruit ranch of ten acres at Niles, which valuable property he still owns. For about eight years he devoted his time and attention to the care and improvement of his orchard, and the following four years was engaged in various occupations, serving as deputy assessor, and for awhile being with the California Nursery Company, and later with the San Francisco Packing House Company. In 1896 Mr. Southwick returned to his former occupation of engineer, and having installed two plants in Niles, Cal., had charge of them until November, 1902. Becoming at that time connected with the Pacific Coast Oil Company as engineer, he came to Dos Palos to install this plant, and under his supervision the pipe line and plant were built, and he has since served most ably and faithfully as its engineer.

In Fredonia, N. Y., Mr. Southwick married Carrie F. Baldwin, who was born in Chautauqua county, a daughter of Emery Baldwin, and they are the parents of two children, namely: Marion H. and Clough E. In his political affiliations Mr. Southwick is a straightforward Republican. He takes an intelligent interest in local affairs, and while living in Niles was for many years school trustee, resigning from that position when he moved from the city. Fraternal-ly he was made an Odd Fellow in Niles, and is now a charter member and noble grand of Santa Rita Lodge No. 124, I. O. O. F., of Dos Palos; he is also a member of Niles Encampment No. 62; of Maple Camp, W. of W., of Centerville; and of the United Artisans.

BENJAMIN WALLACE VAN WICKLE.

A natural mechanic of great ability and ingenuity, Benjamin Wallace Van Wickle, as manager of the Los Banos Planing Mill, is intimately associated with the development and advancement of the lumber interests of this part of Merced county. Using good judgment and wise forethought in his manufactures and dealings, he has built up an excellent business in this locality, now practically controlling the trade on the west side of the valley. A native of New York, he was born, September 3, 1851, in Lyons, Wayne county, which was also the birthplace of his father, John Rue Van Wickle. His grandfather, John R. Van Wickle, was born in New Jersey, where the immigrant ancestor of the family from which he was descended settled on coming to the United States from Holland. Subsequently removing to New York, he improved a farm in Lyons, and was there engaged in agricultural pursuits until his death.

Brought up in Lyons, N. Y., John Rue Van Wickle learned the millwright trade when young, and followed it in that locality for many years. Removing from there to Michigan, he was busily employed in erecting grist and sawmills, also taking contracts for building, continuing in active pursuits until seventy years of age. Retiring then, he located in Oceana county of that state, where he resided until his death, at the venerable age of fourscore and four years. He married Mary A. Hipp, who was born and bred in Penfield, Monroe county, N. Y. Her father, Horace Hipp, was at that time engaged there in business as a brewer. He afterward removed to Norwalk, Ohio, where he was extensively engaged in agricultural pursuits for a number of years. He spent his last years in Michigan, dying in Van Buren county. Of the union of Mr. and Mrs. John Rue Van Wickle two sons and two daughters were born, and of these one daughter and one son are living. The mother died in Michigan when fifty-four years old.

Spending the days of his boyhood and youth in Van Buren county, Mich., Benjamin Wallace Van Wickle acquired his early education in the public schools of Mattawan. In 1868 he went to Hart, Oceana county, then in his seventeenth year, securing work in a saw mill. An accident happening to the owner of the mill, David Benham, who was also the sawyer, Mr. Van Wickle, although so young, took charge of the saw, and ran it winters for nine years, in the summer seasons having charge of the sash and door factory for his employer. In 1877 Mr. Van Wickle assumed the position of foreman in a sash and door factory at St. Joseph, Mich., and remained there two years or more, when, on account of the ague, he left that locality. Going immediately to Butte, Mont., he was for three years foreman in a large planing mill belonging to the Montana Lumber & Produce Company. The ensuing year he was foreman for the Idaho Lumber Company, at Ogden, Utah, after which he was for six years in the employ of the Eckles Lumber Company, having entire management of their business interests throughout Utah.

Coming to Los Angeles, Cal., in 1893, Mr. Van Wickle was for a year foreman in Lindsey's Mill, at Redondo Beach, and when Dillon Brothers built their mill at Los Angeles he became its manager, holding the position two years. Removing to Fresno county in 1896, he was foreman for the Sanger Lumber Company for a year, and was afterward with Hollenbeck & Bush, in Fresno, until 1900, and from that time until 1902 was foreman in William Crocker's planing mill, in San Francisco. Accepting a position with Miller & Lux in 1902, Mr. Van Wickle has since been foreman and manager of the Los Banos Planing Mill, and in this capacity has met with characteristic success, building up an extensive and remunerative trade, and becoming widely and favorably known as one of the leading millmen of the San Joaquin valley.

In 1893, in Ogden, Utah, Mr. Van Wickle married Harriet Osborne, who was born in England. She died in Sanger, Cal. Three children were born of their union, one of whom is living, namely, Howard. In 1898, in Fresno, Mr. Van Wickle married for his second wife Ethel Hillgrove, a native of Sacramento county, and they are the parents of three children, namely: Carrie, Sephese and Gladys. Politically Mr. Van Wickle is a staunch Republican, and fraternally he belongs to the Independent Order of Odd Fellows.

HOBERT N. CUTLER. Recognized as one of the most intelligent and skillful agriculturists of Fresno county, Hobert N. Cutler owns and occupies a finely improved fruit ranch, lying three miles northeast of Selma. In the pursuit of his congenial occupation he has shown much wisdom and practical judgment, and by many years of hard labor has acquired a competency. Coming from honored New England stock, he was born July 28, 1838, in Holland, Erie county, N. Y., a son of William C. Cutler. His paternal grandfather, Caleb Cutler, was born and bred in Massachusetts. In the early part of the nineteenth century he migrated to Vermont, and for a number of years was engaged in farming in Wardsboro, Windham county. In 1816 he moved with his family to the western part of New York, his only capital at that time being one yoke of oxen, one cow, and three dollars in Continental money. Taking up a tract of unbroken land, he cleared a farm from the forest, not far from Buffalo, and there spent the remainder of his life.

Succeeding to the ancestral occupation, William C. Cutler, who was born in Vermont, removed with his parents to New York state, and when ready to embark in farming on his own account purchased land in Holland, Erie county, where he improved a good estate, on which he lived until his death. He married Maria Morey, who was born in Massachusetts, bred and educated in Otsego county, N. Y., and died in Holland, N. Y. She bore him eight children, three sons and five daughters, Hobert N. being the fourth child.

Having completed his early studies in the common schools of his native town, Hobert N. Cutler turned his attention to agricultural pursuits for a few years. Migrating to Hancock county, Ill., in 1860, he taught school in Carthage for two years. Coming to California by way of the Isthmus in 1862, he followed farming in Saratoga, Santa Clara county, until 1869. Removing then to the western part of Fresno county, Mr. Cutler took up one hundred and sixty acres of land in Panoche valley, and subsequently bought another tract equally as large. Improving the property, he carried on general farming with good success for a number of seasons. Settling three miles northeast of Selma, in the spring of 1879, Mr. Cutler bought his present valuable ranch of eighty acres, and has since carried on a large and remunerative business as a fruit-grower. Thirty-five acres of his land are planted to vines, twenty-eight acres to fig trees, eleven acres to peaches and apricots, twelve acres he devotes to the raising of alfalfa, and in addition he has a blue gum grove of three acres which he planted himself. Mr. Cutler is a man of good business ability, and is interested in both the Rochdale store at Selma and in the Selma Co-operative Packing Company.

In San Francisco, Cal., November 2, 1860, Mr. Cutler married Hester J. Donnellan, who was born in Iowa, and came to California by way of Cape Horn in 1853, being then a young child. Of the union of Mr. and Mrs. Cutler, five children have been born, namely: Mary E., a teacher in Selma; Stella, wife of O. E. Shepherd, of Del Rey; Ede T., a teacher in the Iowa district; Eleise, wife of John Waterman, residing near Fowler; and William Cheney, a butter manufacturer, of Ferndale, Humboldt county. Mr. Cutler is a zealous supporter of the principles of the Democratic party, and has served many times as a delegate to the county conventions. He takes great interest in educational matters, and assisted in organizing the seventh school district of Fresno county and the Panoche school district. Fraternally he belongs to Selma Lodge No. 277, F. & A. M.

CLARENCE A. STARKWEATHER. Actively identified with the advancement of the agricultural interests of Merced county is C. A. Starkweather, well known as the manager of the Los Banos Creamery. He is wideawake, full of energy, and not only possesses a thorough knowledge of the details of his work, but is a man of excellent business capacity and judgment, having inherited in no small measure the substantial qualities of a long line of honored New England ancestors. A son of A. Starkweather, he was born, October 28, 1864, in Whately, Mass., while his mother was there visiting friends and relatives. The immigrant ancestor of the Starkweather family came from England to New England in early colonial days, and settled in Connecticut, from whence his descendants have scattered to all parts of the Union. The grandfather of Mr. Starkweather was a life-long farmer, and a resident of western Massachusetts.

Born and bred in the old Bay state, in the town of Northampton, A. Starkweather grew to manhood on the ancestral homestead, where he was early trained to farming pursuits. Migrating to California in 1851, he located eight miles north of Stockton, where he was employed in tilling the soil for a number of years. In 1858 he visited his old home in Massachusetts, returning the same year to his ranch near Stockton, where he resided the following ten years. In 1868, on account of ill health, he sold his land, and went back to Massachusetts with his family. Not content, however, among the rocks and hills of his native state, he returned to the Pacific coast in 1878, locating on a ranch near Farmington. He subsequently bought land in that locality, and was there employed in general farming until after the death of his wife, when he removed to Alameda, where he now resides. Mr. A. Starkweather's wife was Frances Loomis, who was born in Whately, Mass., a daughter of Leonard Loomis, a prominent farmer of that town, and for many years its town clerk. She died in 1899. Three children were born of their union, namely: H. K., a well-known business man of San Francisco; C. A., the special subject of this sketch, and H. R., in business with his brother, C. A., in Los Banos.

During the earlier years of his boyhood, from 1868 until 1878, his parents being residents of Massachusetts, C. A. Starkweather attended the public schools of Northampton. Returning with them to California, he took a two years' course at the Stockton Business College, from which he was graduated in 1883. From that time until attaining his majority he remained at home, assisting his father in the care of the ranch. Subsequently forming a partnership with J. L. Beecher, Mr. Starkweather was engaged in grain farming from 1886 until 1898, being located in Stanislaus county, and operating from fifteen hundred to twenty-five hundred acres of land. Selling out in 1898, having become discouraged on account of a series of bad crops, Mr. Starkweather gave up farming as an occupation. Going to Stockton, he entered the employ of Fred Arnsberger, manager of the Stockton Creamery, and during the three months that he continued with him he learned the details of the creamery business. Mr. Starkweather then took charge of the Oakdale Creamery, which, while he was engaged in farming, he had helped to build, serving the company as its secretary and as a director, and remained there as its manager for two years. Going from there to San Joaquin county, he had charge of the Lockeford Creamery from 1901 until 1902. Accepting then a position with Schultz, Niggle & Co., he was for a time head butter-maker at the Hygea Creamery in San Francisco, then spent two months with the Jersey Creamery in Alameda, after which he spent a year in San Francisco with his brother, being city salesman for his brother, then took up his business as butter-maker for the Encinal Creamery Company until it became consolidated with the Jersey Creamery Company, when he was made head butter-maker at the Alameda plant. In September, 1903, Mr. Starkweather accepted the position of manager of the Los Banos Creamery for Miller & Lux, the proprietors, and since the leasing of the plant, on June 1, 1904, to the San Francisco cream depot, has continued its management, his work being in every way satisfactory, meeting the approval of his employers and of the patrons of the creamery. The plant, having a capacity of eighteen hundred pounds of butter per day, is furnished with all the latest improved machinery and appliances, including steam power, being up to date in all respects. In addition to manufacturing butter of a superior grade, Mr. Starkweather ships cream to San Francisco daily.

In Farmington, Cal., Mr. Starkweather married Anna H. Anthony, who was born near there, being a daughter of Simeon H. Anthony, a native of Massachusetts, and one of the early pioneers of California, having come here in 1851, settling as a farmer, after leaving the mines, in San Joaquin county. Mr. and Mrs. Starkweather have two children, namely: Clara A. and Elfleda H. Politically Mr. Starkweather is an earnest supporter of the principles of the Republican party. He is a member of the National Union and of the California Creamery Operators' Association. Religiously he belongs to the Methodist Episcopal Church.

ELMER J. COUEY, M. D. The family represented by E. J. Couey, M. D., of Fresno, is of southern extraction, but was identified with the pioneer history of Illinois and Wisconsin prior to becoming established in California. The doctor's father, Andrew A., a native of Randolph county, Ill., and a farmer by occupation, responded to the first call for volunteers at the outbreak of the Civil war, becoming a member of Company C. Thirtieth Illinois Infantry. After a considerable service under General Grant he accompanied Sherman on the memorable campaign through the South and the march to the sea, during the progress of which he was captured by Confederate soldiers, and for nine months remained a prisoner at Andersonville. At the close of the war he returned to Wisconsin and resumed farm pursuits, remaining in that state until 1886, when he came to California. Settling one and one-half miles west of Fresno, he gave his attention to ranching and the raising of fruit, in which occupations he continued during the remainder of his life. At the time of his death, which occurred November 27, 1903, he was sixty-one years of age. In politics he voted with the Republican party. His father, James F. Couey, was born in Georgia, and at fifteen years of age accompanied his parents to Illinois, then a frontier region beyond the limits of civilization. Later he entered a tract of raw land in Richland county, Wis., and from there in 1884 came to Fresno, where he engaged in farming for some time, but of recent years has lived retired from active cares.

The marriage of Andrew A. Couey united him with Eliza Hartley, who was born in Kentucky and at an early age accompanied her parents to Wisconsin. Since the death of her husband she has continued to make her home on the property which they purchased after coming west. In their family of four children the youngest child and only son was E. J., whose birth occurred in Richland county, Wis., November 25, 1876, and who at the time of coming to California was a boy of ten years. His education was acquired primarily in Wisconsin, but principally in the schools of California, his attendance at the Fresno grammar and high schools being supplemented by a course of study in Healdsburg College. On his return from college he aided his father on the home place for a year, and then entered the St. Helena Sanitarium in Napa county, Cal., from which he was graduated May 25, 1897, as a trained nurse. During the fall of the same year he matriculated in the College of Physicians and Surgeons at San Francisco, where he took the regular course of study, graduating in 1900 with the degree of M. D.

Immediately after his graduation Dr. Couey began the practice of medicine in Fresno. Under appointment by the county board of supervisors, February 1, 1901, he became steward and resident physician at the county hospital, and this position he filled until June 1, 1903, when he resigned to resume private practice. He has his office in the Republican building. Among the members of his profession he has a high standing. For some years he has made a special study of smallpox and other diseases that are characterized by eruptions. In the diagnosis of disease he is careful, painstaking and accurate, never contenting himself with superficial examinations, but penetrating to hidden causes, which, once discovered, are promptly and skillfully brought under control. During 1903 he was honored with the office of president of the Fresno County Medical Society. Other organizations with which he holds membership are the San Joaquin Valley Medical Society, the California State Medical Society, the American Medical Association, the Alumni Association of the College of Physicians and Surgeons of San Francisco, and the Order of Pendo, in which he is medical examiner, besides being medical examiner for the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company. In matters political he gives his influence to the Republican party. His marriage occurred in San Francisco in 1902, and united him with Miss Blanche B. Bodwell, a native of Nebraska, but a resident of California from girlhood. They are the parents of a son, Donald B.

EZRA H. CHAPIN. An enterprising, practical and successful business man of Fresno, Ezra H. Chapin, a well-known liveryman, is a typical representative of the self-made men of our time. He has labored hard from his earliest days, and, notwithstanding reverses and losses that would discourage one of less pluck and grit, he has sturdily pushed his way toward the front, by sheer persistency and earnestness of purpose winning a large measure of success. He was born August 16, 1857, in McHenry county, Ill., of substantial New England ancestry, the Chapin family, it is said, being of Puritan stock.

A native of Massachusetts, Daniel Chapin, Mr. Chapin's father, grew to manhood among the rocks and hills of old New England, but rather than try to obtain a living by tilling the soil learned the trade of carpenter and builder. Migrating westward in 1854, he followed his chosen occupation in McHenry county, Ill., for six years. In 1860, following one of the great wheel-worn tracks across the plains, he came to California, and located in Stockton, where he was employed as a builder and contractor until his death in 1869, at the age of forty-four years. His wife, whose maiden name was Aurelia Stafford, was born in Vermont, the descendant of one of the earlier settlers of Plymouth colony, and a daughter of Gilbert Stafford, who removed from Vermont to North Adams, Mass., where he carried on general farming until his death. She joined her husband, in 1863, in Stockton, bringing her children with her from North Adams, where she had spent the three previous years. She now resides in Oakland, Cal. Of her family of children but two are living, Ezra H., the subject of this sketch; and Stella A., of Oakland.

Leaving Marengo, Ill., his birthplace, when a boy of three years, E. H. Chapin lived for three years in North Adams, Mass., and then, in 1863, came with his mother to Stockton, Cal., where he attended the district school for several terms. Being left fatherless at the age of twelve years, he was forced to help support himself and the other members of the family. Going, therefore, to Stanislaus county, he worked for five years for an uncle, a farmer. At the age of seventeen he rented a ranch lying between Modesto and Ceres, and embarked in business for himself as a grain raiser, from year to year enlarging his operations until he had charge of eight hundred acres of land. In 1886, locating in Berendo, in what was then Fresno county, but was later included within the limits of Madera county, Mr. Chapin purchased six hundred and forty acres of land that was still in its primitive wildness, and in addition rented adjoining land, having in his entire ranch three thousand acres. Buying machinery and implements in large quantities, and enough mules to allow ten or twelve to each team, he sowed his farm to grain, but, unfortunately, the next two years were so dry that the yield was very scant, one hundred and fifty sacks of grain only being harvested the first season, and but one-half as much the ensuing year. At the end of three years, when all of his debts were paid, Mr. Chapin's entire assets consisted of one team of mules. Trading his team and assuming the mortgage he continued farming, likewise working in a sawmill in the mountains, until the mortgage was canceled.

Disposing of his ranch in 1896, Mr. Chapin located on the San Joaquin river, nearly opposite Pollasky, and was there employed in general ranching, including grain and stock raising, and also in teaming in the mountains, for two years. While living there, in 1898, he was nominated on the Republican ticket for supervisor of Madera county, and was elected by a majority of twenty-eight, although the county was a Democratic stronghold. Taking the oath of office in January, 1899, he served with ability and fidelity for four years, during the entire period of his service being chairman of the board. He was likewise chairman of the building committee that erected the Madera county court house, which is one of the finest for its size of any in the state, and one of which the citizens of the county may justly be proud. Entering the employ of the Pacific Construction Company in May, 1902, Mr. Chapin assisted in the building of the Modesto canal, in Stanislaus county, remaining with the company until the completion of the canal, in March, 1903. The following month Mr. Chapin settled in Fresno, and, in company with Lyman Estes, bought the Blackhawk stables, which have since been under the management of the enterprising firm of Estes & Chapin. The livery and boarding stable is 150x200 feet, being one of the largest in the valley, and is well equipped with vehicles of all kinds, and with excellent horses, the sole aim of the proprietors being to please and accommodate their numerous patrons.

In Stanislaus county in 1879, Mr. Chapin married Ella Estes, who was born in Adrian, Mich., a daughter of Albert Estes, a prosperous farmer, living near Madera, Cal. Albert Ezra, the only child of Mr. and Mrs. Chapin, is in business with his father. Politically Mr. Chapin is an earnest advocate of the principles of the Republican party. Fraternally he belongs to the Ancient Order of United Workmen. He is also a member of the Fresno Chamber of Commerce.

HARRY E. GOODWIN. Among the energetic and enterprising young men of Merced county who have selected farming as their vocation in life, and who, judging from present indications, are realizing their anticipations, is Harry E. Goodwin, a successful farmer and dairyman of Dos Palos. Beginning his career at the foot of the ladder, without other resources than his indomitable will and native stock of industry, he has gradually worked his way upward, rising from a humble position to that of one of the representative young men of an intelligent community, and is properly ranked among the self-made men of our times. A son of Samuel Goodwin, he was born December 19, 1870, in Ottumwa, Iowa. His grandfather, Raleigh Goodwin, was born and reared in Ohio. From there he migrated westward, locating first in Indiana, and then in Iowa, where he was a pioneer farmer and stock buyer.

A native of Indiana, Samuel Goodwin was trained to agricultural pursuits, and began life for himself as a farmer in Wapello county, Iowa, where he was an early settler. Finding his land rich in mineral deposits, he opened the first coal mine in that locality, in the town now called Keb, and operated it successfully for several years. Selling out to the Whitebreast Company, he bought land in Calhoun county, Iowa, and embarked in general farming. Coming to California in 1896, he located in Dos Palos, where he purchased two ranches, which he improved. Returning to Iowa in 1898, he located at Dallas Center as a real estate dealer, and is now occupied in the same business at Unionville, Mo. He married Martha West, who was born in Indiana, and died in Iowa. Her father, Samuel West, born in the east, was a pioneer farmer of Wapello county, Iowa. She bore her husband ten children, six of whom grew to years of maturity, Harry E., the second child, being the only one residing in California.

Conrad Myere

Completing his early education in the district schools of Iowa, Harry E. Goodwin began farming when eighteen years of age, and until his marriage was engaged in tilling the soil. The ensuing three years he was employed in coal mining in Wapello county, and then removed to Calhoun county, Iowa, where he rented land, and continued farming. In February, 1895, Mr. Goodwin came to Dos Palos, Cal., and on Lexington avenue purchased twenty acres of raw land, which he at once began to improve. Having leveled, checked and ditched it, he has since carried on farming, raising alfalfa on all but two and one-half acres, which he devotes to fruit growing. He is also carrying on a substantial business as a dairyman, and is much interested in bee culture, having an apiary at his home ranch, and one on the Santa Rita ranch, having three hundred and twenty swarms. Soon after locating here Mr. Goodwin bought thirty-three acres of land adjoining his home farm and having improved it raised alfalfa until disposing of the farm in 1903. In his agricultural operations Mr. Goodwin has met with success. He is a member of the Central California Honey Producers' Association, and is interested in the Rochdale Association.

September 9, 1890, in Manson, Iowa, Mr. Goodwin married Addie Lenhouts, who was born in Milwaukee, Wis., a daughter of Peter Lenhouts. A native of Holland, Peter Lenhouts came with his parents to this country, settling as a pioneer in Wisconsin. During the Civil war he served in a Wisconsin regiment, and afterward removed to Iowa, locating in Calhoun county, where he was engaged in farming, and as a printer, until his death. He married Jennie Orlebeke, who was born in Holland, and came with her parents to Wisconsin, where her father, Henry Orlebeke, whose name was subsequently changed to Ollenbeck, settled first, although he afterward removed to Iowa, where he followed blacksmithing. Of the union of Peter and Jennie (Orlebeke) Lenhouts five children were born, four of whom are living, namely: Henry, of Omaha, Neb.; Mrs. Goodwin; Mrs. Raven, of Dos Palos; and Ralph, of Dos Palos. Mrs. Lenhouts came to the Pacific coast in 1895, and is now a resident of Dos Palos. Mr. and Mrs. Goodwin have one child, Grace Evelyn. In local affairs Mr. Goodwin takes great interest, and is a member of the Board of Trustees of the Dos Palos school district, of which he is president. He is also serving as road overseer. While living in Ottumwa, Iowa, he was made an Odd Fellow, and is now a member and vice-grand of Santa Rita Lodge No. 124, I. O. O. F. He is likewise a member of the Knights of the Maccabees, being commander of his lodge, and is also a member of the Modern Woodmen of America. Mrs. Goodwin is a member and past commander of the Ladies of the Maccabees, and belongs to the Royal Neighbors. In his political affiliations Mr. Goodwin is a Socialist.

CONRAD MYERS. It was in May, 1875, that Conrad Myers arrived in California, settling in Sonoma county, whence in 1876 he removed to Tulare county. When he came to his present ranch, six miles northeast of Selma, in 1878, he found a desert as yet unacquainted with the industry of man, and to encourage him in his settlement, but one house between his own squatter's claim and the town of Fresno. The region was known as the Mendocino district. Mr. Myers has long since seen his property take on the appearance of an advanced agricultural section, and as his sons reached maturity they also bought land, adjoining the homestead, and improved it. Eighty acres were bought at $75 per acre. After selling a portion of the original holding, father and sons still own two hundred acres, one hundred and fifty-three acres of which are set to grapes, and the near-by peach and apricot orchard of six acres yields a liberal income. The balance is devoted to alfalfa, of which three crops are cut each year. Mr. Myers and his sons are among the foremost fruit growers in their immediate neighborhood.

Born in Armstrong county, Pa., January 4, 1832, Mr. Myers is a son of Philip Myers, who was born in Pennsylvania in 1790, and who early settled in Wabash county, Ind. In 1845 the father removed to Barry county, Mo., where he engaged in farming and stock-raising, and where his wife, formerly Margaret Myers, of Pennsylvania, died, after rearing a family of four sons and eight daughters, of whom Conrad is the eleventh child. Mr. Myers was an invalid for many years of his life and in 1875 came to California with his son, later going to Mussel Slough, Kings county, where he died in 1876, at the age of eighty-six. Owing to his father's impaired health young Conrad was obliged to work hard in his youth, as did all of the other children of this large family. At the age of twenty-one he married Hannah Hedrick, a native of Kentucky, and bought a small place about three miles from the home place in Barry county, Mo., where he lived until coming to the coast in 1875. In the meantime he left his farm in the care of his wife and enlisted in the Confederate army in 1862, serving under General Price for three years, or until the capture of that famous general.

In California Mr. Myers has proved something more than a mere money-getter, for he is public-spirited to a large degree, and takes a keen interest in the enterprises and resources which contribute to the wellbeing of this district. He is particularly active in irrigating enterprises, and assisted with the building of the Centerville & Kingsburg ditch, in which he has since sold his interest, and purchased stock in the Church ditch. He is a partner and stockholder in the Palier Co-operative Packing House & Raisin Seeder Company and the Growers Co-operative Winery. Mr. Myers is a Democrat in politics, but has always objected to office-holding. Five of his eight children are living, his wife and three children, Charles Philip, Sarah M. and William Conrad having died several years ago. The children living are Mary C. Matilda, the wife of John Lagrant; Melissa Angelina, the wife of O. D. Berryhill; Orlena Price, the wife of G. D. Nedry; George W., living on the home place and operates his father's farm in connection with his own; C. H., living near his father's place.

A. C. TINNIN. In the days before the railroad had become a recognized possibility as a means of bringing into proximity the east and the west, a multitude of gold-seekers undertook the long and perilous journey through an unknown country, amid hostile Indians, into the El Dorado of their dreams. Though coming somewhat later than many, the hardships of the journey did not fall lighter upon A. C. Tinnin than upon his predecessors of the previous years. The ox-teams slowly wended their way across the plains from his early home in Perry county, Mo., and after eight months brought him to the country of the Golden Gate. Not caring to venture his future in the uncertain occupation of mining, he turned to agriculture as offering a favorable opportunity for securing a start. After two years he drifted into teaming and freighting, which in the days before the building of railroads could be conducted upon an extensive scale and with excellent profits. For five years he worked as a teamster and then settled upon a farm in the Santa Clara valley, but after a few years removed to farm land in Contra Costa county. The year 1869 found him a pioneer on the west side in Merced county, where he took up the raising of grain. During 1876 he purchased one hundred and sixty acres on the upper county road and immediately after purchase checked the land for irrigation, after which he successfully carried on wheat farming and raised large crops of that cereal each year. Though never active in politics he was at all times staunch in his adherence to the Democratic party. His death, which occurred in 1887, removed from the San Joaquin valley one of its honored pioneers and successful farmers.

The marriage of A. C. Tinnin united him with Sarah Bollenger, a native of Perry county, Mo., and now occupying the old homestead with her youngest son, William Henry. She is a member of a pioneer family of the Pacific coast. During 1852 her father, A. Joseph Bollenger, crossed the plains from Missouri and settled in Napa county, later removing to Santa Clara county, where he purchased and tilled a tract of farm land. On going from there to Contra Costa county he homesteaded a tract, on which eventually he became interested in the raising of stock. To obtain needed pasturage for his large herd of cattle and dairy cows he bought vast tracts of range land. A fine orchard and running water made the Bollenger Cañon farm (as the place was called) a desirable property, and when he disposed of it he received a fair advance on the original investment. Returning to Santa Clara county he bought a ranch for $30,000, and ten days later sold it for $60,000. It is needless to state that those were the "boom" days, whose culmination was followed by a reaction in prices almost fatal to the permanent prosperity of the valley. At the time of his death, which occurred in 1884 in Santa Clara county, his possessions were valued at $200,000, the larger part of which was gained through fortunate handling of real estate. In buying and selling few men had more sagacious judgment; his foresight was keen and his knowledge of land values almost remarkable. His wife, Sarah E., died in 1898. Of their four sons and three daughters, one daughter and one son are deceased. At the time the Bollenger family came to California their daughter, Sarah, was a girl of sixteen years, and not long afterward she became the wife of Mr. Tinnin at Napa. Of their union ten children were born and all but one attained maturity. Three daughters, Mrs. Sarah Akins, Mrs. Mary L. Raley and Mrs. Belsora Crittenden, reside in San Francisco. Mrs. Letitia Ewing makes her home at Stockton. Mrs. Ada Hensch lives in Calaveras county, and George is at Copperopolis, the same county. Lee is living at Shandon, San Luis Obispo county. William Henry occupies the homestead in Merced county; and Cora, Mrs. Dalzell, is a resident of Stockton. The sons and daughters, in the various communities where they reside, reflect credit upon the training received from their parents, and by probity of character and progressiveness of spirit have won assured positions in social and business circles.

THEODORE J. REYNOLDS. The name of T. J. Reynolds, late of Dos Palos, but now deceased, is widely and favorably known throughout this section of Merced county, and will long be remembered and honored by all who had the pleasure of his acquaintance. A man of strong and intelligent convictions, honest and upright in his dealings, he won the respect and esteem of all with whom he came in contact, and gained the confidence and good will of the community in which he resided. A native of New York, he was born in May, 1847, in Hartford, Washington county, which was also the birthplace of his father, J. J. Reynolds. A lifelong resident of New York state, J. J. Reynolds turned his attention to agricultural pursuits when young, and continued to till the soil during his active career. He married Abigail Bump, who lived and died in New York, and into their home six children were born, T. J., the subject of this sketch, being the second in order of birth.

Receiving an excellent education in the public schools of his native county, T. J. Reynolds was subsequently for a number of years engaged in teaching near Hartford, N. Y. In 1866, shortly after his marriage, Mr. Reynolds settled as a farmer in Greenville, N. Y., where he resided twelve years. Removing with his family to Harvard, Clay county, Neb., in 1878, he bought one hundred and twenty acres of railroad land, from which he improved a good ranch, erecting thereon a substantial set of buildings. Renting his Nebraska farm in 1882 he spent the following two years in New York, being there engaged in agricultural pursuits. Returning to Nebraska in 1884, Mr. Reynolds kept a hotel in Harvard for a year, after which, in 1885, he traded his land in that vicinity for a farm in Hamilton county, near Giltner, becoming possessor of two hundred and twenty acres of fine farming land, on which he lived and labored successfully for five years. Selling that ranch March 6, 1890, Mr. Reynolds came immediately to California, locating in Dos Palos. Buying sixty acres of land lying three-fourths of a mile south of the city, he built a residence, and started a nursery, intending to settle here permanently. The land, however, proved unsuitable for fruit growing, and Miller & Lux exchanged that ranch for sixty acres of land, situated on the avenue which now bears his name, at the corner of Cornelia avenue, in the New Colony. Leveling and checking the land, Mr. Reynolds set out an orchard, and was here actively and profitably engaged in fruit raising and dairying until his death, in August, 1901. He was interested in the leading reform movements of the day, and in his political preferences was an ardent Prohibitionist. He belonged to the Knights of the Macabees, and was a member of the Christian Church.

March 12, 1866, in New York state, Mr. Reynolds married Jane E. Brayton, who was born in that state, as was her father, William Brayton, Jr. Her grandfather, William Brayton, Sr., was a farmer by occupation, and spent the larger portion of his life in New York. William Brayton, Jr., succeeded to the occupation of his ancestors, and during his sixty-eight years was engaged in general farming. He was a man of prominence in his community, and a valued member of the Baptist Church. He married Maria Hoyt, who was born in Virginia, and died in New York. Ten children were born of their marriage, five of whom grew to years of maturity, Jane E., now Mrs. Reynolds, being the eighth child in order of birth. One son, John, a resident of Hartford, N. Y., served in a New York regiment during the Civil war. Since the death of her husband, Mrs. Reynolds has resided on the home farm, which she rents to her son Harry. She now owns forty acres of land, fifteen acres of which she devotes to the culture of fruit, while on the remainder she raises alfalfa. Four children blessed the union of Mr. and Mrs. Reynolds, namely: Abbie M., wife of V. W. Herman, of Stockton, Cal.; Harry T., having charge of the home ranch; Emma B., of San Jose; and Truman E., living at home. Harry T. Reynolds, the oldest son, married Bonnie Hoyle, a native of Tennessee, and formerly a teacher in the public schools, and they have two children, Vesta and Lois. Mrs. Reynolds is a woman of culture and refinement, highly esteemed by all, and is a consistent member of the Christian Church.

CHARLES FOREMAN, D. D. S. Numbered among the successful members of the dental profession is Charles Foreman, a well-known dentist of Dos Palos. Noted for his skill and thorough knowledge of his work, he has acquired an enviable reputation for honesty and ability, and has here built up a large and remunerative practice. He was for some years actively interested in agricultural pursuits, and still owns a nice dairy farm and home on Palm avenue. A native of Iowa, he was born April 1, 1866, in Pottawattamie county, about sixteen miles north of Council Bluffs. His father, Mason Foreman, was born and reared in old Virginia. Moving to Pottawattamie county, Iowa, in 1854, he improved a farm, and was there engaged in stock and grain raising until his death. His wife, who was born in Virginia, her maiden name being Sarah Rodgers, died on the Iowa farm, in 1873. Of the twelve children that she bore her husband, nine grew to years of maturity, and eight are now living, Charles, the eleventh child in order of birth, being the only one on the Pacific coast.

Brought up in Iowa, Charles Foreman began life for himself when but ten years old, having been left motherless when but seven years of age. He worked as a chore boy on a farm, and attended the short terms of the district school for six years, and then removed to Thayer county, Neb., where he continued as a farm laborer for two years. The ensuing two years he was similarly engaged in Concordia, Cloud county, Kans., after which he returned to Iowa. Settling in Harrison county, he purchased one hundred acres of land, from which he improved a farm, carrying it on until 1891, during the last year being also employed as a barber. Coming from there to California, Mr. Foreman bought a lot in the original colony of Dos Palos, and built a small hotel, which he carried on for two years, at the same time working at the barber's trade. When the site of the colony was changed to its present location, he purchased forty acres of land on Palm avenue, moved his house from its first site to his new possessions, and having rebuilt his residence began the improvement of his land, putting the larger part of it in alfalfa and setting out a small orchard. He embarked in the dairy business, in which he was quite successful. Taking up the study of dentistry under Dr. George Monroe, he completed his studies with a well-known dentist of San Francisco, and beginning the practice of his profession at Colony Center in 1896 has continued here since, being deservedly popular throughout the community, where he has a rapidly increasing patronage. In addition to his other duties, he is engaged in a general real estate business.

In Harrison county, Iowa, Dr. Foreman married Lizzie Ross, a native of that county, and they are the parents of six children, namely: Roy, Ross, Charles, Frank, Florence and Evard. The doctor is a staunch adherent of the Republican party, and is a member of the Fraternal Aid; and of the Modern Woodmen of America. Mrs. Foreman is a member of the Church of Latter Day Saints.

JOHN CHATTEN. Six miles northeast of Visalia on the Millwood road lies the farm which for years has been the home of Mr. Chatten and which each year produces crops of alfalfa, corn and grain, as well as furnishing pasturage for the fine herd of milch cows. The homestead includes one hundred and seventy-two and one-half acres on Elbow creek, with adequate irrigation facilities by means of the Wutchumna ditch, in which company he is a director. Though not entirely under cultivation, every acre of the land is tillable. In addition, Mr. Chatten owns a quarter section of adjoining land which is utilized for grazing purposes. The family residence, built in 1903, is a substantial structure with modern improvements and makes a comfortable home.

A resident of California since 1868, Mr. Chat-ten is a native of Canada and a descendant of English progenitors. His grandfather, Thomas Chatten, brought the family to America from Norfolk county, England, and settled in Ontario. There the father, Robert Chatten, engaged in farming near Colborne, remaining in the same locality until his death, in 1896, at seventy-eight years of age. During early manhood he married Betsey Doe, who was born in Ontario and died there at seventy-two years of age. Of English ancestry, she was the daughter of James Doe, an Englishman, who crossed the ocean to Canada and became a farmer in Ontario. Among nine children (all of whom attained mature years and seven are still living) John Chatten was next to the oldest child and the oldest son. He was born near Colborne, Northumberland county, Ontario, December 8, 1848, and grew to manhood in the midst of discouraging conditions. Nature had not richly blessed the locality where he lived. A livelihood was earned only by the most arduous labor. After reaching the age of eleven years he was taken out of school and given farm work, one of his most laborious tasks being the picking of stones.

An uncle, Richard Chatten (now living in Visalia), had come to California during the exciting period of 1849, and reports sent to Ontario by him contained glowing accounts of the climate here which differed so radically from the bleak and stormy winters of Ontario. In this way John Chatten was led to leave his childhood's home and seek the Pacific coast country. For two years after arriving in the state he worked for his uncle, but after his marriage he took up independent farming and stock-raising on a tract of one hundred and fifty acres belonging to his uncle. A year later he bought an unimproved tract, which he has since transformed into an attractive homestead. Of recent years he has made a specialty of dairying and to facilitate this work he utilizes a separator. More than ordinary success has rewarded his efforts as a farmer, for he came to this country with nothing and now possesses a valuable property. In his labors he has had the aid of an efficient helpmate. His wife, formerly Miss Celestie Reynolds, was born in Iowa and was brought across the plains by her parents when seven months old. Her entire life in California has been spent in Tulare county. The children born of their union are as follows: Wesley, who follows the engraving business in Portland, Ore.; Arthur, a farmer in the vicinity of his father's home; Wilmot and Ray, who are in Portland; Fred and Elsie, who remain with their parents. The family attend the Christian Church at Visalia and Mrs. Chatten is a member of that organization. In political belief Mr. Chatten supports the Republican party. His activity in local affairs was displayed through efficient service some years ago as a member of the county central committee of his party, while his interest in educational affairs caused him to accept the office of school trustee of the Elbow district, an office that he filled efficiently for thirty years, meanwhile aiding in building a schoolhouse and in placing the work of teaching upon a broad and solid basis. Other praiseworthy movements have received the benefit of his aid and counsel, and he is justly recognized as one of the leading men of his locality.

WILLIAM DE LAGRANGE. Distinguished alike for the honored French ancestry from which he is descended and for his own noteworthy life record, William De LaGrange occupies a substantial position among the most respected and highly esteemed citizens of Selma. As a horticulturist, and a man of mechanical skill and ingenuity, he has, during the past quarter of a century, been an important factor in promoting the industrial interests of Fresno county. A son of the late Omie De LaGrange, he was born January 1, 1840, in Washington county, Ohio. His paternal great-grandfather, also named Omie De LaGrange, came to this country at the beginning of the Revolutionary war as an officer on the staff of Marquis de Lafayette, whose sister he had previously married. He was a highly educated man, and after serving in the army until the close of the war received from the United States Government three tracts of land, located in different parts of New York state. He subsequently sent to France for his family, and took up his residence in this country. He died in France, while on a visit to his old home. His son, Barnabas De LaGrange, Mr. De LaGrange's grandfather, came with the family to the United States, locating in Saratoga, N. Y., where he followed teaching for many years. Removing to Ohio in 1830, he settled near Marietta, and subsequently resided there until his death, at the venerable age of eighty-two years.

Born in Saratoga, N. Y., Omie De LaGrange was there reared and educated. In early life he removed to Washington county, Ohio, locating near Marietta, where he became owner of a large and valuable farm. In addition to overseeing the management of his farm, he was a noted contractor and builder, and filled many government contracts in Ohio and West Virginia, building canals and other public works, and becoming a large property owner in both states. In 1892 he came from Parkersburg, W. Va., to California, and thereafter made his home with his son William, in Selma, living here until his death, in 1900, at the advanced age of eighty-six years. He married Elizabeth McClain, who was born in Pennsylvania, and died in Parkersburg, W. Va., at the age of seventy-four years. She bore him eight children, four sons and four daughters, William being the oldest child.

After receiving a limited education in the common schools, William De LaGrange worked with his father as carpenter and builder in Ohio and Virginia. Enlisting, in 1861, in Company H, Eleventh Virginia Volunteer Infantry, he served as musician in a martial band of twelve members for two years, being employed along a line of sharpshooters. At the expiration of his term of enlistment, in 1863, Mr. De LaGrange engaged in steamboating on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, serving as pilot on the Chesapeake, the Emma Graham, the Mountain Boy, and other large steamers. Coming to the Pacific coast in 1880, Mr. De LaGrange purchased forty acres of land lying one mile southwest of Selma, in Fresno county, and began the improvement of a ranch. In 1884 he was made foreman of the work of building the head gates, bridges and drops of the seventy-six canals on Fowler switch, being thus employed for about a year. Selling his ranch in 1890, Mr. De LaGrange removed to his present estate, which lies four miles northeast of Selma, on the Centerville and Kingsburg ditch. Here he owns a fine orchard and vineyard of twenty acres, both of which produce large quantities of fruit and grapes thriving well under his skillful care. He also carries on an extensive and lucrative business in boring wells and installing pumping plants, using both gasoline and steam power.

In 1870, while living in West Virginia, Mr. De LaGrange married Virginia DeWitt, a native of that state, and they are the parents of four children, namely: Ada Ethel, wife of William Unger; William, of Bakersfield, an electrician, in the employ of the Edison Electric Company; John; and Omie. In politics Mr. De LaGrange is a staunch Republican, and in religion is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

CAPT. ROBERT M. ASKIN. Although not one of the early settlers of Visalia, the business interests and the high character of his citizenship place Captain Askin among the leading residents of the city. Travel and extensive reading have made him familiar with many portions of the United States, but among them all California is his favorite state, and he believes its business openings to be as substantial as its climate is fair. In business his specialties are plumbing and iron work and along these lines he has built up an extensive and important trade among the people of Visalia and Tulare county.

Captain Askin was born in Dublin, Ireland, April 10, 1838, and received his education principally in the King's hospital of his native city. His father, John Askin, was born in England, and under the supervision of the grandfather learned the trade of plumber, which he followed from the time of his removal to Ireland until he died. After leaving England for the Emerald Isle he married Sarah Sophia Shea, a native of Dublin. They became the parents of five children, of whom two sons and two daughters attained mature years, Robert M. being third in order of birth. Hoping to find more advantageous openings in the new world than his native isle offered, in November, 1852, he crossed the ocean to the United States and joined an uncle at Trenton, Canada, where he served an apprenticeship to the tinner's trade. From there in 1854 he went to Jefferson county, N. Y., and after working at his trade for two years there, joined another uncle in New York City.

On settling in Missouri in 1859, Captain Askin found employment in St. Louis, but soon accompanied a Mr. Crippin to Steelville, Crawford county, Mo., where he started a tinsmith's shop. Soon after his commencing in business at that place the Civil war opened. September 6, 1861, found him accepted in Company E, Phelps' regiment, where he served for six months, meanwhile witnessing the battle of Pea Ridge. On the expiration of his time he was honorably discharged. August 14, 1862, he re-enlisted in Company E, Thirty-second Missouri Infantry, as a private, but in October of the same year was made lieutenant, and April 14, 1864, received a commission as captain. During the early period of his service he was under General Grant, but from 1863 until the close of the war he took part in the campaigns under Sherman. It is a noteworthy fact that, while he bore a brave part in thirty-two general engagements, he never missed a roll-call or a meal with his company, and was injured but once, that being a mere surface wound made by a ball while he was charging on a battery at Jonesboro, Ga. July 18, 1865, he was mustered out at Louisville, Ky., one hundred and twenty-six members of the regiment being mustered out at that time, of whom twenty-six belonged to his own company.

When the arms of a soldier were laid aside for the more peaceful equipments of commercial life Captain Askin returned to Steelville and took up work as a tinner, also hauled hardware of all kinds. In 1870 he removed to Cuba, Crawford county, Mo., and from there in 1878 went to Salem, Dent county, where he carried a large stock of stoves, hardware and house furnishing goods, and also officiated as postmaster under President Harrison. In the various places of his residence he was an active worker in the Republican party and for one term he served as presiding justice of the county court. For twenty years he was one of the most influential business men of Salem, but finally closed out his interests in that city and removed to California in 1899, since which year Visalia has been his home and business headquarters.

The first marriage of Captain Askin took place February 22, 1866, and united him with Clara Alice Jameson, who was born in Missouri, and died at Cuba, that state. Four children were born of that union, namely: Charles Robert and Mary Catherine, both deceased; William C., who still lives in Missouri; and John Herbert, who is connected with his father in business at Visalia. The present wife of Captain Askin, whom he married at Cuba, Mo., April 12, 1876, was Frances Amelia Shepard, a native of New York. The children of this union are Arthur Wesley, Adney Horace, Mervyn Leroy, Matie Amelia and Flora Dell. Before coming to California Captain Askin was active in the lodge and commandery of Masons at Salem, Mo., and the Ancient Order of United Workmen at the same place. For years he has been deeply interested in the activities of the Grand Army of the Republic, and when the first post was organized at Salem he became a charter member and was honored by being chosen its first commander. After coming west he transferred his membership to the Gen. George Wright Post No. 111, department of California and Nevada, of Visalia. In religious connections he and his family are members of the Episcopal Church.

WILLIAM HENRY TINNIN. Although a native of the same locality as that in which he now makes his home, Mr. Tinnin has traveled much throughout the west and by observation of the soil, climate and peoples of different regions, has not only become conversant with all of the Pacific coast country, but has deepened his original conviction that the San Joaquin valley has a soil and a future surpassed by none. The farm where he was born in 1871 is situated in Merced county, five miles from his present home, but at seven years of age he accompanied his father, A. C. Tinnin, and other members of the family to the farm two miles south of Newman, which since then has always been considered his home, although business interests have taken him into other parts of the country and abroad. The district schools afforded him fair advantages for acquiring an education. Possessing an excellent memory and splendid mental endowments he has acquired a breadth of information that renders his suggestions and opinions valuable. At the time of his father's death he was sixteen years of age, and although so young he nevertheless afterward managed the home ranch with a wisdom of judgment not always surpassed by men of middle age.

W. G. Pennebaker

After having remained in charge of the home place for a long term, in 1899 Mr. Tinnin went to Honolulu with a large number of mules for B. T. McCullough, and while on the Sandwich Islands he received two cargoes of mules, which he sold at fair prices. On his return to California in 1900, he became a California buyer for the Western Meat Company of San Francisco, having, in addition to his territory in this state, the supervision of the buying in Oregon and Nevada. After two years he resigned and returned to the old homestead, which he has since rented from his mother. The farm is one of the finest in all of this region. It consists of one hundred and sixty acres, all under irrigation, well adapted to alfalfa, which he makes his principal crop. In his pasture are fifty horses and one hundred and fifty head of cattle, ninety of these being milch cows, of high-grade Durham, Holstein and Jersey breeds. The dairy business is one of his principal interests and has been conducted with profit. When the first creamery was built in the valley, under the supervision of the New Era Creamery Company, he became one of the company's first stockholders and at this writing is a member of the board of directors. In addition to other interests he has engaged in dealing in and shipping hogs to the Western Meat Company. Fraternally he is connected with the Ancient Order of United Workmen and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. By his marriage in Petaluma to Miss Josephine Johnson, who was born in San Francisco, he has two children, Roswell A. and Susie L. While he is scarcely yet in life's prime he has attained a success that is as commendable as it is gratifying. In movements looking toward the development of local resources he has proved to be enterprising and liberal, enthusiastically co-operating with public-spirited projects and progressive plans originated for the benefit of the community.

WILLIAM G. PENNEBAKER. With the honors of a courageous pioneer and Civil war veteran Mr. Pennebaker is quietly passing at Visalia the afternoon of a very active existence, whose labors have brought to him a gratifying degree of prosperity and success. He is a member of an old Kentucky family, but himself is a native of Owen county, Ind., and was born January 22, 1836, being a son of William and Lucinda (Findley) Pennebaker, natives respectively of Kentucky and Tennessee. As early as 1835 his father became a pioneer farmer of Indiana, where he made his home successively in Monroe, Owen and Putnam counties. After six years in the county last named he went to Iowa in 1846, settling fourteen miles northwest of Burlington, where he engaged in farming. Four years were spent in that locality and he then settled in the southwestern part of the same state, in Wayne county. During 1868, he and his wife accompanied their son, William G., across the plains with teams and remained with him until they died.

In a family consisting of five daughters and three sons William G. Pennebaker was the youngest son and next to the youngest child. Owing to the frequent removals of the family and the necessary difficult task of clearing each farm as they settled thereon, he had little opportunity to obtain an education and his entire attendance at school was limited to three terms of three months each. However, being a man of quick observation and a wide range of reading, he has acquired a breadth of knowledge not always secured from text-books, and in the school of experience his education has been thorough. For some years after reaching manhood he continued to cultivate a farm in Iowa, but in 1868 came to California and settled near Farmersville, Tulare county, where he bought two hundred acres of land. The tilling of the soil was made subsidiary to the raising of stock, and the crops secured from the land were used for feeding his cattle, hogs and sheep. For a long period he successfully conducted a stock business on this property, but in 1891 moved to a farm of one hundred acres, where he not only raised cattle, but also gave some attention to the fruit industry. Eventually disposing of the property, he purchased a fruit farm of forty acres one mile southwest of Visalia, and here engages in raising peaches and prunes. Since March of 1901 he has made Visalia his home, but, while retired from active labors, he still superintends his various interests, and at the same time aids in movements for the benefit of his home town.

The Republican party has received the allegiance of Mr. Pennebaker ever since its organization. When the war commenced between the north and south his sympathies were at once aroused in behalf of the Union. Early in 1862 he enlisted as a member of Company I, Fourth Iowa Infantry, assigned to the Army of the Tennessee, in which for two years he served as a hospital steward. During the period of his service he was present at thirteen battles. When the war ended he was mustered out of the service, receiving an honorable discharge at Louisville, Ky., in July, 1865, after which he returned to his Iowa farm. In fraternal connections, he holds membership with the Ancient Order of United Workmen. For about forty-five years he has been a member of the Baptist Church, a supporter of its services and a firm believer in its doctrines. While living in Iowa Mr. Pennebaker was united in marriage with Louisa Jemison, who was born in Indiana and died in California during the year 1880. Nine children were born of their union, of whom seven are living, all married and established in homes of their own. They are named as follows: Mrs. Sarah E. Rockwell; Laura, wife of W. F. Pennebaker; Sherman T., of Exeter, Cal.; Mrs. Lenora Thomas; William M., of Redondo; and Carl G. and Cora, who are twins; the latter is the wife of Hugh Clotfelter. Bloom F. and one other child are deceased. Mr. Pennebaker's present wife was Martha A. Jones, a daughter of H. D. Jones, a native of Arkansas, who came to California in 1869 and settled in Tulare county.

C. E. BOYNTON, M. D., physician and surgeon of Los Banos, Cal., was born in Groveland, Essex county, Mass., March 16, 1860, and is the only representative of his family on the Pacific coast. His family has long been represented in the New England states. The founder of the name in America was William Boynton, born in East Riding, Yorkshire, England, in 1606, and who came to Essex county, Mass., in 1638. He became a man of affairs in the colonies, acquiring wealth and governmental influence. His son, Joshua Boynton, was born in Rowley, Mass., March 10, 1646, and in 1673 removed to a farm in Newbury, Mass. The next generation was represented by a Joshua, born in 1679, who married Mary Gerrish Dale, and their son Enoch was born in 1727. Enoch was a fisherman and farmer, and served his country in the battle of Louisburg. Enoch, Jr., was born on the old Boynton homestead in 1748, and married Abigail Tarring, and their son, Captain Methusaleh, who was born in 1777, was a sailor and captain of a vessel. He attained distinction in the war of 1812, and was noted for his great physical strength. He married Abigail Dodge, and their son, Enoch, was born in Newburyport, Mass., June 12, 1816. Enoch was a man of courage and strong convictions, and as early as 1836 was stanchly in favor of the abolition of slavery. He married Charlotte Gage Kimball, born in Bradford, Mass., a daughter of George Kimball, of old Massachusetts stock, who died in that state about 1862, at the age of sixty-eight. Thus is traced the American occupation of the family, yet record has been kept of the Boyntons since the time of William the Conqueror, at which time baronets and peers maintained the family prestige, one of the soldiers having been Bartholemew de Boynton, who, in turn, owed his lineage to the vikings of the northland.

Until his seventeenth year Dr. Boynton lived in Groveland, Mass., when owing to the death of his father, he was obliged to earn his own living. At this time he had not a cent in the world, and the position of deck-hand, offered him by a considerate employer, was readily accepted. His education was a matter entirely of his own getting, for while working he walked to Amherst College and back, studied diligently as only boys spurred by necessity and poverty are apt to do, and in time worked his way through the Massachusetts Agricultural College, graduating in 1881 with the degree of B.S. In 1881 he began traveling through the middle states, continuing his studies at various seats of learning, finally entering the Orange Street Medical College in Syracuse, N. Y., from which he received his professional degree in 1888. A student of more than ordinary application and resource, he carried away the highest honors of his class, and was appointed medical superintendent of the Onondaga Insane Asylum near Syracuse. Holding the same for eighteen months, he came west to Wyoming in 1890, practiced medicine and surgery at Almy and Redcañon, and in the mines near Evanston. A year later he located in Cathlamet, Wash., on the Columbia river, later practicing in the islands of Puget Sound, taking his way from one island to another in a rowboat. His next location was Portland, Ore., and later for three years he was located in Polk county, that state. Coming to San Francisco, he practiced for a time, and then, through a friend, Dr. J. A. Anderson, learned of the excellent opportunity awaiting an ambitious practitioner in Los Banos.

From the start he was successful in Los Banos, and at the end of six months had a creditable and paying practice. Continuing here during 1896-97, he then went to Smithfield, Utah, where he succeeded for a year, but owing to the high altitude was obliged to make a change of location. Then he practiced in Dungeness, Clallam county, Wash., but not liking the place he located in Hamilton, Wash., meeting with success. He next returned to Smithfield, Utah, for a time, but soon after decided to locate permanently in Los Banos, reaching here in 1901. Two years here proved both profitable and pleasant, in the meantime a petition had been signed by the people of Smithfield, calling attention to the favorable impression he had made in that town, and requesting his return. Accordingly he shifted his field of operations, but again finding the altitude too high, he sold out and came back to Los Banos in May, 1904. Since then he has strengthened his hold upon the hearts and minds of the people of this town, and is conducting a practice in every way worthy the best tenets of medical science, having before him a career in which continued success is happily assured. Dr. Boynton has an office equipped with a static machine and the most modern of medical and surgical appliances, and avails himself of the latest and most practical innovations evolved from the highest professional authorities. He is a Republican in politics, and is an ordained elder in the Church of the Latter Day Saints.

Mrs. Boynton ranks with the public-spirited and capable women of California, being an orator of acknowledged strength and persuasiveness, and a power in the ranks of the Republican party. With Mrs. Foster she stumped Utah for President McKinley, and undoubtedly was the means of securing that territory to the Republicans. Before her marriage she was Lucretia Houston Hall, daughter of a physician, and the heir on her mother's side to mental endowments of a high order. Her mother was a medical practitioner and scientist, and did much for the west along these advanced lines.

E. T. DIXON. The distinction of being the oldest established druggist in the city of Merced is not the only claim upon the consideration of his fellow townsmen earned by E. T. Dixon. That the town exists at all, taking its place among the flourishing communities of the county of that name, is because such men as Mr. Dixon have known what was required for its building, and have taken the initiative in its foremost industries and improvements. From the time of its incorporation his name has been associated with its political, social, educational, and moral welfare, and there is scarcely a phase of its life which has not been benefited by his strong and practical views, if not active co-operation.

Born in Jackson, Miss., November 13, 1847, Mr. Dixon comes of a family which had its representatives among the earliest settlers of Virginia, where his father, Judge Richard L. Dixon, was born in Abingdon, and where his grandfather, Henry St. John Dixon, was born, and eventually enlisted in the war of 1812. Henry Dixon owned a large plantation in Virginia, but after his son had become established in Mississippi, he spent his last years in the latter state. Judge Dixon was a typical southerner, but his success savors somewhat of the energy of the north. As a lad he bade adieu to the plantation in Virginia, and with naught save what he could carry in a bundle, started on horseback across the mountains to Mississippi, where, in Jackson, his readiness to work and ability won him a position in the county clerk's office. As opportunity offered he studied law and was admitted to practice in the courts of Mississippi, eventually being elected judge of Washington county, a position maintained for fourteen years. In 1870 he came to what is now Madera county, Cal., and after farming four years, engaged in legal practice in Fresno, until his death, at the age of seventy-three years. He was a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and at times during his life was active in politics, filling, besides the office of judge, that of provost-marshal of Washington county, in the Department of the Mississippi. His wife, formerly Julia Phillips, a native of Jackson, Miss., and a member of an old southern family, died in Fresno at an advanced age. There were seven children in his family, of whom H. S., an attorney of Fresno, and a soldier in the Twenty-eighth Mississippi Volunteer Cavalry during the Civil war, died in Sausalito; J. P., deceased, was a farmer of Kern county, and served in the same regiment with his brother during the war; Edward T.; Louise, who married G. W. Mordecai, of Madera county; W. L., surveyor of Bakersfield; L. L., engaged in the express business in San Francisco; and J. R., a retired farmer of Madera.

Edward T. Dixon was reared on his father's large plantation near Greenville, known as Sycamore, Washington county, Miss., and located on Deer creek. The peaceful existence to which he was accustomed was broken into by the Civil war, which necessitated his taking refuge in Alabama, while his brothers departed to the scene of hostilities. There were no schools in operation during the war, and after the establishment of peace he supplemented his rather meager common-school education by tuition from a private teacher for a couple of years. In 1867, at the age of nineteen, he began to learn the drug business in Greenville, and in 1869 came to California and located in Fresno county, where he entered one hundred and sixty acres of land, at the same time homesteading an equal amount. Engaging in sheep raising until 1872, he finally sold his land to Mr. Mordecai, and February 28, 1872, removed to the present site of Merced, and was present at the first sale of lots in the town. He himself purchased a lot on Front street, and, after erecting the first drug store in the city, continued the ownership and management of the same up to the present time. The old structure was replaced by one more modern in 1901, the new store being twenty-five by sixty feet in dimensions, and equipped with the innumerable detail which makes a drug establishment an attractive as well as necessary place of business.

Having a keen insight into the future of Merced, he early invested in real estate, both for a home and for business purposes, and among the substantial undertakings, built, with Dr. H. N. Rucker, the Baltic Building on the corner of Sixteenth and K streets, with a frontage of fifty feet, and two stories high. Assisting in the incorporation of the city, he was a member and the president of its first and second board of trustees; he was school trustee two terms, and superintendent of schools of Merced county for two terms, of three and four months each. He has always taken a keen interest in the cause of education, and the admirable system at the disposal of the rising generation of today is largely due to his advocacy of thoroughness in scholars and competency on the part of teachers. For years he was chairman of the board of trustees of Merced Lodge No. 208, I. O. O. F., of Merced, and is past chief patriarch of the Encampment, a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen and Ancient Order of Foresters. In religious belief he is an Episcopalian. Mr. Dixon's high standing as a business man of Merced is well earned, for he has not only made a success of his drug enterprise, but has demonstrated his knowledge of banking finance to the satisfaction of all concerned. He was one of the organizers and the first vice-president of the First National Bank of Merced, remaining in the same capacity when it was known as the Commercial & Savings Bank, and also after it was reorganized into the Commercial Bank of Merced. He resigned the position in January, 1904, but still continues a stockholder.

Through his marriage in Napa county, this state, with Minnie Ralston, Mr. Dixon became allied with another pioneer family of the state, Clark and Eliza Ralston having settled here in the pioneer days. Mr. Ralston has survived the changes which have come to the coast country during the past half a century, and is now living retired in Livingston, alert and active notwithstanding his fourscore and four years. Seven children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Dixon, of whom Florence, a graduate of the San Jose normal, is engaged in educational work in Merced; Julia is a student, class of 1906, in the University of California; Rucker, a bookkeeper in Merced, is a graduate of the commercial department of the high school; James P. died in childhood; William, Richard and Mary, remain at home. Mr. Dixon is a man of earnest and positive nature, of absolute fearlessness in matters of right and wrong, and of noble characteristics which bind to him for all time the friends which pass his way.

WILLIAM HALL HAMMOND. As president of the Mt. Whitney Power Company William Hall Hammond is sustaining the reputation for business ability and judgment, energy and unusual talent, won by him in the earlier part of his career in Tulare county. This project, which has felt the impetus of a master hand, was set in motion in 1807, when the purchase of the location and water rights on Kaweah was made; in September of the following year the building was begun, and in July, 1899, the power was set in motion and the city of Visalia was lighted. The plant is located thirty-five miles east of Visalia on the Kaweah, where it is to be found the finest water power in the state. The first plant put in is known as No. 1, and has a capacity of two thousand horse-power; it is equipped with Doble Tangential wheels, and has a fall of thirteen hundred feet, brought down in a twenty-two-inch steel pipe. The second plant, known as No. 2, was put in a mile below, water being taken from the middle fork of the Kaweah, and this has a capacity of twenty-one hundred horse-power, the fall being less, but the volume greater. The two together have a capacity of forty-one hundred horse-power, the water returning to the stream above all ditches for irrigation of the valley below. It is carried down by wires and distributed through the county by sub-stations. They now furnish light and power to Visalia, Tulare, Portersville, Lindsay and Exeter. The third plant, which is to succeed the Globe Light and Power Company, lately purchased by the Mt. Whitney Power Company, will be located on the Tule river, twenty miles above Portersville, and is to have a capacity of twenty-five hundred horse-power. In nine months over one-half million feet of lumber were sawed for the flumes for the first plants, which were conducted for a year by Mr. Hammond himself. In December, 1899, the Mt. Whitney Power Company was incorporated with a capital of $1,000,000, and with Mr. Hammond as president. The main office is located in Visalia in the Brown building. This is an achievement which has brought to Mr. Hammond much deserved credit and placed him prominently among the financiers of the county.

The Hammond family came originally from Kent county, England, the first immigrant to America locating in Maryland. In that state William Hammond was born, grew to manhood and engaged in business. In 1851 he came to California and two years later died in this state. His son, Richard P. Hammond, was born near Hagerstown, Md., received his preliminary education in that vicinity and graduated from West Point. He served as a major in the Mexican war, after which he resigned from the army and came to California in 1849. He located in San Francisco and in 1857 became port collector for that city. He subsequently became identified with the Southern Pacific Railroad and for many years served as president of the California Pacific Railroad Company. He was very prominent in the municipal life of San Francisco, for fifteen years serving as president of the board of police commissioners, as well as taking an active interest in all movements calculated to advance the general welfare. In 1851 he was speaker of the house of representatives and thoroughly demonstrated while in that position the versatile talents which made of him so valuable a citizen in the formation of a new statehood. He died in San Francisco in 1891, at the age of seventy-one years and is buried in Oakland. He was a valued member of the California Pioneers of San Francisco, and also acted as regent of the University of California. His wife was in maidenhood Sallie Hays, of Tennessee, and daughter of Harmon Hays, who died in that state, and sister of Col. Jack Hays. She died at her home in San Francisco in 1867. Of her four sons and two daughters, two sons and one daughter are living. Richard P., a prominent civil engineer, was United States surveyor general, and was president of the Golden Gate Park Commission; he died in San Francisco. John Hays, the celebrated mining engineer, is now a resident of New York City; Harry, a successful attorney, died in San Francisco; and William Hall is the subject of this review.

Born in San Francisco September 25, 1857, William Hall Hammond was reared to young manhood in his native city. He was prepared for college in New Haven, after his graduation from the Hopkins grammar school entering Yale University, where he studied for two years. Returning to California he entered the University of California, from which he was graduated in 1879 with the degree of A.B., in the same class with Governor Pardee. After his graduation he came to Tulare county and engaged in farming and stock-raising five miles east of Tulare. This he continued for several years, when he located in Visalia and engaged in the abstract and real estate business with John F. Jordan, which was incorporated under the title of Visalia Abstract Company. Although he has taken up other lines of endeavor, Mr. Hammond is still interested in this business and retains his connection with it. For a time he also took some interest in horticultural pursuits. In 1892 he was elected on the Democratic ticket county clerk by a large majority, and was re-elected for a second term, holding the office from January, 1893, to January, 1899. Refusing a further candidacy he entered upon the accomplishment of the project which has won for him large financial returns, wide commendation and the added esteem and respect of all who have known him. In addition to these extensive interests he is also identified with the Visalia Manufacturing Company, the Visalia Steam Laundry Company, the Kaweah Lemon Company, and the First National Bank, of all of which he is a director, giving to each interest the energy and ability characteristic of all his efforts.

In Visalia Mr. Hammond was united in marriage with Miss May Brown, a native of this city, and the daughter of S. C. Brown. They are the parents of two children, William H., Jr., student of the high school here, and May, a student in Miss Head's School at Berkeley. A strong Democrat politically, Mr. Hammond has taken an active interest in the promotion of the principles he endorses, being an ex-member of the county committee and also of the state central committee. For several terms he has filled the office of mayor of Visalia and has also served on the school board for several terms. In 1883 he was elected to the office of county supervisor, discharging the duties acceptably for one term. Always an active figure in the commercial life of the city, he has served as a member of the Board of Trade since its organization, and is associated with the Visalia Improvement Association. Fraternally he is prominent, having been made a Mason in Visalia Lodge No. 128, and now belongs to Visalia Chapter No. 44, R. A. M., in which he is past high priest; Visalia Commandery No. 26, K. T.; Islam Temple, N. M. S.; and Oakland Consistory, being a Thirty-second Degree Mason. He belongs also to Visalia Parlor No. 19, N. S. G. W., and Knights of Pythias. He is in all things a citizen who bears the impress of talent, energy and perseverance, coupled with dignity of purpose and integrity of aim which have won for him the esteem and confidence of his fellow-townsmen and brought about a personal success neither lessened nor enhanced by the financial returns which his efforts have given him.

ASA L. BARTHOLOMEW. An old pioneer and a worthy and esteemed citizen of Merced county, Asa L. Bartholomew is still pursuing his agricultural labors on his ranch of four hundred and eighty acres located five miles northeast of Merced. He purchased this property in November, 1883, and since that time has bent every effort toward its improvement, placing the land under profitable cultivation and adding commodious buildings. In 1893 he erected his present home, a two-story frame house consisting of twelve rooms, finishing all in a modern and approved style. The large ranch is devoted to the cultivation of grain and the raising of cattle.

In Berkshire county, Mass., Asa L. Bartholomew was born June 24, 1827, a son of Andrew and Abigail (Savage) Bartholomew, both owing their nativity to the same state, where the father engaged in farming throughout his entire life. He was reared to manhood on the paternal farm and remained at home until he was twenty years of age, and three years later came to California by way of the Isthmus of Panama. Upon his arrival in San Francisco he followed the course of the many who sought the west at that time—1850—going at once to the mines on Stanislaus river, San Joaquin, now Stanislaus county. Later he engaged in teaming, which work he evidently found more profitable, for he remained so employed for fifteen years. He then engaged in ranching in Stanislaus county until his remoyal to Merced county, which took place twenty-six years ago, as before mentioned locating upon his present property in November, 1883, and since making this his home.

Mr. Bartholomew has been married three times; his first wife, Mary Sparks, died, leaving him two children, namely: Anna Mary, the wife of Vaughn Gahan of Paso Robles, Cal., and Emma, the wife of Fremont Burrows of Modesto. His second wife was V. Myra Van Ward, and after her death he married Mrs. Emma (Sabers) Brown. She is a native of Toronto, Canada, and the daughter of John Sabers, of Irish birth. He came to Canada when only fifteen years old and engaged in farming, later locating in Illinois, where he married Mary Beach, a native of that state. They subsequently returned to Canada, but when Mrs. Bartholomew was only seven weeks old they once more located in Illinois. Upon the breaking out of the Civil war Mr. Sabers enlisted in Captain Anderson's company and during the service had the misfortune to lose an eye. On returning to the pursuits of a civilian he located in Missouri, where he is now engaged in farming at the age of sixty-six years. By her first husband, Charles Brown, Mrs. Bartholomew is the mother of two children, namely: R. B. DeWitt and Benjamin H., both of whom are at home. Mr. Bartholomew is a Republican in his political convictions and attends the Presbyterian Church.

HENRY FREDERICK FERDINAND SALAU. The pioneers of Merced county include none whose lives have been more eventful or broader in scope than that of Henry Frederick Ferdinand Salau, who resides five miles southwest of Los Banos, and is prominently connected with the agricultural and stock-raising development of his section. Few of the residents in the vicinity of Los Banos have touched at as many ports or are as familiar with the geography of the world as is Mr. Salau, and it is safe to say that none has had so many exciting experiences upon the deep or sailed more miles before the mast. He had ability and enthusiasm, and sufficient energy to break away from conditions which failed to come up to the requirements of his nature. The son of a weaver who had two other sons and two daughters, he found little in the humble environment of his home in Kiel, Germany, to stimulate his energy or satisfy his craving for action. He was born June 3, 1835, and is of Huguenot ancestry, early bearers of his name having fled to Germany from France to avoid religious persecution. His parents, John and Catherine (Kremhoff) Salau, were born in Kiel, the former living to the age of sixty, while the latter died in 1854. The weaver and his wife were plain, conscientious, and God-fearing people, devout in their attendance and support of the Lutheran Church, and strict in the discipline of their children.

The oldest son in the family, Henry Frederick remained at home until fourteen, when, feeling the touch of poverty and lack of opportunity, he gave vent to the desire which had strengthened each year as he watched the coming and departure of ships in the great harbor. His dream was to become a sailor, to visit distant ports. Aboard the brig Betsey he sailed to London, and then to Quebec, Canada, but before reaching the latter city experienced his first shipwreck, which resulted in eleven of the crew being rescued by the Humboldt of Hamburg, and taken to New York. Three months later he shipped on the ship Humboldt, returned to Hamburg, then on the same ship made two other trips to New York. The last time he came around the Horn to San Francisco, stopped at Acapulco to discharge a cargo of coal, and reached the California city in August, 1858. Thereafter for several years he engaged in the coasting trade between San Francisco and Puget Sound, and in 1861 shipped aboard the clipper ship Challenger, destined for a voyage of one hundred and three days to Liverpool. The Nicholas Biddle was the next ship upon which Mr. Salau shipped, and after reaching New York he took a trip to the West Indies on the barque Warwick. Next, on the clipper ship Magnet, he sailed from New York around the Horn to San Francisco in one hundred and forty days, returning to New York on the Susau Faring, in which also he went on a forty days' journey to the East Indies. Loading with rice, the ship went to London, via the Cape of Good Hope, in one hundred and forty days. He then went to his old home in Kiel, also visiting Hamburg and other German towns. Still entranced with the life of the sea, he shipped on the barque Mary from Bremen to St. Thomas, then on board the Geronimo, of Philadelphia. He was shipwrecked off the coast of Cape Hatteras, this ship going ashore in a gale, but as heretofore, the crew were saved from a watery grave through their ability to withstand exposure and danger. Mr. Salau later became one of the crew of the Josie H. Bates, bound for the East Indies by way of Cape Hope; next was on the Mattapan, bound for San Francisco by way of the Horn. This proved an enjoyable and profitable trip, but was paid for later on when he chanced to be in the harbor at Baker's Island. Lying at anchor, a terrific gale blew the boat into a coral reef, and it soon afterward went to the bottom, not, however, until the crew had all been saved. Going to Honolulu aboard a schooner, Mr. Salau shipped on the whaler Briganza, brought a cargo of oil to Bremen, Germany, then returned on the City of Baltimore to New York. Shortly afterward he went on the Rover to the East Indies, returned to New York, and then on the brig Hamburg went to St. Thomas, and from there to Hamburg. This proved the last trip of this great voyager, who had attained the rank of second officer, and who had profited intelligently and broadly by his visits in many lands. He had absorbed his share of the danger and responsibility of the merchant marine and had encountered many and varied experiences.

During his eleven months in Germany Mr. Salau found employment in a moulding factory, for, like the average sailor, he had accumulated but little money, and was forced to begin at the bottom round of the ladder. In 1866 he came to New York, and thence to Aspinwall, Panama, and San Francisco, arriving in the latter city in April, 1867, on the steamer Moses Taylor. After looking around for a favorable occupation he engaged in farming in the vicinity of Santa Clara until 1866, then went to the West side and entered a hundred and sixty acres of land near Volta, Merced county. This proving of little use, he allowed it to go back, and near Los Banos engaged in the sheep business for several years. In 1871 he located on one hundred and sixty acres of his present ranch, improved the same, added buildings and implements, and engaged in grain and stock raising on as large a scale as the land permitted. Later years witnessed additions to his property, and he now owns two hundred and eighty acres below the canal, and three hundred and twenty above the canal, five miles southwest of Los Banos. Previous to the construction of the outside canal he built a flume and canal with which to irrigate his land, but has since availed himself of the public waterway. The ranch is under dairying, alfalfa and grain, one hundred and eighty-five acres being under alfalfa. The dairy land Mr. Salau leases for $12 an acre, and the balance of the property is managed by his sons, he having several years ago retired from active life.

Mr Salau has entered into the affairs of his home with the same enthusiasm and thoroughness with which he followed the sea in his youth. He has proved a valuable adjunct to local Republican undertakings, and has creditably served as a member of the county central committee, and as a delegate to state and county conventions. He is fraternally connected with the Ancient Order of United Workmen, and is a member of the Lutheran Church. In Kiel, Germany, Mr. Salau married Doretta Salau, a native of Holstein, Germany, and the home thus established has been augmented by five children, namely: Augusta, who is married to M. Becker, Adolph, Mary, Louis and Doretta. Mr. Salau is a man of strong character, commanding presence and magnetic personality. He carries with him a faithful memory of the people and places he has known and of the incidents which have enlivened his career, all which makes of him an interesting companion, as well as a reliable and instructive source of information.

JAMES DRISKELL. Numbered among the pioneer agriculturists of California is James Driskell, an esteemed and highly respected resident of Newman, who came to this state more than forty years ago, and has since been actively identified with its industrial growth and prosperity. A native of Kentucky, he was born October 26, 1828, in Morgan county, a son of Davis Driskell.

Born and reared in Kentucky, Davis Driskell was there engaged in farming during his earlier years. Migrating with his family to Illinois in 1833, he settled at Macoupin Point, in Macoupin county, where he purchased land, and in addition to managing that was also employed as a hotel keeper for five years. Removing to Lee county, Iowa, in 1838, he took up government land near West Point, and there cleared and improved a homestead, on which he was engaged in farming and stock-raising until his death. He married first Mary Dunn, who was born in Kentucky, and died in Illinois. She bore him four sons and three daughters, of whom James, the special subject of this sketch, was the youngest child. After the death of his first wife, he was subsequently twice married.

Attending the short terms of school held in the rude log school house of his boyhood days, James Driskell obtained a limited education in common with the children of the neighborhood, while under his father's tutelage he was well drilled in the various branches relating to general farming. For a short time he worked as a farm laborer in Jefferson and other Iowa counties, and then, in 1848, migrated to Nebraska, locating near Plattsmouth, where he took up a tract of government land, and followed farming for eleven years. Crossing the plains with ox-teams in 1859, Mr. Driskell located in Douglas county, Ore., living first in Roseburg, and afterwards in Canyonville, in both places being engaged in agricultural pursuits. Coming from there to Santa Cruz county, Cal., in 1863, Mr. Driskell settled first on land near Watsonville, and subsequently lived for a year in Watsonville, being engaged while in that vicinity in peeling tan bark. In 1876 he removed to Los Banos, and the ensuing year purchased a squatter's claim of one hundred and sixty acres of land, which he managed for a few years. Disposing of that property to Miller & Lux, he located in Stanislaus county in 1881, and bought his present ranch of ninety-five and three-fourths acres, adjoining Newman on the east. With characteristic enterprise and foresight, he has planted it largely to alfalfa, and is now carrying on a profitable dairy business, keeping fifty cows, and using a separator.

In Iowa Mr. Driskell married Mahala Cardwell, a native of Tennessee and a daughter of Richard and Mary Campbell Cardwell, an old Tennessee family. Of the union of Mr. and Mrs. Driskell eleven children have been born, and of these seven daughters and two sons are living. The names of the children are: Mrs. Mary J. Gardener, George W., Mrs. Malicia A. Wisener, Malinda Arizona, deceased, Mrs. Eliza C. Draper, Sarah Matilda, deceased, William Daniel, Mrs. Emma Idella Ward, Mrs. Martha Ellen Tompkins, Mrs. Grace De Etta Gift, Clara Belle.

Politically Mr. Driskell is a zealous advocate of the principles of the Republican party, and religiously he is a member of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church.

CAPT. HARRISON WHITE. The genealogy of the White family in America is traced back to Peregrine White, whose name is associated with the historic Mayflower and the early days of hardships on the bleak Atlantic coast. Every generation has given to our country men of valor in war and painstaking industry in times of peace. During the Revolutionary war Silas White, a native of New York, enlisted in a company from that state, and as captain led his men into the thickest of many a struggle with the Tory forces. A son and namesake of this Revolutionary captain left his native New York and in 1842 settled on the Fox river in Illinois, becoming a pioneer farmer of LaSalle county, where he died six years later. Long survived by his wife, he left to her the heritage of an upright life and unstained honor. In maidenhood she bore the name of Maria MacClave. The family of which she was a member came from Scotland to America in an early day and settled in New York, where she was born at Albany. At the time of her death, which occurred in Illinois, she had reached the age of ninety-eight years. Of her ten children who attained mature years five are still living. One of the survivors, Selim, who is now a resident of Coal City, Grundy county, Ill., served through the entire period of the Civil war and held the rank of captain of a company in the Fifty-third Illinois Infantry.

Syracuse, N. Y., is the native city of Harrison White, and June 28, 1836, the date of his birth. When six years of age he accompanied the family to Illinois and there obtained his primary education in public schools, after which he alternated teaching school with attendance at Wheaton College. The breaking out of the Civil war found him alert to offer his services to his country. When the first appeal came for volunteers to enlist for three months he was quick to respond, and in April, 1861, became a member of Company F, Eleventh Illinois Infantry. At the expiration of three months, on being honorably discharged, he decided to enlist in the cavalry branch of the army, and accordingly helped to organize Company B, Fourth Illinois Cavalry, which was mustered into service at Ottawa in August of 1861, and thence made its way to Cairo. Among his early engagements were those at Forts Henry and Donelson, Corinth and Vicksburg. In the siege of Vicksburg his company was detailed as an escort to General Grant and continued as such until the latter was ordered east as commander-in-chief. Soon afterward he was placed on detached service and for a short time was assistant quartermaster at Vicksburg, after which he joined his regiment and aided General Custer in Louisiana during the reconstruction period. January 26, 1866, he was honorably discharged in Memphis, Tenn., with the rank of captain, having been promoted to that office in recognition of meritorious service at Vicksburg. Somewhat earlier in the war he had served as an orderly sergeant. Though often in the midst of fierce struggles, with the dead and wounded on every hand, he escaped without injury, except during the conflict at Shiloh, where a piece of shell killed his horse and knocked him senseless, but he soon recovered and joined his comrades.

For a year after his retirement from the army Captain White rented a plantation at Yazoo Pass, Miss., but the climate and occupation proved trying, and on account of ill health he returned to Illinois. For some months he conducted a mercantile establishment at Sandwich, Ill., but in the fall of 1868 he sold the business, left Illinois, and traveled up the Missouri to Fort Benton and thence to Helena, Mont., where he engaged in merchandising. Later he carried on a store at a mining camp. During the fall of 1869 he went back to Illinois to visit relatives and friends. The spring of 1870 found him in California, where he settled at Portersville, a small town in Tulare county. For two years he was interested in the sheep business and owned a ranch, but afterward for five years he conducted a general merchandise store with Mr. Putnam. Since 1877 Visalia has been his home and headquarters. Three years after coming to this city he was appointed deputy to the internal revenue collector, William Higby, who had charge of the district embracing Kern, Tulare, Fresno, Merced and Stanislaus counties, with offices in Visalia. While holding the office of deputy, in which he continued until 1880, he maintained ranch and sheep interests, and still owns a ranch of three hundred and twenty acres on the Tulare river, which he now leases. The land is to some extent under irrigation, water being provided by means of a pumping plant connected with wells. In addition to this property he owns grazing lands. During 1891 he was appointed under sheriff to Sheriff Overall and continued in the office for eighteen months. From 1893 to 1895 he served by appointment as United States gauger. His present position to which he was appointed in 1898, is that of supervisor of the southern district of the Sierra Forest reserve, comprising more than two million acres in Kern, Tulare and Inyo counties, with headquarters in Visalia. The position is one entailing many responsibilities, but he has proved ably qualified to discharge every duty with efficiency and intelligence, his long experience in many avenues of activity having given him a breadth of knowledge and extent of information as rare as it is valuable.

After coming to Visalia Captain White established domestic ties through his marriage to Miss Hattie Pauline Anthony, a native of Watertown, N. Y. He is a member of Gen. George Wright Post No. 111, G. A. R., of which he served as the first commander and afterward by re-election twice held the office. Under appointment by Governor Waterman he served as major and quartermaster on the staff of General Budd, of the California National Guard. Politically a Republican and a leader of his party, for twelve years or more he has been secretary of the Republican county central committee and for two terms officiated as its chairman, always taking an active part in its councils and contributing to its usefulness as an organization. Another important service in behalf of his party has been as a member of the congressional committee. Not only among the members of his own party, but by the citizenship of Visalia irrespective of political ties, he holds the position which belongs to ability of a high order, attractive personality and broad-minded patriotism.

CHARLES JAMES HOBLER. For many years Mr. Hobler has held an enviable position among the first farmers of Kings county, Cal., and to him belongs the distinction of raising the finest of thoroughbred merino sheep to be found in the vicinity of Hanford, where he has an extensive stock ranch. The high repute in which he is held comes not only from his being a worthy son of good ancestors, but also from the admirable manner in which he has been living out his pre-eminently useful and busy life, his affluent circumstances being but the result of his individual efforts. In tracing the ancestry of Mr. Hobler, we find him to be a direct descendant of a prominent English family. His paternal grandfather, who was of Swiss extraction, was clerk of the Mansion House in London for an unbroken period of forty years, and a painted portrait of him may be found hanging in the halls of the Mansion House to-day.

George Hobler, the father of Charles J., was a native of London, England, where he was reared, educated and lived until he attained the age of twenty-five years. He wedded Miss Ann Turner, a lady born in Devonshire, England. Her father was a breeder of fine Devon cattle and sold to the late Queen Victoria the stock which afterward brought her many prizes at fairs, etc. After marriage, about 1825, the young people went to Australia and during the early years of their residence in that country, Mr. Hobler followed banking in connection with real estate business and stock-raising. Fortune, on her wheel, seemed to be traveling by his side, and at one time he was one of the leading and wealthiest men in the vicinity of Sydney. He subsequently failed in business, however, but by hard work and self-denial, he paid every dollar of his indebtedness. Undaunted, he began anew, and by keen foresight he made a good start and in a short time was again on the road to prosperity. Removing far from the settlements, he took up land and engaged in cattle and sheep-raising on a large scale. His land was in a wild, unsettled district, three hundred miles from the nearest postoffice and here upon this place, shut off from civilization, Mr. Hobler endeavored to retrieve his fallen fortunes. After following this business for six or eight years he became disgusted with the English government, and having been deprived of his land, he sold all his possessions in that country, and severing his connection with both the country and the government, he came to America, making his way to California in 1851.

Securing a favorable location in Alameda county, he took up a claim of one hundred and sixty acres of land on the Spanish Grant, where he improved a place and followed farming for several years. On account of an existing dispute concerning the title to this land and not wishing to be again deprived of his rights, Mr. Hobler sold his interest in this place and removed to Alameda, where the latter years of his life were spent in retirement. Here he died at the advanced age of eighty-four years. Eleven children were born to him and his wife, and of these, one died in infancy, ten growing to maturity; all are now deceased except Charles J. and his sister, Ada, wife of John Ellsworth, superior judge of Alameda county, Cal.

Born, as he was, on the bank of Hunter's river, near Sydney, Australia, August 16, 1836, Charles J. Hobler spent his boyhood days in the land of his nativity, and when of sufficient age he was placed in a boarding-school, where he remained for four years, during which time he obtained a fair education. He had attained the age of fifteen years when his parents left Australia for a home in California and he worked on his father's ranch until he was nineteen years old, starting out at that time to make his own way in the world. He took charge of a flock of sheep, managing them first in Solano county and afterward in Monterey county. The third year a division was made and Mr. Hobler received for his share, in addition to a certain sum of money, five hundred ewes, and with these as a start, he began sheep-raising on his own behalf in Monterey county. After two or three years he removed his stock to the upper San Joaquin valley, being subsequently located in different counties until 1864.

During that year he took up his sheep into Mendocino county, having at that time about four thousand head. This change, instead of being beneficial to his interests, was quite the reverse, as the settlers killed his sheep and he was afterward compelled to return to the San Joaquin valley in order to save the remnant of his flock, which was reduced to four hundred. Here he remained until 1872, and it was during that year that he purchased a section of land in Fresno county, for which he paid $6,400. Upon this land he carried on farm pursuits on a large scale, raising grain, planting orchards, etc., and in addition to cultivating his own ranch, he rented six sections of land in the same county and carried on stock-raising extensively. In 1888 he sold his entire possessions for $35,000 net, and purchased his present home place, four hundred acres, six miles northeast of Hanford, in Kings county and removing to this place, he has lived here ever since. The purchase price, $18,400, is greatly exceeded by the present value of the place, and here Mr. Hobler continues stock-raising, making a specialty of thoroughbred sheep.

Having invested quite largely in real estate, Mr. Hobler at one time owned one hundred and eighty lots in Hanford, in addition to his ranch. His deep interest in educational affairs is unquestioned, as he donated eight lots for the high school site. Besides this, he has sold at different times one hundred lots that now contain residences. He also purchased twenty acres of land near the city, which he sold seven months later at a fair profit. By his marriage in 1874, he was united with Rosie Hunter, of Canadian birth, who was brought to California by her parents when but one year old; her family also is of English extraction. Eight children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Hobler, and of these, three sons, Louis W., Adolph and Charles H., are deceased. Those living are: Lizzie, wife of C. D. Haywood; Rosie, wife of George Kelley, of Hanford; and Bertha, Grace and Gladys. The youngest three are all at home. Politically, Mr. Hobler is a firm adherent of Republican principles, but has never aspired to office. Fraternally he is allied with the Ancient Order of United Workmen, the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Masons, being a member of the Blue Lodge and Royal Arch Chapter of Hanford. In embracing Masonry, he but followed in the footsteps of his honored father, who was made a Mason in England, and just prior to his removal to Australia the Grand Master's Lodge No. 1, of which he was a member, presented him with a jewel, bearing the date of June 20, 1825, as an emblem of their good-will. This token of esteem is now in the possession of Mr. Hobler, who prizes it very highly, a relic of bygone days, when his beloved father was a much esteemed resident of England.

CHARLES FREDERICK WADE, M. D. Medical and surgical science finds skillful expression in the career of Dr. Charles Frederick Wade, a resident of Los Banos since 1891. Besides being a general practitioner, he is the owner of a private hospital on the edge of the town, the surgeon for the Southern Pacific Railroad Company for many years, and examining physicians for eight life insurance companies. Dr. Wade comes of old Massachusetts stock, and on both sides of his family inherits professional tendencies. He was born in Boston, Mass., November 17, 1851, a son of Francis F., and grandson of Abraham Wade, the latter of whom spent his entire life in Massachusetts, and counted as his immigrating ancestor a Scotch traveler who arrived off the Massachusetts coast during colonial times. Francis F. Wade was an attorney, who in early manhood married Henrietta Graves, a native of Boston. She died leaving to his care Charles Frederick, and Edgard F., the latter of whom was a druggist, and died in Butte county, Cal. Depressed because of the death of his wife, and hoping much from a general change of opportunity, Mr. Wade brought his sons to California in 1859, settling in San Francisco, where he practiced law until his death in 1864. He was then in the prime of life, being forty years old, and his passing meant much to the motherless boys who would shortly have to depend upon their own resources. He was a member in high standing of the Pacific Lodge of Masons, and a man of ability and resource. The maternal grandfather of Dr. Wade, Dr. Philip Graves, was born in England and was a graduate from an English school of medicine. He practiced medicine for many years in Massachusetts, became a pioneer of California when there was need of skilled physicians, and died near Stockton, this state, at the age of eighty-six.

After graduating from the grammar school of San Francisco, Dr. Wade entered a drug store in Montezuma, and at the same time studied medicine under Dr. Lampson. In 1887 he entered the Cooper Medical College for the three years' course, graduating in November, 1889, and soon after engaging in practice in Tuolumne county. When he arrived in Los Banos in 1891 the town was devoid of medical assistance of any kind, and as the pioneer physician and surgeon, he soon worked up a large and lucrative practice. His private hospital is equipped with the improvements sanctioned by present standards of nursing, and he has the contract to care for the sick and injured west of the San Joaquin river, in Merced county. Dr. Wade is examining physician for the Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company, the Equitable, Fidelity Mutual Life, Northwestern Mutual Life, New York Life, Mutual New York, Security Trust and Life, and the Massachusetts Mutual Life insurance companies. He is a member of the County Medical Society, the State Medical Society, the American Medical Society, and the Pacific Coast Association of Railway Surgeons.

A Republican in national politics, Dr. Wade is recognized as one of the leaders of that party in the western part of the county. He was postmaster of Los Banos from 1898 until April, 1903, and was Republican nominee for state senator of his district, which is overwhelmingly Democratic. His interest in education has been pronounced and of a practical nature. He is president of the school board, having held that position since the organization of the district, also having been active in organizing the district and securing the erection of the high-school building.

He was made a Mason in George Washington Lodge No. 62, F. & A. M., of Tuolumne county and served twelve years consecutively as master; he assisted in organizing Los Banos Lodge No. 312, in 1892, is its secretary, and was its first master, serving five terms. He is also identified with Sonora Chapter No. 2, R. A. M.; the Pacific Commandery No. 3, K. T. of Sonora, and the Mountain Brow Lodge No. 82, I. O. O. F., of which he is past grand; this lodge was organized in Chinese Camp, Tuolumne county, in 1858, and was removed to Los Banos after Dr. Wade came to this town. The doctor has social connections with the Woodmen of the World, the Foresters, the Ancient Order of United Workmen and the Knights of the Maccabees. Mrs. Wade was formerly Adelaide Mayhew, a native of Tuolumne county, and daughter of Charles Mayhew, the latter a native of Nantucket, Mass., and a California pioneer of 1852. Two children have been born to Dr. and Mrs. Wade, of whom George Royal is a graduate of Heald's Business College, and is a civil engineer; Henrietta Alice is a graduate of the University of California, 1903, and is now engaged in post-graduate work. Dr. Wade enjoys a wide popularity in Merced county, and his professional effort has had a tendency to establish and maintain a high standard. He adheres invariably to the best tenets of the old school, embellishing his practice with personal characteristics as pleasing as they are rare and inspiring.

JOHN HENRY EDWARDS. Among the enterprising and progressive agriculturists that entered large and valuable ranches in Merced county was the late John Henry Edwards, whose farm, now occupied by his widow and children, lies about seven miles south of Newman. He was well known throughout this section of the country as a man of great ability, thrift and integrity, well worthy of the confidence and trust reposed in him by his fellow-men. Public-spirited and far-seeing, he willingly assisted in the establishment of beneficial projects, and well performed his part in advancing the intellectual and moral status of the community. A native of Alabama, he was born August 5, 1830, in Russellville, and died December 17, 1895, on his home ranch near Newman, Cal. His father, James Garrett Edwards, was born in Kentucky of Welsh descent, and removed from there to Alabama and spent his later years in Arkansas.

Educated in the common schools of his native state, John Henry Edwards remained beneath the parental roof until nineteen years of age, when he began life on his own account. On hearing of the discovery of gold in California, in 1849, he joined the tide of emigration that was traveling across the plains to the valleys of California, and located mines in Eldorado county. Subsequently settling in Suisun, Solano county, he, in partnership with his brothers, Charles and James Edwards, began the manufacture of flour, owning mills there for a number of years, and also buying a ranch in that vicinity. Selling out his interests, Mr. Edwards removed to San Francisco, where he was in business as an assayer until 1881. In that year he took possession of the ranch now occupied by his widow. This property, which was subsequently sold, contained six hundred and forty acres above the canal and one hundred and sixty acres below the canal, on which he made his home, he had purchased in 1869. In the years that followed, Mr. Edwards made substantial improvements on his home farm, rendering it one of the best and most desirable estates in the neighborhood, and was here pleasantly engaged in his independent occupation until his death as above stated. In politics Mr. Edwards was a staunch Democrat, active in the management of public affairs, and for seven years was supervisor of Merced county, dying while in office.

On October 4, 1864, in Suisun, Cal., Mr. Edwards married Sarah Martha Ish, who was born in Saline county, Mo., a daughter of Carroll Whitfield Ish. A native of Tennessee, Mr. Ish first migrated as far westward as Missouri, whence, in 1850, he came across the plains to California. Here he lived in various places, including Sacramento and Sonoma, being engaged in farming and stock-raising. For a time he was a resident of Contra Costa county, later owning land in Solano county, from there going to Winters, Yolo county, where he resided until his death at the age of seventy-six years. His wife, whose maiden name was Mary Jane Baldrige, was born in Tennessee and died in Yolo county, Cal.

Of the union of Mr. and Mrs. Edwards three children were born, namely: Cora Lee, deceased; Grace Walston and John Henry, both living at home. Under the management of Mrs. Edwards and her son, the home ranch is carried on with marked ability, being devoted largely to dairy purposes, one hundred and sixty acres being sown to alfalfa.

ALVAH L. CONKLIN. The younger generation of business men of Bakersfield include none more energetic, progressive or promising, than Alvah L. Conklin, senior member of the firm of Conklin & Coffee, wholesale and retail meat merchants. Far from depending upon the advantage to be gained from the reflected prominence of his father, Hon. Alvah Russell Conklin, for many years connected with the jurisprudence, and legislative and fraternal development of California, this merchant has forged his way to the front solely upon his own merits, depending upon tenacity of purpose, ambition and ability, to connect his name with the best citizenship of the west.

Born in Warrensburg, Mo., August 21, 1868, Mr. Conklin was a lad of seven years when he came to California in 1875, settling with his father in Independence, Inyo county, where he attended the public schools. He developed studious characteristics and at the age of thirteen entered Santa Clara College, where he remained for three years. His first business venture was on a stock ranch with his brother, N. E. Conklin, in Inyo county, where he was fairly successful, and sold out his interest with gratifying profit in 1899. Locating in Bakersfield, he formed a partnership with J. A. Baker in his present business, continuing the same until February, 1903. Since then George Coffee has purchased Mr. Baker's interest, and the extensive patronage hitherto accorded the establishment has known no diminution of its former proportions. Thoroughly abreast with the times, courteous in the treatment of its many customers, and depending upon reliable and advanced business tactics, the management has won a strong footing in the community, and is appreciated because of the excellence of its commodities, and the moderate prices. Mr. Conklin is public-spirited, generous in his support of charitable and social enterprises, and tactful in the many situations in which a prosperous merchant finds himself in a progressive community. He is a Republican in politics, and is fraternally connected with the Elks. His family consists of his wife, formerly Mary Sheppard, a native of Inyo county, and a daughter, Mollie Irene.

Mr. Conklin feels a just pride in the career of his father, and has ever valued the example of perseverance and high ideals which influenced his own course in life. Hon. Alvah L. Conklin was born in Mehoopany, Wyoming county, Pa., March 12, 1835, and on the paternal side of the family came from the Mohawk valley branch, his mother being a member of the Redfield family of Vermont. He was educated in the public schools of Kingston, Luzerne county, Pa., and at the Wyoming Seminary, and by trade became a printer. As a child, he was unlike the average, in that he realized the promise of his youth, and before the age of twenty had edited two different papers. He studied law under Hon. Lyman Hokes of Wilkesbarre, Pa., and Hon. George S. Tutton of Tunkhannock, and in 1858 removed to Forest City, Holt county, Mo., where he practiced law and published the Forest City Courier. In 1861, at the outbreak of the Civil war, he tendered his services in recruiting a company for the Thirteenth Missouri Infantry, Colonel Peabody's regiment of volunteers, and while performing his duty in this connection he was shot down on the road, being the second in the state to thus suffer at the hands of the Bushwhackers in Missouri. Recovering from his wounds, he served four years in the Federal army, filling various responsible positions, and being the first judge advocate to determine the admission of testimony of the negro before a military court.

After the war Judge Conklin settled in Warrensburg, Mo., and from 1868 until 1872 was judge of the court of common pleas of Johnson county. In 1875 he came to California and located at Independence, Inyo county, where he engaged in the active practice of law with Hon.

Patrick Reddy, his brother-in-law. In 1879 he was nominated on the Republican ticket for superior judge of Inyo county, but declined the honor, and in 1882 he was the nominee for lieutenant-governor, winning the nomination over several well-known politicians through a three minutes' magnetic speech. Though the Republican ticket met with defeat, he received six thousand more votes than did the head of the opposition ticket. In 1884 he was nominated as one of the electors-at-large on the James G. Blaine ticket, and after his election was chosen president of the body of electors. Judge Conklin became identified with Kern county in 1892, when he was appointed superior judge to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Judge R. E. Arick. Taking up his residence in Bakersfield, he was elected judge of the superior court in 1894, and four years later was defeated for the same office. Thereafter he practiced law in Bakersfield until his death, October 5, 1899, at the age of sixty-two years. He was prominent in Masonry, starting out upon his career in Forest City, Mo., as a member of Lodge No. 214, F. & A. M. He was afterward made a member of the Bodie Chapter No. 35, R. A. M., and the Bodie Commandery No. 15, K. T. From 1879 until his death he was a member of the Grand Lodge of California, and for several years was chairman of the committee on grievances. In 1886 he was elected junior grand warden, and the following year was chosen senior grand warden. In 1888 he was elected deputy grand master, and in 1890 was chosen grand master of the Grand Lodge, which position he held for years. Mr. Conklin was gifted with keen reasoning powers, remarkable adaptability, and possessed a comprehensive knowledge of the law. In him was found that strong mental and moral timber which, more than any other agency, has furnished telling strokes toward the supremacy of the state of California.

DR. JOHN P. JOHNSTON. A prominent farmer of Fresno county, and one who in the past fifteen years has proved his business ability, judgment and enterprise, is Dr. John P. Johnston, now located upon a farm of thirty acres in the neighborhood of Fresno. He purchased the farm in 1888 about a month after arriving in Fresno, and has since made the improvements which have placed his property in the front ranks of well-improved and highly developed farms of the region. In addition to this property he also owns seventy acres located on East and Orange avenues, twelve acres of which are devoted to raisins, ten acres to peaches, ten acres to pears, one acre to apricots, while the remainder is devoted to alfalfa and Bermuda grass. Mr. Johnston also devotes considerable time to stock raising. Another source of income to him is a hundred hives of bees.

A native of Shelby county, Ohio, John P. Johnston was born November 13, 1837. His father, Christopher Johnston, was a native of Scotland and as a drummer-boy served in the Scotch army in Ireland. In 1830 he came to America, settling in Miami county, Ohio, and was there interested in the construction of a saw and grist mill. In 1852 he established himself in the same business in Montezuma, Mercer county, of that state, and continued so employed until 1856, when his son took charge of the mill, and he returned to his farm in Miami county, where his death occurred in 1894 at the age of eighty-two years. By profession Christopher Johnston was a lawyer, but never engaged in the practice of law. In Miami county, Ohio, he was united in marriage with Mary Peck, and of this union were born the following children: John P., the subject of this review; Henry H. P., who is now living a retired life in Fresno; Stephen, located in Shelby county, Ohio; Thomas, a merchant in Los Angeles; William A., who is conducting a jewelry store in Santa Paula, Ventura county; Mary, wife of Joseph Watkins, of Ohio; Julia, who resides with her mother in Piqua, Ohio, where the mother still lives at the age of eighty-three years.

The education of Dr. Johnston was received in the public schools of Miami county, Ohio. At sixteen years of age he assumed charge of his father's saw and grist mill. In this employment he remained until twenty-two years of age, when he took a commercial course, completing the work in bookkeeping. At the same time, however, he continued his work in the mill until 1865, when he entered the office of Dr. H. Potter, in Montezuma, Ohio, where he remained two years, after which he also studied in the office of Dr. Walton, in Piqua, Ohio. Thereafter, during his residence in Ohio, he practiced medicine and was also employed on a farm. In 1888 he came to California, and settling in Fresno, a month later purchased the property upon which he has since made his home. He has met with success in his agricultural pursuits since his settlement in the west and has become the owner of valuable property. In conjunction with the cultivation of alfalfa he has raised Bermuda grass. In one season Dr. Johnston has cut five crops of alfalfa.

Dr. Johnston was married January 1, 1864, to Nancy L. McDaniel, and four children have blessed this union: William R., a raisin grower of Fresno county; Frank W., also a raisin grower, having forty acres devoted to this cultivation; George R., located in Fresno county; and Fanny L., the wife of G. A. Prater, of Lonestar. In his political convictions Dr. Johnston is a Republican and through the influence of this party has filled various official positions during his residence in the west, acting as school director in his locality. He is a member of the Christian Church. The many sturdy qualities which distinguish the life of Dr. Johnston in this neighborhood have called forth the esteem and respect of his fellow townsmen and he has attained an enviable position as a citizen of Fresno county.

GEORGE A. BALLOU. In all sections of the world the pioneer is held in honor, but especially is this the case in California, where the present generation realizes that the development of the twentieth century is due to the indefatigable determination of those who faced the hardships of an overland journey to the coast and the still greater hardships connected with the transforming of an unknown, sparsely settled region into one of the greatest commonwealths in the nation. The development of Tulare county owes much to the pioneer labors of George A. Ballou, and the retirement and ease he now enjoys have been justly earned by years of arduous effort and application.

When the first settlers came to American shores the Ballou family immigrated to this country from France and afterward members of the different generations bore a part in the colonial and Revolutionary struggles. The trade of weaver was followed by them in the early history of the United States and from that they drifted into the cotton manufacturing business during the infancy of that industry. Ballou's cottons were manufactured at Woonsocket, R. I., and acquired a world-wide reputation through the exercise of the fine business talents of Oliver Ballou, a native of Rhode Island and for years the head of the factory. Harvey, son of Oliver Ballou, was born and reared in Rhode Island and through all his life followed the trades of plasterer and bricklayer, in addition to superintending a farm. At an early age he married Ruth Gould, who was born at Cape Cod, Mass., and died in Rhode Island. His death also occurred in the latter state in 1854. In their family of three sons and four daughters George A. Ballou was next to the youngest. The common schools of Cumberland, R. I., where he was born September 26, 1832, furnished him with a fair education, and he had the further advantage of a term in an academy. Under his father's supervision he learned the trades of plasterer and bricklayer, which he has followed throughout much of his active life.

The year 1850 brought many gold-seekers to California, and among the number was George A. Ballou, who came by way of Panama and settled in San Diego, going from there to Los Angeles eighteen months later. In common with the majority of the pioneers he did considerable prospecting and mining, and it was his good fortune to secure a sufficient amount of gold to repay him for his arduous labors. For eight months he made Los Angeles his home and then spent a short time in San Francisco, afterward working at his trade in Stockton. Subsequent to this he engaged in mining in Mariposa county, and from there returned to work at his trade in Los Angeles. As early as 1860 he became a pioneer of Visalia, which has since remained his home and the scene of his activities. After some years as a wage-worker in laying brick he began to take contracts for such work, and many of the first buildings in the town were erected under his supervision. In 1899 he retired from the trade, and since that year he has given his attention to the management of his property in town and the large tracts of farm lands owned by him. These lands aggregate more than one thousand acres and are scattered through three counties. Purchased at a time when property was much lower than at present, they represent Mr. Ballou's excellent judgment in making investments and comprise to a large degree the savings of a lifetime of labor. Since attaining the age of franchise he has voted the Republican ticket and both in local and general elections supports the men and measures advocated by that party.

THOMAS REED LAVERS. An early pioneer of Kern county, and a veteran agriculturist and stock raiser, Thomas Reed Lavers has spent a busy and useful life, and is now living retired from active business cares in Bakersfield. Energetic, persevering and wise in his management of affairs, he has achieved success in industrial circles. He was born October 15, 1825, in Cumberland county, Nova Scotia, and on the home farm grew to man's estate. Immigrating to Massachusetts in 1847, he worked as a farm laborer until 1852, when he succumbed to a violent attack of gold fever, and came to California by way of Cape Horn, the journey from Boston to San Francisco taking six months. After working in San Francisco for six weeks, he made a trip to the mines, but winter weather proving severe, and mining unprofitable, the heavy rains interfering with the digging, he located in Santa Clara county, where he rented land and engaged in general farming.

In the fall of 1869 Mr. Lavers moved to what was then Tulare, but is now Kern county, and took up a tract of wild land about forty miles northeast of Bakersfield, on Poso creek. Settlers were few and far between, and Visalia, sixty miles away, was the nearest trading point and depot for supplies. He embarked in the cattle business, having all the range he wanted, and carried on a substantial business, having at times from five hundred to one thousand head of stock. Placing a part of his land in tillable condition, he raised hay and grain, and being advantageously located on the main road from Visalia to Kernville had a good home market for his farm products. He also kept a public inn, entertaining people traveling through the country. One half section of this land, which commands water for a large territory, he still owns, but rents it, the rent furnishing him with a good annual income. In 1896 Mr. Lavers built his present residence in Bakersfield, and has since made his home in this city.

In 1875 Mr. Lavers married Mary Gurnett, a native of Canada, and they are the parents of five children, namely: Henrietta E., Lewis, engaged in the draying business in Bakersfield, Winnifred, Lawrence and Josephine. Politically Mr. Lavers is a Republican. Even during war times, when but few men of his political persuasion were to be found in his neighborhood, he remained loyal to the principles of his party.

RUDOLPH HENRY BAMBAUER. A successful farmer, an active Democrat, and an all-around enterprising man is found in Rudolph Henry Bambaue, a self-made man in the broadest sense of the word, and since 1896 the owner of seventy-nine and three-quarter acres of land three miles south of Newman. Mr. Bambaue is of German ancestry, and his strongest traits are those derived from the fatherland. Born at Columbia, Tuolumne county, Cal., December 16, 1859, he is one of the multitudinous offspring of the men who came to the coast in 1849, and who tarried in the wake of more or less discouraging failure in the mines. His parents, Charles and Adalaide Bambaue, were born in Germany, living in Baden until coming to the United States shortly after their marriage. The elder Bambaue graduated from mining to freighting, and in 1873 located on a farm near Modesto, Stanislaus county, in 1875 removing to one hundred and sixty acres of government land in the western part of Merced county. His land proving unprofitable, he bought forty acres in the Cottonwood district near Newman, improved the same, and remained there for the balance of his life. Of the five sons and three daughters reared in this home Rudolph is the oldest; George lives on a ranch near Newman; Charles lives at Volta, Merced county, and is making a home for his mother, where he and his brother, Edward, conduct a blacksmith shop which is one of the very best equipped shops outside of Stockton; Frank is deceased; Louise is stewardess on a steamer; Mrs. Carrie Russel is a resident of Newman; and Louie lives at Los Banos, Cal.

After leaving the public schools Rudolph Henry learned the butcher's trade in San Francisco, working for Miller & Lux until 1878. He then turned his attention to blacksmithing in Merced for nine years, and after being injured by a horse, and incapacitated for hard physical labor, came to Fresno in 1887, and engaged as a barkeeper until 1892. Purchasing his present farm in 1896, he is devoting it to alfalfa and a dairy of thirty cows, at the same time leasing nine hundred and sixty acres of grain land with his brother, George, and operating the same in partnership. He has been successful as a dairyman and grain raiser, and has accumulated a competence, due entirely to his saving and industrious habits. He has stock in the New Era Creamery Company, and has otherwise invested in lands and enterprises of an upbuilding nature. As a Democrat he is regarded as promising office-holding material, although as yet his efforts have been confined to aiding his friends, and representing his district in state and county conventions. He is a holder of the degree of honor in the Ancient Order of United Workmen, and is otherwise identified with the social life of the county. Mr. Bambaue should regard his past with satisfaction, and his future as full of hope. Should chance turn his steps from farming he could undertake blacksmithing or butchering with every prospect of success, for both of these trades he mastered with the same degree of thoroughness and efficiency which has characterized his every effort in life. He is a highly respected member of the community, and is deserving of credit for the ease with which he has conquered the obstacles which have beset his path.

Mr. Bambaue was married in Merced county to Miss Ella Stahlman, who is the mother of two children now living: Fulton Rudolph and Marvell Ella.

C. C. COWGILL. A native of Iowa, Mr. Cowgill was born near Bloomfield, Davis county, September 24, 1851. His father, Abraham K. Cowgill, was born and reared in Warren county, Ohio, whence in youth he accompanied other members of the family to Indiana and settled on a farm. In 1849 the time news reached his locality concerning the discovery of gold in California, he determined to seek his fortune in the far west. However, on reaching Iowa and finding the soil fertile and land cheap, he was dissuaded from his original purpose and secured a tract of government land in Davis county, where he devoted some years to farming. From there in 1860 he moved to Lancaster, Mo. He remained in Missouri until his death, which occurred August 31, 1882, at the age of fifty-nine years. His wife, who bore the maiden name of Mary J. Bunnell, was born in Warren county, Ohio, in 1825, and died March 31, 1901. Of their marriage four sons and four daughters were born. The fourth of these, in order of birth, was C. C. Cowgill.

Mr. Cowgill settled in Bakersfield, October 15, 1875, and made this town his home, and engaged in the practice of law up to May, 1904.

In 1885 he married Nellie Butler, daughter of Col. Thomas Butler, the founder of Bakersfield. Mrs. Cowgill died two years after her marriage, leaving an only child, Edgar.

May, 1904, Mr. Cowgill moved to the city of San Francisco, where he now resides, and is engaged in the practice of his profession.

THOMAS WOODVILLE HOLDER. The family represented by the city recorder of Visalia is of old southern blood, the progenitors on both sides having been people of influence and worth. One of the most honored of the name was Isaac Newton Holder, a native of the middle part of Tennessee and for years an active practicing physician. On removing to Alabama he settled at Huntsville, Madison county, where he built up an excellent practice. During the year 1843 he removed to Marengo county, Ala., where he was similarly engaged. Finally, however, he decided that he could find more desirable openings elsewhere, and accordingly sought a location in Missouri, where during 1855 he settled in Lawrence county near Mount Vernon. The stirring events of the Civil war seemed to reach a crisis in Missouri, where feeling ran so high that life and property were in constant danger. For this reason he sought a region where the people were, like himself, strongly Confederate in their sentiments, and from 1862 until 1867 he practiced in Arkansas at Rocky Comfort. During the latter year he removed to Texas and took up farm land in Grayson county, where he carried on general farming until his death, in 1889, at seventy years of age. His wife, who bore the maiden name of Martha Mildred Amos, was born in Tennessee and died in Texas in 1865, at the age of about fifty-two years.

Among four sons and one daughter comprising the parental family, Thomas Woodville Holder was their second child and eldest son. He was born at Huntsville, Ala., March 3, 1842, and received his education in private schools in that state and Missouri. At the opening of the Civil war, in April, 1861, he enlisted as a private in the Sixteenth Missouri Infantry, C. S. A.,

and served for four and one-half years, enduring all the hardships of forced marches, insufficient provisions and frequent engagements. When the cause for which he had struggled was abandoned as hopeless and the southern army laid down their weapons he returned to Arkansas and took up farming pursuits in Little River county. However, the state had suffered so severely by reason of the war that he decided it would be best to seek a livelihood further west. Accordingly in 1869 he crossed the plains with teams to California. From October of that year until February of the next year he remained in San Diego county, and then pursued his journey to Tulare county, where he took up land near Visalia. During 1875 he moved into town and for two years engaged in the meat business. In 1878 and 1879 he served as deputy sheriff. On leaving that position he went to his farm near Visalia, where he spent the year 1880, and the following year was at Lemoore, returning to Visalia in 1882, and in 1883 working with a surveying crew. Since then he has held a number of local positions of trust. In 1884-85 he served by appointment as deputy sheriff, and from 1885 until 1888 held the position of deputy county clerk, after which he served for two years as justice of the peace, and then, in 1891, was re-elected for another term of two years. Since 1896 he has held the office of city recorder by successive elections, and in that capacity has proved a capable and trust-worthy official. Active in the Democratic party, he is one of its local leaders and has never failed to give support to the men and measures representing this organization. In fraternal matters he is connected with the Blue Lodge of Masons.

The marriage of Mr. Holder took place in Arkansas in November, 1867, and united him with Sarah Elizabeth Jones, who was born in Arkansas. Seven children were born of their union, namely: Ida; Mrs. Martha Montrose, of San Francisco; Laura, who resides with her parents; Lovina and Russell, both deceased; Royston and Mabel, who are with their parents in the Visalia home.

JAMES WILLIAM FEWEL. Doubtless no resident of Tulare county is more deeply interested in its progress and prosperity than the gentleman whose name introduces this article and who, in addition to maintaining various interests in his home city of Visalia, since November 1902, has filled the office of county tax collector. He is a member of a pioneer family of the west and is himself a native of California, having been born in Sonoma county, February 9, 1861. His father, James M., a native of Tennessee, born September 27, 1825, at an early age accompanied his parents to Missouri, where he resided for a time in Henry county and later in Clay county, eventually in 1849 going to the Indian Territory. The discovery of gold in California caused him to turn his steps toward the Pacific ocean and in 1850 he landed at Dutch Flat, Placer county, this state, where he engaged for some time as superintendent of a mine. In addition he had personal interests in mines that were fairly successful. After five years' experience in the adventurous existence of a gold-seeker he wearied of the work and sought a less exciting occupation. Selecting land in Sonoma county near Windsor, in 1855 he established a home at that place and took up general farming. A man of progressive spirit, he experimented with different products to ascertain what could be most profitably raised. One of his experiments was in the introduction of tobacco, but it did not prove a success. In 1870 he removed to Santa Barbara county, but the next year came to Tulare county, where he has since made his home. For some time he interested himself in raising sheep, but since advancing years have rendered hard labor impracticable he has resided with his son in Visalia.

The marriage of James M. Fewel, in 1855, united him with Miss Melinda E. Prewett, who was born in Missouri and crossed the plains to California in 1850, and who was still a young woman when she died in 1870 in Sonoma county. Two sons and a daughter were born of this union, of whom the latter is deceased. The second child, James William, was educated primarily in Sonoma county, but more especially in the Visalia grammar schools and normal private school. On starting out to earn his livelihood he taught school and then for two years acted as bookkeeper for S. Sweet & Co., of Visalia. While filling a clerical position he had other interests, particularly in the line of buying and selling farm and ranch property. For four years he was employed by the Kings River Lumber Company, as bookkeeper and contractor for their freight delivery, and for three years he acted as grain buyer in Tulare county for the Grangers' Bank of San Francisco. Another industry which necessitated close attention was the buying and shipping of fruit to the San Francisco markets, in which work he engaged extensively during 1899 and subsequent years. In addition he was interested in the Fewel & Anderson Dairy, which he assisted in organizing, but in 1904 disposed of his interest in the plant.

During 1890 Mr. Fewel was united in marriage with Lourena Kellogg, who was born in San Francisco and died at Visalia. The only child of this union is a daughter, Ethel. After the death of his first wife Mr. Fewel was united, in San Francisco, with Daisy D. Simpson, who was born in Newman, this state, and as a girl resided principally at Madera. Two sons bless their marriage, Richard and Allan P. The Democratic party receives the staunch support of Mr. Fewel and it was upon the regular party ticket that he was elected to the office he now fills. By virtue of his birth in this state he is entitled to membership in the Native Sons of the Golden West and his interest in the society has been constant since he became a charter member of the Parlor organized in Visalia in 1884; at this writing he holds the office of vice-president. The Woodmen of the World and Foresters of America also receive his aid as an active member.

GREENBURY M. KELLY. An old pioneer of California, Greenbury M. Kelly is remembered as one of the upbuilders of the agricultural interests of Tulare county, where he located upon his arrival in the state in 1857. A native of Alabama, he was born February 13, 1835, a son of Samuel Kelly, who was a farmer and blacksmith in that state until his removal to Arkansas. In the latter state he located in Jasper and followed the same occupations until his death. His wife, formerly Nancy Self, also died in Arkansas.

The youngest child in his father's family, Greenbury M. Kelly was five years old when he accompanied his parents to Arkansas. He there attended the common schools in his boyhood. In manhood he followed his father's example and engaged in farming. Deciding to locate in the more remote west, he crossed the plains with ox-teams in 1857 and upon his safe arrival settled in Tulare county. For about two months he lived at Elkhorn Station, when he located near Visalia and purchased, in 1860, eighty acres of land which now adjoins the city. He made a success of his work and subsequently bought more land adjoining his property until he owned one hundred and seventy-nine acres. He resided in this location until his death, which occurred May 30, 1884. He was a man esteemed for his many sterling traits of character, a progressive and enterprising citizen. In his political preference he was an active Democrat.

In Jasper, Ark., August 24, 1854, Mr. Kelly was united in marriage with Sarah Jane Henderson, who now survives him and makes her home on the old home place, where she owns ninety acres. She was born in Williamson county, Ill., a daughter of William C. Henderson. He was also a native of Illinois, making that state his home until his removal to Arkansas, where he was variously occupied as sheriff of the county, farmer and in the conduct of a general merchandise store in Jasper, until his death. Of the twelve children born to Mr. and Mrs. Kelly eleven are living, the one deceased, Alta R., being sixth in order of birth. The others are named as follows: Nancy E., the wife of Columbus Fay; Matilda L., the widow of G. M. Caldwell; Malinda E., the wife of M. J. Pasco, of Oakland; William Wilson, of Bakersfield; Martha Ann, the wife of Scott Owen, of Visalia; Clifford Henderson, at home; Ara Ada, the wife of Creed Archer; Julia Isabelle, the wife of Fred Maskal, of Visalia; Arthur H.; Ethel I., the wife of Hewitt Grant, of Visalia; and Earl E., at home. Mrs. Kelly is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church South.

JOHN L. BUTIN, M. D. The genealogy of the Butin family is traced to France, whence during the perilous year following the revocation of the edict of Nantes a Huguenot family of that name fled to Holland. The head of the house, Peter Butin, left a large fortune and lands in France and sought safety on the island of Kat-sand, Holland, where, as in his native land, he followed the occupation of a chemist. In search of a land where freedom of religious faith was offered, as well as an opportunity to earn a livelihood, he came to America and settled in New York state. With him came his son John, who had been born during the residence of the family on the little island near Holland. Some years after coming to this country he settled in Logan county, Ohio, and there followed farm pursuits. Later he became a farmer and large land owner near Burlington, Iowa, where he died. Next in line of descent was William Butin, a native of Ohio, and in early manhood a farmer near Burlington, Iowa, but later a resident of Jasper county, that state, where he improved a farm near Newton and laid out the village of Galesburg. At the time of his death, which occurred in Jasper county, he was sixty-five years of age.

The marriage of William Butin united him with Nancy Scott, who was born in Alton, Ill., and died in Iowa, leaving three children, namely: Layton, a resident of Nebraska; Emma, who lives in Oklahoma, and John L., of California. Levi Scott, father of Mrs. Butin, was born in Cairo, Ill. As a boy he went through a thrilling experience, when his parents were massacred by the Indians and he alone of all the children escaped. During early manhood he took part in the Black Hawk war. At one time he owned the land now occupied by the city of Jackson-ville, Ill., having entered the same from the government. A later location was at Alton, and from there he went to the vicinity of Burlington, Iowa, where he conducted a farm. He built by contract a part of old Fort Des Moines and was otherwise connected intimately with the pioneer days of Iowa. When the first wagon train entered the Willamette valley, Ore., in 1843, he was among the emigrants and settled on the Tualatin plains. When the Indians became troublesome he was among the settlers who formed a company and fought to defend their homes and children. During these skirmishes he was twice wounded by Indian arrows. From the earliest period of his residence in the west he was prominent in public affairs in Oregon. One of the most important services that he rendered was as a member of the first territorial legislature. He carried on a store at Scottsburg, built the first mill there and discovered Scott's Pass, over which he piloted the United States troops. At the time of his death, which occurred in Eugene, Ore., he was ninety-six years of age. His wife had died in Iowa many years before.

At Burlington, Iowa, on the 4th of July, 1855, John L. Butin was born, and grew to manhood on the home farm in Jasper county and received his primary education in country schools. For two years he was a student in the University of Iowa at Iowa City, after which he began the study of medicine under Dr. Faylor of Newton, Iowa. His first course of lectures were taken in the medical department of the University of Iowa and later he was a student in the Northwestern Medical College at St. Joseph, Mo., from which he was graduated in 1882 with the degree of M. D. For a time he engaged in general practice at Dorchester, Saline county, Neb., and from there in 1891 came to California, since which year he has been a practitioner at Madera. In point of years of active professional work, he is the oldest physician in this city. For one term he acted as county physician and for two years served as county health officer. At the time of the organization of the county he was an enthusiastic supporter of the movement whereby it was separated from Fresno county. At different times since coming here he has invested in land, and now owns more than eight hundred acres, divided into three farms, all near Madera and all tillable farm land.* A portion of the property is under irrigation and is utilized for the raising of alfalfa. In politics he is a Democrat and fraternally holds membership with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows in Madera.

While residing in Saline county, Neb., Dr. Butin married Dr. Mary Ryerson, who was born at Wilton Junction, Muscatine county, Iowa, being a daughter of Richard Ryerson, of Holland-Dutch extraction. From his native locality in New Jersey Mr. Ryerson moved to Iowa in early days and settled on a farm. Years later he removed to Nebraska and there died. Excellent advantages were given to his daughter, who was graduated from Wilton College, and also, in 1882, from the Woman's Medical College of Chicago. For a year she was engaged as interne in the Cook County Hospital in Chicago. Returning to Nebraska, she engaged in practice there and for one year was honored with the vice-presidency of the Nebraska State Medical Society. At this writing she holds office as county health officer, and it is said that she rivals all former incumbents of the position in the intelligent discharge of its duties and the care with which she guards the public health.

JACOB NIEDERAUR. Clearly defined against the background of the history of Bakersfield is the strong and useful career of Jacob Niederaur, one of the typical German-American citizens who maintain the dignity and substantial traits of whatever region they call home. A cabinet maker by trade, an undertaker, one of the incorporators and stockholders of the Southern Hotel Company, and one of the first to appreciate the oil resources of this part of the state, he invested his undertakings with a degree of caution and conscientiousness which won confidence, and his death February 9, 1903, is regarded as a distinct loss to a community which had profited largely by his business sagacity and fine personal characteristics.

Mr. Niederaur was nine years old when he came with his parents to America, having been born in Bavaria, Germany, June 15, in 1841. The family located in Bryan, Ohio, where the father, a skilled mechanic, worked at his trade of cabinet maker, and trained his four sons in this useful occupation as soon as they were old enough to handle tools. Jacob found a large field of endeavor awaiting him when he arrived in Bakersfield in 1860, and here his work took on larger scope, including general inside finishing work and the finer details of cabinet making. He was a thorough master of tools and understood the value of an artistic eye, and soon worked up a paying trade, in time becoming the leading cabinet maker and furniture dealer in the Kern valley. Alert to opportunity, he saw the need of an undertaking establishment in the town, and with characteristic energy and forethought set about supplying the deficiency. In time he built and owned one of the finest brick business blocks in the city, the first floor being devoted to his undertaking and furniture business and the second to a large hall. He became a practical undertaker, studying the business from the beginning, and for a long time had no competitors to detract from his trade. He was successful in both departments of activity.

August 6, 1878, Mr. Niederaur married Lucy J. Williams, who was born in Ross county, Ohio, May 10, 1860, but reared in Vermont, to which state her mother moved after the death of her husband. Miss Williams received an excellent education, and when sixteen years old came to Bakersfield as a governess for the children of Philo Jewett, and it was while thus employed that she met and married her husband. Mrs. Niederaur lives in the beautiful Bakersfield home with her two children, Philip Williams and Helen Jewett. Mr. Niederaur was a staunch Republican, but never desired or accepted official favors. Fraternally he was connected with the Knights of Pythias. He led an even and temperate life, impressing all with his sincerity and largeness of heart, his capability and public spirit. One of the pleasing features of his life was his ability to make and retain friends, which he chose with his usual caution, and upon whom he showered the wealth of his fine nature and generous appreciation. One of the staunchest of his friends was Franz Buckreus, also a pioneer of the town, and superintendent of the Kern County Hospital for the past twenty years. Between the two early settlers there was cemented a bond of friendship which time, misfortune or success never altered, and as a final testimony of his faith in his comrade, Mr. Niederaur appointed him his administrator without bonds, and guardian of his children. That the trust will be regarded as sacred, and fulfilled to the minutest detail, admits of no question or doubt. Mr. Buckreus continued the furniture and undertaking establishment of Mr. Niederaur until disposing of the latter to Morton & Conley, March, 1904. The furniture business he sold to George Haberfelde about the same time. Mr. Niederaur left an estate of $70,000, all of which represented honest, painstaking effort, and which in the aggregate is the reward of a self-made man who never lost trace of his high ideals, or strayed from the path of the conservative and painstaking business man.

WILLIAM H. HILDEBRAND. One of the finest dairy, stock and alfalfa farms in Kings county is owned by William H. Hildebrand, who lives eight miles south and three miles east of Hanford, and who is known as a pioneer, and one of the first raisers of alfalfa in this section. Although still in the prime of life, and in the enjoyment of vigorous health, the marked success of this honored rancher enables him to rent his land at the present time, and to temporarily retire from its active management. His life-work is to be measured rather by the extent accomplished than by the time taken to accomplish, for he has ever been a disciple of method as well as industry, and has made every hour and day count for its full valuation. An excellent business man, a good judge of stock, and having an accurate knowledge of the nature and kind of soil comprising his property, he has turned it to the best possible account, and has been rewarded with a substantial yearly income. The greater part of his ranch is under alfalfa, while he maintains a dairy of sixty cows and a family orchard of five acres, besides several acres under vines. His improvements have been dictated by a thoughtful and cautious mind, and embrace only such advantages as have met with the approval of a solid and practical agriculturist.

Mr. Hildebrand comes from the middle west, and was born near Des Moines, Iowa, July 28, 1851. As the name implies, he is of Teutonic extraction, and both his paternal and maternal grandparents were born in Germany. Early settlers in America, they lived in Pennsylvania. Near Johnstown, that state, the grandfather owned a farm upon which Joseph Hildebrand, the father of William H., was born, and where he was reared and trained to thrifty habits. Joseph Hildebrand saw beyond the old farm an era of greater prosperity farther west, and thus became identified with Ohio while it was yet an unsettled country, later moving to Indiana, and still later to Iowa. Still his restless spirit remained unsatisfied, and, while yet the journey across the trackless plains was matter of wonderment and consternation to the minds of prospective emigrants, he started out to explore the west. Leaving home in the spring of 1853, he arrived in California in the fall of the same year, thereafter mining and prospecting in different parts of the state until 1855. He then located in Nevada City where he found everything very expensive, and afterward represented one of two families who were first to settle at Grizzly Hill, seventeen miles from Nevada City. Grizzly Hill was most appropriately named, and was about as wild, picturesque and wicked a community as was to be found in the west at that time. With true courage, the pioneer settler made the best of the situation, and, being on hand at the opening of the mines, gathered in his share of their rich accumulation. In 1856 he settled in the Vaca valley, Solano county, taking up land, and engaging in farming and stock raising until 1860. His next place of residence was near Madison, Yolo county, where he preempted land and engaged in stock raising until 1860. Disposing of this farm, he went to San Luis Obispo county and rented a farm until 1876, when he came to what is now Kings county, and, being advanced in years, divided his time between his son William and his daughter, at whose house he died at the age of eighty-four years and six months. He was a Whig in the early days, and later espoused the cause of the Republican party. He was reared in the Moravian Church, and in that married Annie Harkrader, a native of Ohio, who survived him three years, her death occurring at the age of eighty-two.

Until his twenty-fourth year William H. Hildebrand lived at home with his parents, and during that time found too many duties around the farm to permit of anything but a meager education. For a couple of years he worked by the month in the county, and in 1873 came to Kings county and worked for his brother-in-law, Perry C. Phillips, for a year. He preempted his present ranch near Guernsey, in 1874, coming here a single man with well defined ambitions, and with expectations of making a success as a farmer and stock raiser. Putting up a small cabin, he lived in it for nearly four years, and as soon as the ditch was completed he began the raising of grain. A few years later he experimented with alfalfa, and finding it well adapted to his land, he continued to make it his staple product for many years, being almost the first producer of it in Kings county. In 1881 the humble cabin was supplanted by a more pretentious habitation, to which the owner brought his newly wedded wife, formerly Agnes McNamee, who bore him three children, and who died after a comparatively brief married life. These three children, Clarence E., Everett A. and Alma G., are living with their father. Mr. Hildebrand married for his second wife Alice Chapman, a native of Canada. He is a Republican in politics, but has never wanted nor been willing to accept office of any kind. He is a plain-spoken, straightforward, thoroughly honorable man, a considerate neighbor, and a generous contributor to all worthy causes.

HENRY FORD CONDUCT. Occupying a noteworthy position among the pioneer residents of Kern county is Henry Ford Conduct, who was one of the very earlier settlers of Bakersfield, and is now actively identified with its manufacturing industries as proprietor of the C. O. D. Soda Works. Settling in Bakersfield before the incorporation of the town, when a dozen or so rude shacks were the only buildings in the locality, he has watched with gratification the many wondrous transformations that have since taken place within its borders, and as a worthy citizen, has contributed his full share toward the development and growing prosperity of his adopted town and county. A son of Sidney Conduct, he was born July 5, 1837, in Newark, N. J., of English stock. His immigrant ancestor, John Conduct, who, on the maternal side, was a descendant of Sir Isaac Newton, came to this country some time during the latter half of the seventeenth century, and according to the records purchased land in Newark, N. J., in 1678. Sidney Conduct, grandfather of Henry Ford, was a prominent citizen of Morristown, N. J., being for many years president of a bank. His father, Nathaniel Condict, served as colonel of a regiment in the Revolutionary army, and died of smallpox during the war.

A native of Morristown, N. J., Sidney Condict began his business career as a merchant in Newark, N. J. Removing to Illinois in 1842, he took up land in McHenry county, and was there engaged in agricultural pursuits until his death, in 1854, at the age of fifty-six years. He married Charlotte Reynolds, who was born in New Jersey, and died in Illinois, in 1876, aged sixty-three years. She was a woman of refinement and culture, and a member of the Congregational Church. Her father, Abraham Reynolds, was an officer in the war of 1812, serving as captain of a company, and at one time assistant adjutant general on General Scott's staff. He was afterward a resident of Paterson, N. J., for a few years, and was sheriff of Passaic county. Subsequently removing with his family to McHenry county, Ill., he purchased a large tract of land, to the clearing and management of which he devoted much of his time. He also loaned money, and as a man of great financial ability and integrity acquired much wealth. He was of English extraction, and was familiarly known as Judge Reynolds.

Brought up on the Illinois homestead, Henry Ford Condict attended the district schools until fifteen years old, when he was sent to the Waukegan Academy, where he continued his studies two years. In 1854 he entered the United States Naval Academy, at Annapolis, Md., receiving his appointment thereto from State Senator Washburn, but at the end of three years had to leave the institution on account of failing eyesight, and from 1857 until 1859 remained at home. Coming by way of the Isthmus of Panama to California in 1859, Mr. Condict was engaged in mining in Siskiyou county for more than a year, being fairly successful in his venture. In the spring of 1861 he returned east by the same route that he came, going to New Hampshire, where he had left his wife. Very soon after his arrival he enlisted in Company A, First New Hampshire Light Artillery, as a private, and was elected lieutenant of his company. He was offered the position of captain, but refused the office, not feeling himself qualified for its responsibilities. After the battle of Chancellorsville he resigned, and subsequently went to his old home in Illinois, where he enlisted in Company H, Eighth Illinois Cavalry. During his two enlistments, Mr. Condict participated in some of the more important conflicts of the war, including the second engagement at Bull Run, the battles of Antietam, Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, Gettysburg, and in many lively skirmishes. Although several balls pierced his clothing, and at the battle of Fredericksburg his horse was shot under him, he himself escaped without a wound, and served until the close of the war. His regiment, which was stationed near Washington when Lincoln was assassinated, was sent to Maryland in search of Booth. Mr. Condict was subsequently detailed as clerk to administer the oath of citizenship to all willing to express their loyalty. After participating in the grand review at Washington, his regiment was discharged.

Returning to McHenry county, Ill., Mr. Condict assumed the management of the old home farm, which he conducted for seven years. Desirous of again trying life in California, Mr. Condict arrived in Bakersfield, then a small hamlet, on October 23, 1872, coming from Tipton, a distance of eighty miles, by stage. At once renting the old stage hotel, which was a small shack, the first one built in the place, and which had been used as a tavern only about three months, he ran it for eighteen months, and then sold out. The following two years he had no regular employment, but in 1876 had charge of the ferry across the Kern river, running it for the owner. In 1877 he entered the employ of the proprietor of a small soda works establishment, and, having obtained a good knowledge of the business, he bought out his employer the following year, and has since successfully conducted the works. In April, 1899, his business having so increased that more room and better facilities were needed, he erected his present plant, which he has equipped with all the latest improvements, rendering it in every respect an up-to-date manufactory. In 1878, Mr. Condict also embarked in the draying business, and from that time until August, 1903, when he sold out, he kept three teams busily employed. A man of great enterprise and capability, he has by his own industry, thrift and wise management accumulated a goodly share of this world's goods. On the corner of H and Seventeenth streets he has a very pleasant home, which, with its environments, is most attractive to the passer-by.

On January 4, 1859, Mr. Condict married Nancy J. Young, who was born in Maine, but was reared and educated in New Hampshire. She is of good old Pilgrim stock, her immigrant ancestor having come over on the Mayflower. Mr. and Mrs. Condict have two children, namely: Bertha B., wife of C. L. Hollis, of Fresno, and Charlotte M., a graduate from St. Luke's Hospital Training School for Nurses, at San Francisco, now at home. In national politics Mr. Condict is a Republican, but in local affairs votes for the best men and measures. He served as the first assessor of Bakersfield, and was elected supervisor, but was counted out, although he had fourteen votes to spare. He was one of the promoters, and the first superintendent, of the Bakersfield water works. In 1873 Mr. Condict joined both the Masons and the Odd Fellows, and is also a prominent member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen, which he served as mancier for twenty-three consecutive years, when in July, 1903, he declined a re-election to that office. He likewise belongs to Hulburt Post No. 127, G. A. R., of Bakersfield, of which he was the first commander.

WILLIAM TIPTON WHITE. Personal qualities of a high order are responsible for the business and social success of William Tipton White, general manager of the property and store of Miller & Lux at Los Banos. He speaks Spanish and Italian fluently, and has evidenced in all his walks of life a predilection for the cultured and progressive. Almost continuously since 1862 his family has been connected with the firm which has done so much to promote stock raising and merchandising in the state. Born in Paris, Ky., May 27, 1868, he is the only child of Wade and Mary (Fox) White, natives of Kentucky, and the former a nephew of Wade Hampton, that intrepid and capable politician and Revolutionary general of Kentucky. Wade White was of an adventurous turn of mind. He crossed the plains to California in 1849, and after mining for a short time in Nevada and California, he then engaged in the stock business in the territories until 1862, when he became cattle foreman for Miller & Lux, in the San Joaquin valley. For nearly thirty years he continued in the same capacity, his death occurring in San Francisco in 1901.

William Tipton White came to California with his mother in 1872, and was reared in Merced county. His childhood was filled with responsibility, for at the age of eleven he began to clerk in the store of Miller & Lux, at Central Point, continuing thus about four years. With the exception of a start in the public schools his education was the result of his own foresight and energy. He attended school for two years in Merced, and in San Jose for a couple of years. By saving his money and economizing he was also able to take a course at Heald's Business College, from which he was duly graduated in 1885. In 1887 he became a clerk for M. Goldman, at Merced, and was afterward clerk at the El Capitan hotel in the same town. In the spring of 1890 he returned to the employ of Miller & Lux, as clerk in their store in Los Banos, resigning shortly afterward to engage in business on his own responsibility in partnership with A. W. Drummond and J. E. Place. As manager, he succeeded for three and a half years, then disposed of his interest and became manager of the Los Banos store of Miller & Lux. On account of asthma and generally poor health he resigned in the fall of 1895, and engaged in a general merchandising business in Coulterville, two years later managing a hotel in Jamestown for a couple of years. He acted as manager of the dry-goods and furnishing goods departments for Kutner & Rosenthal, at Madera, for over one year, afterward going to Old Mexico with Hampson & Smith as camp foreman in the construction of the Mexican Central Railroad. This position caused him to visit many parts of Mexico, and resulted in his complete familiarity with the Spanish language. The sojourn in the south further restored his lost health, and upon his return to Los Banos, February 21, 1901, he was appointed manager of the Los Banos store of Miller & Lux, one of the largest establishments in the San Joaquin valley. He has charge of the store, buildings and general belongings of the firm, and has fulfilled his responsibility in a manner pleasing both to his superiors and to the city which long ago arrived at a realization of his worth as a man and citizen.

In Merced Mr. White married Sadie M. Crowell, a native of Stockton, and a daughter of an early settler of the state. Two children comprise the White household, Lester E. and Ethel M. For several years Mr. White has been prominent in Democratic politics, and was formerly a member of the county central committee. He is well known fraternally, being identified with Mountain Brow Lodge No. 82, I. O. O. F., of which lodge he is serving his second term as noble grand; also the Ancient Order of United Workmen; Woodmen of the World and Knights of Pythias, of Madera.

JOHN OUTHET. Ever since the memorable year of 1852 the career of John Outhet has run parallel with the growth of California, for when he arrived after the usual horse-train jaunt of many months, in company with Wolcott Vedder, of Chicago, his condition, both physical and financial, permitted of as much improvement as did the enormously resourceful but undeveloped state in which he was about to take up his abode. He was poor, as were the majority of the courageous men who sought to improve the prospects of themselves and families at terrible risks, yet he had grit and determination, and the moral courage of a New England ancestry. Born in Oswego, N. Y., he was educated in the public schools of the then small town of Chicago, to which his parents removed when he was a boy, and he afterward labored by the day at such occupations as were presented to the settlers who comprised the lake community. Saving his money and living frugally, he joined an emigrant train in the spring of 1852, at times numbering one hundred and twenty-five souls, well equipped, and after one hundred and twenty-five days en route, arrived at Sacramento without any momentous incidents happening on the way, having had no trouble with Indians or outlaws. The horses which he had driven across the plains were turned to still further account after bringing their master thus far, for he engaged in freighting between Placerville and the surrounding camps, among which was Diamond Spring.

Freighting seems to have afforded Mr. Outhet a satisfactory livelihood, for he continued thereat until 1869, after which he came to the San Joaquin valley and engaged in farming by the month until 1871. Having satisfied himself that the soil and climate were to his liking, he invested his earnings in one hundred and sixty acres, to which nucleus of his present farm he added on several occasions, and now owns a whole section in one of the most fertile parts of Stanislaus county. For years he was one of the most industrious men in his neighborhood, setting a rare example of industry and progress, and accumulating quite a fortune from his un-failing harvests of wheat and barley. Latterly he has rented his land and is taking life easy, retaining one hundred and sixty acres upon which to live, and attend to his garden and general wants. He is comparatively alone in the world, having never married, yet finds much enjoyment in life, especially in the companionship of his many friends. Politically Mr. Outhet is a Republican, and fraternally he is identified with the Grange.

MARK BASSETT. Three miles north of Hanford, Kings county, is located the ranch of Mark Bassett, a steady, enterprising farmer, and one who has in many ways added to the agricultural prestige of the community. He was born in Cornwall, England, August 1, 1848, and was reared to manhood upon a farm, where he remained until he was thirty years old. In search of a land where opportunities were greater than in the mother country he crossed the ocean, and locating in Ontario, Canada, engaged in farming rented land until 1891. In the last-named year he came to Fresno county, Cal., and was engaged for about a year in general work, after which he leased land and worked on contract for the next twelve months. He then rented a vineyard of about one hundred acres, where he remained until December, 1894. Following this he rented various tracts until 1898, when he purchased his present ranch, which consists of one hundred and sixty acres of land, about half of which is devoted to the cultivation of fruit, and the balance to alfalfa. He has since given his attention entirely to the improvement and cultivation of his ranch, and has met with success in his undertaking.

The marriage of Mr. Bassett occurred in 1872, and united him with Helena Lander, also a native of Cornwall, and their union has been blessed by the birth of eleven children, namely: Ellen, the wife of Jonas Malott; Mabel; William George, a rancher at Armona; Mark, Jr., working with his father; Thomas John, a rancher in Kings county; Bertha Arline; Edith Annie; Albert Ernest Cecil; Richard Guy; Archibald Leslie; and Harold, who died at the age of nine years. Undesirous of official recognition, Mr. Bassett has never taken an active part in politics, though he endorses the principles advocated in the platform of the Republican party. Both himself and his wife are members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in which he officiates as steward.

SAMUEL WELLINGTON HOWARD. The name of Samuel Wellington Howard is synonymous with the best to be found in country life, with its utility, its charm, its promise, and its bearing upon the progress of the world. Order, system, unflagging zeal and adaptiveness to innovations, the great handmaidens which aid the tiller of the soil, are his by natural right, and he thus has become an influence of worth as a large land owner and grain producer of Stanislaus county. Born on a farm near Racine, Wis., Mr. Howard is the third oldest of two sons and two daughters, and he had the benefit of the common schools of both Wisconsin and Illinois, removing to the latter state with his uncle, Henry Kittinger, when eleven years of age. His parents, Enos and Margaret (Kittinger) Howard, were natives of New York and Pennsylvania respectively, and removed as young people to Wisconsin, where they took up government land and proceeded to make a home in the midst of comparative isolation. The father died on his farm near Racine, and the mother lived to see the glories of the west, living for some time in Redwood City, Cal., where her death occurred at an advanced age.

In McHenry county, Ill., where he lived with his relative until 1867, Samuel Wellington was reared on a farm, and at one time gained some business experience in Green Bay, Wis. In the spring of 1870 he came west to Portland, Ore., and after remaining for two years went to Salt Lake City, from there traveling to California a few months later. Working by the month on a farm in the western part of Stanislaus county, he afterward leased land of about four hundred and eighty acres, to which he added as his grain business increased and he came to better understand the immense fertility of the soil. It was a happy day when he was able to become a land owner in his own right, and at the present time he is the possessor of eight hundred acres near Westley, devoted to wheat and barley, besides managing a tract of twenty-two hundred and forty acres, also under grain. From the first his spirit of progression has seen ever-widening vistas, and the future will doubtless witness his greater identification with a branch of industry that finds so safe a home in this county. He is one of the great grain farmers of the vicinity of Westley, his land reaching to within a mile of the town, he therefore having the advantages of both town and country.

Mr. Howard's appreciation of the advantages of life is nowhere more apparent than in his home, which is the acme of comfort and refinement, and where all that is useful and enlightening is fostered and encouraged. He married Jennie Powell after gaining his start in Stanislaus county, his wife being a native of Ohio, and the mother of four children. Of these, Clarence, the oldest, is agent of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, at Montpelier, Cal.; Evelyn is the wife of Frank F. Raines, night operator of the Southern Railroad Company at Westley; Angie is gifted with musical talent, and is attending the Kings Conservatory of Music; and Hazel is at home. Mr. Howard's political sympathies are with the Republican party, which he has served as a delegate to state and county conventions. He is the friend of education, of organization, of recreations and of those aids to a happy and contented life which lift the farmer of to-day above his toil-hardened and shut-in predecessor.

AUGUSTUS FIFIELD JEWETT. The value of a well-defined purpose steadily pursued, of philosophy in viewing the obstacles and discouragements in life, and of a broad and tolerant attitude toward the world and people in general, find expression in the career of Augustus F. Jewett, one of the conscientious and painstaking fruit-growers of the vicinity of Hanford, Kings county. Mr. Jewett has struggled to his present position with rare courage, worthy of the stern and strong New England ancestry from which he springs and of the training received in a refined and industry-compelling home. He was born in Hillsboro county, N. H., June 15, 1856, and represents a family established in America about two hundred years ago by a forefather who felt the limitations of his ancestral home in picturesque Wales. His parents were Fifield Holt and Melissa L. (Richardson) Jewett, natives of Maine and New Hampshire respectively.

Fifield H. Jewett was a pioneer of 1852 who brought to the Pacific coast the sturdy traits which succeed independent of book education. The Maine farm offered scant opportunity for attending school, but it developed hard muscles and a good appetite, and consequent strength for controlling the circumstances in which he was placed. His dissatisfaction with the east was not surprising when one considers his active mind and commendable adaptiveness, and probably no youth departed for the sun-blessed Pacific shores with more radiant hope in his heart than this New England farm boy. Arriving in San Francisco after a voyage by water to and from Panama, he worked with fair success in the mines at Georgetown on the American river. In 1858 he took up government land in Placer county, in the Sacramento valley, and followed ranching in partnership with Thomas Jenkinson, about four years. He next returned east for his family and brought them to the home he had prepared, and farmed until 1880. Disposing of this property in 1881, he came to what is now Kings county and bought a farm, he also loaned money and dealt in country properties almost up to the time of his death at the advanced age of eighty-five years. His life was dignified by meritorious service for the Union during the Civil war, when he attained to the rank of first lieutenant in the Lincoln Home Guards of the State Militia. He was particularly averse to holding political office, but nevertheless served on the school board for several years, advancing the cause of education to the extent of his power, having often felt the loss in that direction sustained in his own youth. His wife, whom he brought to California in 1863, materially aided his success with her economy and constant encouragement. Her death occurred at the age of sixty-five, and she left two children older than Augustus F., of whom Lucretia is deceased, and Abbie A. is the wife of Thomas Jenkinson, of Kings county.

As a boy Augustus Fifield Jewett dreamed of a career of legal prominence, and mapped out his life in accordance with this desire. After graduating from the high school of Sacramento, he returned to the farm and remained there until twenty-four years of age, when he entered the Hastings Law School, but was soon obliged to leave, owing to the state of his health. Never strong, he practically lost several years of usefulness out of his life, being unable to perform any kind of work requiring physical exertion. Discouragement followed in the wake of months of suffering and inertia, and when he arrived in Hanford in 1886 to visit a sister, his spirits were not only at low ebb, but his financial resources were nearly exhausted. A couple of months served to restore partial strength and vigor, and with it came a desire to be of practical use in the world, and to make up for his enforced years of idleness. Becoming interested in the handling of raisins, he rented a small vineyard, and both grew and purchased grapes, going in debt for all required to prosecute his business, trusting to a future good fortune to aid him in his ambition. He had established credit in desirable directions, and in time was not only able to meet his indebtedness, but began the purchase of land in his own right. In 1889 he packed the first full carload of raisins ever shipped out of Tulare county, for Charles King, and has been in the raisin growing business for himself ever since. He owns a ranch of thirty-six acres half a mile from the city limits of Hanford, of which twenty-two acres are under vines and trees, and the balance in pasture. This property is worth about $300 an acre. He also rents other land, and is increasing his business every year.

For some years Mr. Jewett has taken an active interest in Republican politics, and during 1894 stumped the northern counties in the state in the interests of protection. In Merced county alone he made thirteen speeches. He served as sergeant-at-arms in the California Assembly in 1880, and has held many positions of trust and responsibility. Among his warm personal friends is Senator Perkins, in whose interests he has been unusually zealous. His genial and interesting personality has drawn toward him many other valued friends, and he enjoys a high degree of popularity in political, business and social circles. Fraternaly he is identified with the Woodmen of the World. While acting as trustee of Armona school district he did efficient work in the erection of the public school at Armona. In 1902 he married Edith Shriver, a native of Mariposa county, Cal., and they are parents of one son, Augustus Fairfax. Mrs. Jewett is a daughter of Augustus F. Shriver, a native of Prussia, who came to America with his father when eight years old, escaping from a grave political disturbance in Germany. His early years were spent in the state of Ohio, where he learned the machinist trade, and whence he came to California at the age of nineteen. He was fairly successful in the mines, and about 1859 started a machine-shop and foundry and planing mill at Mariposa, Cal. This he operated successfully for several years, and then removed to Merced, of which he was a pioneer settler and to the upbuilding of which he devoted many years of his life. He had the first plastered house and orange trees in the town, and plied his trade with increasing success. The last years of his life, which were devoted to contracting, he spent in Stockton, Cal., where he died at about fifty-nine years of age. He was a pioneer of both Merced and Mariposa counties, and as such impressed his worth upon many years of their development. In early manhood he married Ellen Gish, a native of South Bend, Ind., and who, after his death, married W. E. Elliott, with whom she is now living in Humboldt county, this state. Mrs. Jewett was six years old when she came to Merced county, and she was a child when her father died. Her education was acquired in the public schools, and her training was such as to develop a loving and home-giving disposition. Mr and Mrs. Jewett are refined, hospitable and gracious people, and in their quiet and harmonious life furnish a lesson in home making, forbearance and kindness.

COURT L. NEWPORT. The enterprise which is a distinguishing feature of the Newport family is reflected in the career of Court L. Newport, a younger brother of William J. Newport and J. B. Newport, mention of whose lives and ancestry may be found elsewhere in this work. The successful horticulturist located six miles northwest of Hanford, and owning eighty acres of rich, productive land, derives considerable satisfaction from the care of his forty-acre orchard and twenty-acre vineyard, and makes a practical study of the best way to achieve the best results. He was born in Lebanon, Warren county, Ohio, March 11, 1858, and through his veins flows the blood of old New England ancestry. As a lad he saw his brother depart for the scene of action during the Civil war, and temporarily his education was suspended owing to the unsettled condition of the country. He was trained to be a model farmer, and to live frugally and with due regard for the future, so that at the age of twenty-six he was the possessor of enough means to enable him to change his sphere of life.

His brother, William J., having come to California in 1873, Mr. Newport followed his example in 1884, arriving in Kings county in due time and finding employment on the ranch of this brother. Four years later he felt justified in establishing a home of his own, and married, November 15, 1888, Ada L. Railsback, daughter of Caleb Railsback, a prominent pioneer of Kings county. Mrs. Newport is a native of California, and received a practical education in the public schools of the state. She is the mother of two children, Alfred Leroy and Ray Corwin. At the time of her marriage Mrs. Newport owned a small ranch, to which her husband has since added, making in all eighty acres. The barren land was not permitted to long retain its crude and useless nature, but was developed and now is covered with fruit-bearing trees and vines, and is one of the neatest and most thrifty little ranches in Kings county. The enterprising owner has spared no expense in making it a pleasant home for his wife and children, and on every side are seen evidences of the care and refinement which is encouraged and insisted on in the household. Some alfalfa is grown on the land not under fruit, and the whole yields a comfortable living, and furnishes a wealth of congenial occupation. Mr. Newport is highly respected by his neighbors, and is one of the intelligent and influential members of his community. Though a Republican on national issues, he takes a broad view of local public affairs and supports the men and measures which in his mind are intended to prove of the greatest benefit to the community. Fraternally he is a member of the Woodmen of the World. He was one of the original stockholders in the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank of Hanford, and has been interested in the development of the oil fields of Kern and Fresno counties, though he has recently disposed of his interests in the latter county, where he held stock in the Esperanza Company.

SAMUEL MILES GILLIAM. One mile east of the city limits of Visalia, on the Cutler bridge road, lies the Dillon homestead, which for years has been the home of Mr. Gilliam. Notwithstanding the fact that he cannot boast of robust body and, indeed, since the death of his wife has been an invalid, he maintains a close supervision of the place, directing the work of farming and dairying. On the one hundred and sixty acres may be found all the improvements of a first-class dairy farm. Of full-blooded and high-grade Holstein cattle he has about eighty head. The land is largely used for pasturage and seventy acres are under alfalfa, while such other crops as are raised aid in providing feed for the fine herd of milch cows. Water for irrigation is obtained from a branch of the Watson ditch.

The Gilliam family was established in California in 1849, when Jesse Gilliam, a Virginian by birth and a pioneer of Clay county, Mo., crossed the plains with his father and prospected in the gold mines. Favored by fate, he accumulated considerable gold in one year and with the fruits of his toil he went back to the Missouri homestead in 1850. One of his brothers, Gen. Niell Gilliam, a soldier of the Black Hawk war, crossed the trackless desert to Oregon as early as 1844 and perished in the Cayuse war in that country. Their father was a brave soldier of the Revolution and belonged to a pioneer family of Virginia. In the family of Jesse Gilliam was a son, Samuel Thompson Gilliam, who was born in Clay county, Mo., in 1828, and accompanied his father to California at the time of the discovery of gold, making the long journey hither with ox-teams. After a year of fair success in the mines in 1850 he went to Oregon and settled on government land in Polk county near Dallas, where he married and began housekeeping. In 1858 he disposed of that property and moved to California, settling near Mountainview, Santa Clara county, and engaging in the stock business. From there in 1860 he went to Tulare county and established his home near Farmersville, but in 1867 removed to a tract of one hundred and sixty acres near Portersville, where he engaged in general farming and stock-raising until his retirement from agricultural labors. Though still occupying the homestead, he rents the land to tenants. While still a young man he was ordained to the ministry of the Cumberland Presbyterian denomination in Oregon and for years he gave much time to the building up of churches, the planting of new congregations and other pioneer religious work. More recently he has had no special charge, but his interest in the preaching of the Gospel remains unabated. For years he has been popular as an officiating clergyman at weddings and few preachers in the west have united in wedlock more couples than his list shows. His activities are further broadened by a keen interest in the Masonic fraternity.

The marriage of Rev. Samuel Thompson Gilliam united him with Elizabeth Lewis, a native of Tennessee, but after 1852 a resident of Oregon, where her father built the first grist mill in Dallas and brought the first mill race into the town. Eight children were born of the union of Samuel T. Gilliam and Elizabeth Lewis. All but two of these are still living, Samuel Miles being the eldest of the six. He was born near Dallas, Polk county, Ore., February 26, 1854, and at four years of age accompanied the family to California. In boyhood he attended school at Deep Creek, where he had A. P. French as a teacher. It is significant of the frontier conditions of the day when the fact is mentioned that this school and one at Visalia were the only schools in the entire county. During 1872 and 1873 he taught school, thus earning the means necessary to work his way through Heald's Business College, from which institution he was graduated in 1874. From that time until 1885 he was a resident of Portersville, where he carried on a small general store, also acted as Wells-Fargo agent and as postmaster. While living in that town he served as school director and for one term, 1882-84, was supervisor of district No. 1. After selling his store he was deputy county assessor under Seth Smith for two years and under sheriff to George A. Parker for one term, after which, beginning in 1892, he served as supervisor of district No. 3 for four years.

The marriage of Mr. Gilliam was solemnized in Visalia in 1885 and united him with Miss Mary J. Dillon, who was born and reared in this city, and died here in 1886. In her death the city lost one of its most estimable women, one whose refinement and kindly disposition endeared her to all. During her illness of fifty-two days Mr. Gilliam took the entire care of her; night and day he was by her side, giving every dose of medicine and striving to alleviate the pain of illness by the most vigilant care. When she died he collapsed and suffered a long illness which left him an invalid. Mrs. Gilliam was a daughter of a Kentuckian, Ewell Dillon, a pioneer of 1852 in Visalia, where he erected one of the first buildings in the future city and homesteaded the tract now occupied by his son-in-law. Fraternaly Mr. Gilliam is a past officer in the Knights of Pythias and for several terms acted as representative to the Grand Lodge from Portersville. As past master workman he is connected with the Ancient Order of United Workmen, and has represented the Portersville lodge in the Grand Lodge of the state. The Democratic party receives his staunch allegiance, and he has aided its local councils through efficient service as chairman of the county central committee, a member of the central committee, and a delegate to the state conventions of the party.

MOSES H. BIXBY. The ancestry of Moses H. Bixby, a well known and progressive vinedyardist of Fresno county, may be traced to the early settlers of New England, and among his personal attributes may be noticed characteristics typical of men mighty in the formation of our government. His paternal grandfather, Albert Bixby, came from England to the United States and settled in Vermont, in the course of time participating in the Revolutionary war. In his family was a son Albert, born in the state of Vermont, in which state he grew to manhood and married Eliza Dearborn, a native of Massachusetts. She came of a distinguished family of New England, her father, a sea-faring man and the captain of a vessel, being the nephew of Major General Daniel Dearborn, of Revolutionary fame. When ninety-seven years old this gallant patriot made the opening speech at the dedication of Bunker Hill monument; his name was also perpetuated by being given to the fort which occupied a spot of land now in the heart of the city of Chicago, Ill. The younger Albert Bixby was a millwright and carpenter, and died at the age of forty years.

Born in Windsor county, Vt., March 5, 1848, Moses H. Bixby was reared and educated in the Green Mountain state. When twenty years of age he came as far west as Illinois, locating in Bureau county, where, for three years, he followed agricultural pursuits. For two years following he was likewise engaged in Taylor county, Iowa. In 1873 he came to California, locating first in Alpine county, where he remained for a period of five years, engaging during this time in logging, carrying lumber to Gold Hill and Virginia City. Removing to Fresno county in 1878, he purchased twenty acres of land—that upon which his home now stands—and through perseverance and continued industry has acquired a competence and has built up for himself an enviable reputation as a vinedyardist of Fresno county. He is now the owner of eighty acres, at the corner of Clay and Elm avenues, about six and one-half miles south of Fresno, thirty-four acres being set to vines, thirty-eight to various fruits, while he also raises some alfalfa. In the year 1903 his ranch produced forty-four and a half tons of raisins. As an enterprising and progressive rancher, Mr. Bixby occupies a position of prominence in the beautiful and productive county wherein he has resided for so many years.

In Illinois, February 9, 1871, Mr. Bixby was united in marriage with Rachel Fulton, a native of Pennsylvania, and four children were born to them, namely: Blanche R.; John H.; Guy C.; and Kenneth, deceased in infancy. Politically Mr. Bixby is a Republican in national politics, his first presidential ballot having been cast for General Grant, but he reserves the right to vote for the man best equipped for public office in local affairs. He is a consistent member of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

DANIEL RHOADS. In Daniel Rhoads California found not only one of its earliest but one of its bravest and most useful pioneers. Told with the skill of a Cooper, his life story would adorn the pages of fiction for all time, representing as it does the extremes of deprivation, suffering and success, possible in a country and at a time which has had no counterpart in the world's history. This plainsman of 1846 was born on his father's farm four miles south of Paris, Edgar county, Ill., December 7, 1821, and comes of English ancestry. His paternal grandfather enlisted for service in the Revolutionary war, eventually being advanced to be bodyguard of Washington. His son, Thomas, father of Daniel, was born in Kentucky, removed as a young man to Mississippi, thence to Illinois, and thence to Missouri, his last home before crossing the plains. Thomas Rhoads married Elizabeth Forster, who was born near Pittsburg, Pa., a daughter of Thomas Forster, of Irish and German descent. Of the sixteen children, ten sons and six daughters born to them, fourteen attained maturity.

Of this large family, Daniel Rhoads remained at home with his father as long as he needed him, accompanying the family to Ray county, Mo., in 1835, and remaining there until his marriage, October 4, 1843, to Amanda Esrey, a native of Clark county, Ill., and daughter of Jesse Esrey. He then established a home for himself on eighty acres of land allotted to him by his father near his own farm, and thus started in life under circumstances more encouraging than had characterized his younger years. His education had been necessarily limited, and his schooling confined to a few months each winter in the schools of Illinois and Missouri, but he was strong bodily and progressive and ambitious. Upon reaching manhood he became interested in an account of John C. Fremont's first trip to California, and he therefore set about making plans to follow the example of this earlier pioneer. Interesting his family and friends in his proposed departure, he outfitted with two yoke of oxen, a wagon, rifle, ammunition and provisions, making the start from home as soon as the snow was off the ground in the spring of 1846. On this journey he was accompanied by his wife, his father and family, his uncle and family and a brother-in-law and family, and during a portion of the time they traveled with other emigrants, bound for the same elusive goal. Crossing the Missouri river April 7, 1846, at St. Joseph, Mo., they entered California by the Donner lake route, passing through Emigrant Gap October 4 of the same year. They were fortunate in escaping any hostile encounter with the Indians, but when near Grand Island, on the Big Platte river, a band of Pawnee Indians managed to stampede all but three of their train of horses, not interfering, however, with their cattle, which they managed to bring through almost intact.

After crossing the Sierra Nevadas Mr. Rhoads' party stopped for a month on Bear river, in the Sacramento valley, to rest from the arduous journey across the plains, and while there made stakes from oak timber, receiving in payment a beef which kept them in meat for some time. For a time Mr. Rhoads worked for Messrs. Grimes and Sinclair near Sutter's Fort, overseeing the Indians, and receiving about $25 a month for his services. When General Fremont started upon his campaign against the Mexicans, all of the men in the party accompanied him but Mr. Rhoads, who was left in charge of the fort. They were a desolate little band at best, maintaining themselves on a scarcity of provisions, and trying to keep up their courage as best they could. Complications ensued in January, 1847, when an Indian runner brought to Sutter's Fort, by letter to Captain Sutter, the news of the suffering of the now celebrated Donner party, and their imminent danger of starvation. The story of this brave but unfortunate band of men, women and children, who left Springfield, Ill., and were overtaken by snow in the Sierra Nevadas just as they were entering the promised land, is too familiar to require recapitulation. Having little at his immediate command, Mr. Rhoads and Mr. Sinclair started at once afoot for Johnson's ranch, fifty miles distant, the boggy condition of the roads, owing to the recent rains, making it impossible to travel by horse. Arriving at the ranch, four days were spent by the men, women, children and friendly Indians in drying beef over fires, barbeque fashion, and in cracking wheat and running it through sieves, the only means of milling in those primitive times. With these supplies, Mr. Rhoads, his brother, John P., and twelve other men and pack animals, laboriously made their way over trackless, rocky ridges and canyons, and across swollen streams to the snow-line on the Piny Ridge, just beyond Steep Hollow. Here the pack-train was left in charge of a boy and man, and the relief supplies were packed the remaining distance of eighty miles on the backs of men on snow-shoes. Three days' travel brought them to Bear Valley, at the head of the Bear river. February 5 the party started for Donner lake, each man carrying seventy-five pounds, including a blanket, hatchet, tin cup to make soup of dried beef, cracked wheat and enough rawhide cut in strips to repair the meshes of their snow-shoes. To carry this weight, and travel on snow-shoes over trackless mountains, required no little courage and perseverance, and at Bear Valley half of the party gave out and declared they could go no farther. Seven, however, determined to proceed to their goal even at the risk of their lives. One of the seven who turned back, upon reaching Sutter's Fort informed Mrs. Rhoads that she would never see her husband alive.

With rare far-sightedness the rescue party provided for their return by tying to the limbs of pine trees small packages of beef and wheat in bits of canvas. As they advanced toward the summit of the mountain, the fall of snow was heavy and in depth from twelve to twenty feet. In the face of this appalling danger, the packs of the seven who ventured to advance were replenished from the packs of the seven who had returned to the pack-train, and for two weeks more these seven toiled on toward the snow-covered huts of the starving and despairing emigrants. At least twelve days were consumed in reaching the summit, some slight advance being made each day, and when within two days' from the summit they reached the head of Donner lake, and the camps came in sight February 18, 1847. The lake was covered with thick ice and snow, and they made their way directly down its entire length to the head of one branch of the Truckee river, still continuing to endure the tortures of cold and insufficient nourishment. During the nights, many of which were sleepless, the problem of building fires on the snow offered great difficulties, and was solved by cutting down small green pines, making platforms of them on the snow, and building the fires of dry limbs upon them. Otherwise the fires would have sunk into the snow to a depth of twenty feet or more. They slept while seated around the fires, leaning against each other, and wrapped in their blankets. As a guide for themselves and others they set fire to the tops of dead trees. On approaching the huts of the emigrants the surroundings were so terribly desolate and lifeless that nothing was left but to conclude that all had perished. At last a faint line of smoke was seen coming out of the snow about sixty yards distant, and in answer to their loud greeting a woman's head arose above the snow from a chute connected with a hut twenty feet below. A second woman, ghost-like in her emaciation, soon followed, and seeing the men approaching exclaimed: "O, are you men from California or from heaven?" In this hut they found not only Mr. Keseberg, who was too feeble to rise, but several others, and at the meeting not a dry eye was apparent. Thirty of their number had already joined the great majority in the camps or in their effort to reach the summit of the mountain, and the only articles of food left were a few pieces of rawhide, and bones which had been boiled for soup again and again.

The situation was relieved at once, two days being spent in distributing the provisions, after which the greater number of the survivors accompanied the seven guides on the return trip, making a party of twenty-one in all. During the first five days out three of the rescued ones died, one an infant, carried for a time in the arms of John Rhoads, the second a young Englishman named Denton, and the third, one of the Donner boys who ate too much dried beef. Just before reaching their pack animals they met another relief train on the way to Donner camp, in charge of James F. Reed and William McCutcheon, and which had been sent from Yerba Buena by command of Commodore Stockton. Upon leaving with their pack-train the Rhoads party had but a day's provisions, excepting to profit by the food they had tied to the branches of the trees on the outward journey. Imagine their dismay at finding that wolves had devoured their precious pitances, and they were practically without food of any kind. The last three days they subsisted on rawhide strips of their snow-shoes roasted to a crisp. Thus was enacted one of the strangest and most thrilling experiences which met the early pioneer of the latter '40s. All connected with the unfortunate Donner party must needs be held in grateful memory, for it was through the sufferings of such that the civilization of the west was inaugurated.

In June, 1847, Mr. Rhoads moved to the Con-sunne river, and the following October to Sonoma county. During 1848 he returned to the Sacramento valley and settled on the Briggs & Burris ranch, a mile below where Galt has since been built, and was employed by Captain Sutter, at Sutter's mill, when gold was discovered there. Two years he mined during the summertime on the American river, taking out about $8,000 in gold dust, and in 1850, accompanied by his wife, he returned to Missouri by way of the Isthmus of Panama. After a brief visit with relatives and friends he returned to the Sacramento valley, and in April, 1851, removed to the neighborhood of what is now Gilroy, Santa Clara county. Purchasing a thousand-acre stock ranch, he lived on it for several years, but finally removed his family to San Jose, while he drove his stock across the coast range to the lower Kings river in 1857. In 1860 he removed his family to the home he had built for them two and a half miles northwest of Lemoore, where he continued to live until taking up his residence in San Francisco in April, 1895.

As early as 1865 Mr. Rhoads sold his stock business and engaged in farming, achieving marked success, and accumulating a comfortable fortune, which he placed in different banks, in real estate, and loans, principally in Fresno and Kings counties. He was a member of the Society of California Pioneers, and formerly belonged to the Grange or Patrons of Husbandry. He was at one time one of the directors of the Grangers' Bank of San Francisco, and he was the pioneer and first president of the Bank of Hanford, a position maintained until a year before his death, December 4, 1895. From the time of its organization until his death he was vice-president of the Bank of Lemoore, and for many years exerted a strengthening and wide influence in financial circles in the county. Politically he was a Democrat, and in religion was identified for many years with the Methodist Episcopal Church South. For some time Mr. Rhoads had been troubled with heart disease, and though his end was sudden it was not unexpected. The day of his passing away he had spent in a pleasant manner in his home in San Francisco, and near its close spoke of being weary. At supper, when about to invoke a blessing, as had been his custom for many years, he grew faint, spoke a few words, and quietly and peacefully passed away. Conscious of his approaching end, two years before he had made minute preparation, building close to his old home near Lemoore a substantial vault in which to take his final rest. He also distributed his property among his children, three of whom are living: Mrs. Mary Kieffer, John W. Rhoads and Mrs. Elvira H. Dawson. His oldest daughter, Sarah, became the wife of John F. Phillips, had a family of six children, and died soon after her husband. These children were reared and educated by Daniel Rhoads and his wife. Mr. Rhoads' body was brought from San Francisco to Lemoore, and his funeral services were conducted December 8, 1895. He was seventy-four years old, lacking three days, and his popularity was attested by the friends and relatives who occupied the two hundred carriages in the funeral cortege. His widow still survives him, making her home in Hanford, where her fourscore years are crowned with good health and spirits.

JAMES U. VAUGHAN. When James U. Vaughan went to Tulare county in 1857 there was little to suggest the prosperity which he himself has helped to bring about. To a man who has gained and lost fortunes, and who yet finds himself one of the substantial and influential men in his community, the distance traversed on the road to success seems immeasurably greater, and the changes by the wayside of far more emphatic and impressive kind. Well does this pioneer recall the atmosphere of desolation which brooded over his pioneer ranch twelve miles from Visalia, of his range for cattle which extended along the river on the south side for twenty miles, and of the vast distances stretching out before him with scarcely a settler to intercept between himself and the horizon. The lowing of his kine was a welcome sound in those days, and a human face and voice were something over which to rejoice. Today Mr. Vaughan enjoys the distinction of being one of the foremost fruit-raisers in Kings county, and formerly his name was associated with equal prominence with extensive stock-raising interests, in San Luis Obispo county. He was one of the organizers and directors of the Old Bank of Hanford, and also holds stock in the First National Bank of Hanford. His activity has pervaded the general growth of the locality, and his influence has been, and still is, of a strong, forceful and progressive nature.

Mr. Vaughan is of English descent, and his family was probably established in this country by his paternal grandfather. His father, Reuben Vaughan, was born in Virginia, and when he arrived at manhood went to Tennessee, where he married Levina Nail, daughter of an Englishman who served under General Haynes in the war of the Revolution. From Tennessee Reuben Vaughan went to Alabama, and from there to Holmes county, Miss., where, September 9, 1841, his son, James U., was born on a farm. Seven years were spent in Louisiana, the family then removing to Texas, arriving in the winter of 1849, and remaining there until starting across the plains with ox-teams in the spring of 1852. Locating on a vineyard in the city of Los Angeles, he lived there two years, then removed to a ranch four miles from the city, where he died in 1856, at the age of fifty-six years. His wife, who was of Dutch extraction, died in California at the age of eighty-four, having reared ten of her thirteen children.

James U. remembers the overland trip to Texas, and from there to California, which he reached at the age of eleven. He was less than sixteen when his father died, and thereafter he and his brothers assumed the management of the farm, in partnership with their mother. From the home farm the youth took a drove of stock to the vicinity of Visalia in the spring of 1857, remaining there comparatively alone on the range for many months. In 1862 he married Sarah Ann Tuel, a native of Texas, who came in 1852 with her mother and stepfather to Mariposa county, and in 1858 to Visalia, where she met her future husband. The young couple began housekeeping under crude conditions, but braved the loneliness and monotony of their surroundings, being rewarded by the business success which came their way. The herd of cattle grew to large proportions, and in 1865 Mr. Vaughan drove his stock to San Luis Obispo county, where he took up land and engaged in the cattle business until 1877. This experience terminated disastrously, owing to severe drouth, and resulted in the death by starvation of from seventeen to eighteen hundred head of stock. In 1878 he went to Arizona and engaged in the cattle business, getting together a large band of cattle and realizing large profits until another drouth swept away about four thousand head. Owning a large range of about fifteen hundred acres, he again started in the cattle business in 1893, and possessed about six thousand head of cattle when he sold his ranch and three thousand head in January, 1902. He then shipped about three thousand head to Fresno county and sold them soon after.

Coming to Hanford after clearing up from $75,000 to $100,000 in the cattle industry, Mr. Vaughan bought three hundred acres of the Bonanza fruit ranch, one mile north of the city, and placed two hundred and fifty acres in fruit, and the balance under alfalfa. He paid $60,000 for his ranch, and he also owns ten acres adjoining the city limits, under vines and fruit, where he also has his beautiful country home. The same penetrating thought, thoroughness and business sagacity which distinguished his cattle industry is apparent in his present occupation, and accounts for the measure of success which has already attended his efforts. He has one of the finest fruit ranches in Kings county, his output consisting of peaches, apricots, prunes and raisin grapes. He is associated in business with his two sons, Andrew H. and William T., each of whom owns a third interest in the fruit lands. His only daughter and youngest child, Lillie A., is the wife of John A. Dunbar of Arizona. Mr. Vaughan is a Democrat in national politics, but independent locally. Fraternally he is a member of the Masonic fraternity. He is a splendid example of the benefits of range life, of a moderate and free and untrammelled existence. The largeness of perception and breadth of mind which has characterized his business undertakings is realized in his physical proportions, for he stands six feet one and a half inches in his stocking feet, and weighs about two hundred and twenty-five pounds. Notwithstanding his losses and discouragements he is invariably genial and optimistic in temperament, having an air of satisfaction derived from having conquered stubborn fate in the race for financial supremacy.

WILLIAM BIGLER CROOP, county clerk of Merced county, is a member of an eastern family that became established in New Jersey and Pennsylvania prior to the Revolutionary war. Originally its representatives in this country were known by the name of Grube and the present form was not adopted until early in the nineteenth century. Peter S., who was born at Easton, Pa., in 1801, engaged in the transportation business on the Susquehanna river and superintended the construction of a portion of the Susquehanna canal. For years he made his home near Tunkhannock, Wyoming county, where he cleared and improved a tract of undeveloped land and served as township supervisor. An old-school Democrat, his political opinions were pronounced and supported by his vote. Though he lived to be past eighty-eight years of age (his death occurring in 1889), he was hale and robust to the last, retaining full possession of his physical and mental faculties. In early manhood he married Julia Sleagle, who was born south of Wilkesbarre, near Nanticoke, Luzerne county, and was a daughter of Adam Sleagle, a native of the same county, descended from an old established family of Pennsylvania. Included in the estate of the Sleagle family was a large farm which proved to be underlaid with a rich vein of coal. Mrs. Croop was a member of the Presbyterian Church, and lived in accordance with its precepts, dying in that faith in 1888, when seventy-three years of age. Of her twelve children all but four are still living, but only three make their home in California, viz.: Zachariah T., an orchardist in Santa Clara county; Mrs. M. K. Taylor, whose home is near Newman; and William Bigler, of Merced. Another member of the family, Stephen D., came to the coast, and died in Merced county. One brother, Cyrus W., now a resident of Allegany, N. Y., was a soldier in the Civil war, and served with a regiment from Pennsylvania.

The seventh in order of birth among the twelve children, William Bigler Croop was born near Tunkhannock, Pa., January 12, 1852, and grew to manhood on the home farm. Until twelve years of age he attended a subscription school near his home, and then was a pupil in a select school at Factoryville for several successive winters, after which he studied one winter in Rushford (N. Y.) Academy, and two years in Wyoming Seminary at Kingston. At eighteen years of age he was given a teacher's certificate and began to teach, following the occupation during the winters in Wyoming and Luzerne counties, and in the summer months working on his father's farm. In June, 1877, he came to California, and after a short stay in San Francisco, proceeded to San Joaquin county. As an assistant in threshing he was employed on Union Island from the 1st of July until October, when he came to Merced, passed the teacher's examination, and secured a school near Snelling. The following year he began the raising of grain twelve miles west of Merced, but two successive failures of crops obliged him to leave the farm; he then clerked in a store at Merced. During the winter of 1880-81 he taught school in Lane county, Ore., and on his return to Merced the spring following he resumed his position in the store. His next work was that of traveling agent for the Southern Pacific land department, in which capacity he engaged in the sale of lands in the San Joaquin and Sacramento valleys. During 1883 he was employed in the bridge and construction department of the Northern Pacific Railroad in Montana and Idaho, returning in 1884 to Merced and from here going back to Pennsylvania, where he remained for six months. The fall of 1884 found him again in Merced, where he engaged in farming for a year. The four following years were spent in the east, and during two years of the time he engaged in the mercantile business with his brother, C. W., at Rushford, N. Y.

While making his home at Rushford, September 1, 1886, Mr. Croop married Miss Grace M. Beecher, a native of Williamsport, Pa., and a member of the family whose most distinguished representative was Henry Ward Beecher. Remotely of English origin, the Beechers became established in America at an early day, and were pioneers in Allegany county, N. Y. On her mother's side she traced her lineage to the Gordons of Scotland. During girlhood she received excellent advantages in Rushford Academy and prior to her marriage followed the profession of teacher. Two children have been born of their union, Ada Adele, born in 1887, and Cyrus William, born in 1890.

A few years after his marriage Mr. Croop disposed of his interests in the east and returned to California, where he spent two years in the bridge and construction department of the Southern Pacific Railroad. From 1891 until 1898 he engaged in teaching in the vicinity of Merced, giving up the work in order to enter upon his duties as county clerk, to which office he was first elected in 1898, on the Democratic ticket, by a majority of two hundred and fifty. At the expiration of his first term he was re-nominated by the Democrats without opposition, nor did the Republicans present any candidate for the office, it being the universal feeling among representatives of both parties that his service had been so successful and efficient, due recognition should be made thereof by his re-election. The fact that he was re-elected without any opposition, receiving the largest vote on the ticket, testifies as to the great appreciation of his worth and ability as a public official. His entire attention is given to the duties of the position, including, in addition to the work of county clerk, that of superior court clerk, and clerk to the board of supervisors. He and his family have a pleasant home on Nineteenth street, where he built the house they occupy. In 1874 he was made a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows in Pennsylvania, and now is connected with Merced Lodge No. 208, in which he is past officer, also from 1900 to 1902 serving as district deputy grand master. In the Encampment he is past chief patriarch, and also has been a prominent officer in the Woodmen of the World. Movements for the benefit of his home town, among them the Merced Improvement Club, receive his hearty support and co-operation, and he is deservedly numbered among the public-spirited citizens of the place.

REV. PETER GERALD GAY. During the days when Oliver Cromwell wrested England's scepter from monarchical sway and established a reformation far-reaching in its influence, the Gay family were established in Ireland, where the possession of large landed estates made them a power among the gentry. Tradition indicates that they belonged to Huguenot blood and historic evidences point to their French extraction. John Gay, who was the owner of the large estate known as Gay Brook, situated in the county of Westmeath, near Mullingar, held a position of influence in that part of Ireland, and was an acknowledged leader in his community. Among his children was a son, John Gay, who was born and reared on the family estate and received his education in Royal College, graduating with the degree of M. D., after which he acted as a steamship surgeon. A fortunate chance, brought about by his recognized ability both as physician and scientist, made him an associate of Dr. Kane in important explorations in various sections of India, where he engaged in professional practice, and he was also located for a time at Cape Town, Cape Colony, Africa, and in Australia. After extended travels and researches in many lands he returned to Ireland and took up the practice of medicine and surgery in Dublin. Since his retirement from professional work he has devoted his time to scientific researches in the quiet of his beautiful country place four miles from Ireland's capital city. During early manhood he chose as his wife Mary Reed, who was born at Carrick Fergus, County Down, Ireland, and traces her lineage to a Scotch family. In County Down her father, David Reed, was born and reared, and there he engaged in the manufacture of cordage. The commercial aptitude which he possessed, and which brought him a fair share of prosperity, came to him less from inheritance than from education and experience. Many of his male ancestors were educators and philosophers and the family talents were toward such studies and professions rather than toward commerce and worldly gain.

In a family originally comprising seventeen children (nine of whom now survive) Peter Gerald Gay was among the younger members and he alone has sought a home in America. He was born in Dublin on New Year's day of 1874. As a boy he attended the Christian Brothers school in Dublin and later took up the study of the classics in Black Rock College, Dublin. From there he was sent to St. Michael's Priory, at Farnborough, Hampshire, England, where for a time he acted as guardian of the crypt where lies Napoleon III and all that is mortal of the beloved and ill-fated Prince Louis, the Prince Imperial of France during the days of the empire. The priory where he was a student owed its existence and support to the benevolence of Empress Eugénie, who in the days of age and loneliness devotes her thoughts to religion and charity. It was his good fortune to study theology and philosophy under the celebrated orator Pere Guillme, and the confessor of Eugénie, Pere Ibos. On leaving the priory in 1893 he entered upon practical mission work as an assistant to Father Bannon in the slums of London. A year later, with faith deepened by the difficulties of his city labors, he returned to Dublin to continue his studies.

On coming to America in 1895 Father Gay traveled through various portions of the States and then matriculated in St. John's University, at Collegeville, Minn., where he was ordained,

June 21, 1897, by Bishop McGolrich of Duluth, to the ministry of the Roman Catholic Church in appointment to the diocese of Los Angeles and Monterey. For a time he was stationed in the Cathedral at Los Angeles and afterward acted as an assistant in different parishes of the diocese, also served as pastor pro tem. of the congregations at Pasadena, Santa Barbara, Santa Cruz and Fresno. A later and very important task was the building up of the parish and church at Santa Paula, Cal., including the renowned mission of Camulos, whose history is interwoven with much of the romance and adventure of early Californian days. In officiating at a marriage ceremony in the Del Valle family, owners of the famous mission, he used the vestments that had been in possession of the family for more than two centuries. Other missions of which he had charge were Newhall, Ravenna and Lancaster. August 11, 1904, he was appointed to St. Mary's Church in Visalia, where he has the supervision of an important parish and also attends St. Aloysius at Tulare, Sultana and Dinuba. At this writing the parish at Dinuba is erecting a new house of worship, the supervision of which remains in his charge. The edifice at Visalia is substantial and commodious, with admirable facilities for religious services. From the days of Father Dade, its first pastor, to the present time, the church has wielded a potent influence upon the lives of the parishioners. Not only is the congregation one of the first established by the Roman Catholics in the San Joaquin valley, but it also has been one of the most influential and prosperous, and the work of its various pastors, culminating in the success of the present incumbent of the pastorate, has been of a high order both from a temporal and spiritual standpoint, contributing to the religious development of Tulare county and to the welfare especially of such as are identified with its communion.

THOMAS H. FRANS. The earliest recollections of Mr. Frans are associated with sights and scenes in California. Although a native of Missouri, born in Buchanan county, May 1, 1853, he was only ten days old when the family left that locality and started across the plains in one of the prairie schooners so familiar to the people of that day. The slow-footed oxen drew the little caravan on their toilsome way through deserts, across streams, over mountains and through still valleys, and finally, after six months of travel, the destination of the pilgrims was reached. In the company were John Bloom Frans, who was born in Kentucky, November 16, 1818, and his wife, whom he had married in Missouri, and who was Elizabeth Fulton, a native of Indiana. With them and their infant son were the father of Mrs. Frans, Richard Fulton, and her brothers, James and Thomas Fulton, all of whom had made a previous journey across the plains during the early days of the discovery of gold. On arriving in Sonoma county, land was secured on the Mark West creek, five miles from Santa Rosa, and there the grandfather died. In 1864 the father sold his farm in that county and removed to Tulare county, where he bought four hundred and twenty acres on the Cutler bridge road, three and one-half miles from Visalia. The property was in a raw state, but through his efforts was brought under cultivation and improved with a neat farm house. Here, after a few years of devotion to general farming and stock-raising, he died October 23, 1870. In religion he was a member of the Christian Church, a man of high principles and irreprouchable character. His wife was born April 4, 1831, and died May 15, 1886. They were the parents of the following children: Thomas H., of Visalia; James M., deceased; Mrs. Emily Parr, who died in this locality; John, Mary and Mrs. Sarah Switzer, all of Visalia; Ellen, who married Edward Hart and resides at Farmersville; and Rebecca, Mrs. Thomas McGovern, who died in this vicinity.

When the family came to Tulare county Thomas H. Frans was a boy of eleven years and afterward his education was pursued in district schools and the old Visalia academy. When he was seventeen his father died, leaving him the eldest of a large family, and the one to whom his mother and the younger children looked for counsel and support. For some years he took charge of the home farm, but when the younger sons became old enough to attend to its cultivation he entered upon independent farming. For fifteen years or more he conducted a large grain farm on the plains. Returning to the old homestead, he purchased the interests of some of the heirs until he acquired one hundred and sixty acres and this he now occupies and cultivates, having sixty acres in alfalfa and the balance in general crops and pastures. The land is entirely low ground, and can be irrigated by seepage, thus rendering it unnecessary for him to resort to flooding, but he has a private ditch connected with the Kaweah river. It is not unusual for him to raise two crops of potatoes the same year, and often he has raised a crop of barley, then planted the land to corn. His speciality is the dairy business, for which purpose he keeps a herd of fine milch cows, and the crops raised are largely fed to his stock.

The marriage of Mr. Frans was solemnized in Visalia and united him with Miss Emma Elizabeth Johnson, whose father, Stephen Johnson, was one of Visalia's early settlers, coming here in 1870. He was a native of Mississippi, as was also his father. Stephen Johnson was killed in the Sierra Nevada mountains. Mrs. Frans was born and reared in Visalia and by her marriage has two children, Ruby Ione and Richard Fulton, the latter a member of the high school class of 1908. The family are identified with the Christian Church of Visalia, to the support of which Mr. Frans has been a generous contributor, as he has also to movements for the welfare of his community and the relief of the needy. In national politics he favors Democratic principles, but in local elections gives his support to the men whom he deems best qualified to represent the people and discharge official duties with uprightness and intelligence.

STEPHEN E. TULLY. To a splendid record as a soldier in the Union army during the Civil war S. E. Tully has added years of practical experience along agricultural lines in Merced and other counties in California, and has succeeded by his earnest, upright and capable nature. Mr. Tully's political sympathies are at variance with those of his immediate ancestors, for the south claimed the ambitions of both his father and grandfather. Samuel Tully was born in old Virginia, and Martha (Vestal) Tully in the Shenandoah valley in the same state. The parents were married in Virginia, and became very early pioneers of Pickaway county, Ohio, then but sparsely settled. The father lived to be fifty-four, and the mother seventy years old. They reared a family of eight children, two of whom are living. Notwithstanding the southern sympathies of the father, the children espoused the northern cause, and two of the sons served in the same regiment, Company C, Seventeenth Ohio Volunteer Infantry; of these, John, the youngest, died in Nashville, Tenn., during the war.

S. E. Tully was born on the paternal farm on the Scioto river, four miles north of Circleville, Pickaway county, Ohio, September 1, 1837, and in early years attended the public schools and the Circleville Academy. At the age of twenty-one he removed to Iowa, and later to Minnesota, spending two years in farming in those two frontier states. Returning to Ohio in 1859, he engaged in farming in Fayette county, and while feeding stock in the afternoon of April 19, 1861, was informed of the firing on Fort Sumter. That evening, after completing his chores, he drove eight miles to Midway, volunteered in Company C, and was mustered in at Camp Anderson for three months. Sent to West Virginia under General MacClellan, he participated in the battle of Rich Mountain, and was later detailed as scout, a precarious service which brought him much adventure and many hairbreadth escapes.

One night on the Little Kanawha, three companies were surrounded by fifteen hundred rebels, but succeeded in holding the enemy at bay for three days and nights, finally being relieved by reinforcements. Mustered out at Danville, at the expiration of his term, Mr. Tully re-enlisted in 1862, in Company F, Nineteenth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, becoming a part of the Army of the Cumberland, and delegated to cover Nelson's retreat. During his second service Mr. Tully was in the thick of the fight in many of the battles during the remainder of the war, including Chickamauga, Dalton, Resaca, Dallas, Kenesaw Mountain, Snake Creek Gap, Peachtree, Lovejoy Station, Jonesboro, Chancellorsville, and Cold Harbor. His experiences were thrilling in the extreme, especially toward the latter part of the war, for at the battle of Stone River he had thirty-two bullet holes in his blanket, and at other engagements he had his hair shot off and his clothes perforated with bullets. Being transferred to the command of General Thomas, he took part in the battles of Spring Hill, Franklin and Nashville, and at the close of the war was honorably discharged at Cincinnati, Ohio, June 14, 1865.

The satisfaction and peace attending the life of the agriculturist was thoroughly appreciated by this brave soldier on returning to Pickaway county, and after farming a year he removed to Shelby county, Ill., remaining there until settling on a farm near Danville, the same state, in 1868. In 1875 he came to Turlock, Cal., and the following year, in January, began to farm in Tulare county, still later purchasing land in Yolo county. In 1886 he located on land in the western part of Merced county, homesteading one hundred and sixty acres seven and a half miles southeast of Los Banos, just outside of the canal. Since then he has engaged in grain raising, and at times has had a thousand acres under grain. Ten acres under irrigation are placed to alfalfa, and it is the intention of Mr. Tully to install an engine and pumps, for irrigating the balance of his farm. He has the best of modern improvements, and his place has the air of being managed by one who thoroughly understands the scientific and practical side of farming.

Mr. Tully is a member of the William A. Seward Post No. 65, G. A. R., of Woodland, and is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Politically he votes the same way that he shot during the war, and ever since has been a staunch defender of the Republican party. In Pickaway county, Ohio, in 1866, he was united in marriage with Mary Pennington, a native of Ohio, and daughter of John Pennington, a farmer of Pickaway county. Six children have been reared in the Tully home, the order of their birth being as follows: Alice, living on the home place;

John, a farmer near Modesto; George, a farmer in the San Joaquin valley; Elmer, a business man of Stockton; Lester, a farmer of Merced county; and Ernest, his father's assistant on the farm. None of the pioneers of Merced county can claim greater honor or consideration at the hands of their fellowmen than Mr. Tully, for his life is conceded to be not only a brave and honorable one, but one into which much success has been crowded, and which has been of incalculable benefit to other strugglers on the highway of existence.

HENRY NEWMAN. Noteworthy among the active and influential citizens of Visalia is Henry Newman, who is most ably and acceptably filling the position of county treasurer of Tulare county. He is an excellent business man, upright and honorable in all of his transactions, and is highly esteemed for his integrity and trustworthiness. A son of Christian Newman, Jr., he was born in Petersburg, Menard county, Ill., November 27, 1850. His grandfather, Christian Newman, Sr., emigrated from Germany with his family, locating in Beardstown, Ill., as a pioneer.

Born in Saxony, Germany, Christian Newman, Jr., came with his parents to America. He followed the business of a butcher in Illinois for a number of years, living in Petersburg and Springfield. Coming to California in 1859, he settled first as a butcher in Bear Valley, Mariposa county, and was afterwards similarly engaged in Turlock, Stanislaus county. From there he removed to Merced county, settling in Merced a short time previous to his death, which occurred, at the age of sixty-six years, in 1874. He married Margaret Schoeneman, who was born in Germany, a daughter of John Schoeneman, who immigrated with his family to this country and settled in Springfield, Ill., where he was engaged in the transfer business until his death. She died in Merced, Cal., leaving three children, namely: Henry, the subject of this sketch; and John C. and William H., both of Stockton, Cal.

Growing to manhood in Springfield, Ill., Henry Newman was educated in the public schools of that city, and in the Christian Brothers' Academy at St. Louis, Mo., where he was graduated in 1869. The following two years he clerked for his uncle, John Schoeneman, proprietor of the Western hotel, in Springfield, Ill. In 1871 Mr. Newman joined his parents in Mariposa county, Cal., and from 1872 until 1874 assisted his father in Bear Valley. Removing with the family to Merced in 1874, he was employed in the El Capitan hotel until September, 1876, when he engaged in business in Stockton.

From 1880 until 1884 Mr. Newman resided in the city of Fresno. In the latter year he came to Visalia, accepting a position in the Palace hotel, and in 1886 was elected, under the old law, as road master of District No. 6, and served for two years. In the meantime Mr. Newman moved to Exeter, Tulare county, and was appointed justice of the peace, to fill out an unexpired term of two years. He was subsequently elected, and re-elected to the same office, which he filled ten consecutive years, for four years of the time, from 1893 until 1897, serving also as postmaster of Exeter, being appointed to the position by President Cleveland. Nominated on the Democratic ticket for county treasurer in 1902, Mr. Newman was elected for a term of four years, and after taking the oath of office, in January, 1903, removed to Visalia with his family, and his home is open to his large circle of friends and acquaintances.

In Stockton, Cal., in 1877, Mr. Newman married Mary F. Rock, a native of Pennsylvania, and they have five children living, namely: Harry C., of Visalia; Mrs. Alice Corono, of Fullerton, Cal.; Mrs. Vera Powell, of Exeter; Leila and Loretta, living at home. Taking a keen and intelligent interest in public affairs, Mr. Newman is an influential member of the Democratic party, and an ex-member of the county committee. In the congressional convention which nominated Creighton, of Fresno, for congress, he served as secretary. While a resident of Exeter he was one of the organizers of the Exeter Board of Trade, which he served for two years as vice-president, resigning the position on his removal to Visalia. He was made an Odd Fellow in 1874, in Merced Lodge No. 208 and is now past grand of Exeter Lodge, I. O. O. F., and is past district deputy grand master of the Grand Lodge; he also belongs to Orange Blossom Lodge of the Rebekahs, of which he is past noble grand; and is captain of Visalia Canton No. 24. In 1871, at Bear Valley, he was made a Knight of Pythias. He is now past Chancellor of Bonnie Brae Lodge, K. P., is ex-representative to the Grand Lodge, and is also ex-district deputy grand chancellor.

JAMES L. JAMESON. Among the representatives of old pioneer families who are carrying on, under more promising conditions, the work undertaken by their sires, mention is due James L. Jameson, a young man of energy and resource, and one of the well-known farmers in Merced county. Mr. Jameson lives three miles southwest of Los Banos, where he owns one hundred and sixty-five acres, all under alfalfa, and developed to a dairy ranch, and he also owns three hundred and twenty acres of grain land above the canal.

Mr. Jameson has lived in California since 1869, having moved here with his father, Zachariah, from Lincoln county, Mo. His first six years were spent on the farm in Lincoln county where his birth occurred January 18, 1863. He was third oldest in a family of six, of whom Susan, the wife of D. M. Wood, of Santa Cruz, William, a large stock-farmer of the vicinity of Los Banos, and James survive. Emma, deceased, was the wife of G. R. Wood, of Santa Cruz.

Zachariah Jameson had the courage to free himself from a prosperous stock business in Lincoln county, Mo., establish a similar business on the west side of Merced county, Cal., and develop land which up to that time was in its primeval condition. For years he was one of the extensive sheep-raisers on the plains and mountains, and at one time owned over a thousand acres under alfalfa, raising a large number of cattle also. At present he resides at 50 South Third street, San Jose, but still owns six hundred acres of land under irrigation, as well as other valuable country and city property. Mr. Jameson was united in marriage with Hannah Bayliss, who died on the old place in Merced county.

James L. Jameson had better educational advantages than fall to the lot of the average country-reared boy. He attended the public schools, and finally entered the state normal, at San Jose, which he left at the end of a two years' course. He started out on his own responsibility at an early age, engaging in stock-raising and farming, and finally purchased the nucleus of his present land holdings. Formerly Mr. Jameson was identified with Mountain Brow Lodge No. 82, I. O. O. F., of Los Banos. In national politics he is a Republican.

HENRY C. HIGBEE was born in Chittenden county, Vt., May 25, 1828, and comes of a family which for many years had been established in the eastern colonies. His paternal grandfather, Elisha Higbee, was born in Connecticut, served in the Revolutionary war, and died in Vermont, to which he had removed several years before. His paternal grandmother, Nancy Higbee, had a somewhat tempestuous youth, having been captured by the Indians when ten years of age, and held by them for a period of five years. Lewis Higbee, the father of Henry C., was born in Vermont, and had a firm character, which partook of the nature of the granite hills among which his youth was passed. Strong and resolute, and knowing no compromise as far as right and wrong were concerned, he was an ardent supporter of education, was a voluminous reader, and an able legislator when representing his district in the state assembly. About 1855 he removed to Beaverdam, Wis., and there engaged in farming for the balance of his life. In his effort to live a wise and consistent life he was ably seconded by his wife, who was formerly Sarah Baker, of New York, and a relative of Ethan Allen, of Revolutionary fame. Mrs. Higbee was a woman of dignity of manner, aristocratic bearing, and unbounded influence in her home and immediate circle of friends. She was greatly beloved for her rare good nature, and for the wisdom and thoroughness with which she reared her eight sons and two daughters, of whom Henry C. is next to the youngest. A reflection of the mother's patience and the father's strength would seem to have been found in the youngest son of the family, who was state superintendent of public institutions of Pennsylvania for nine years, and who was a scholar of remarkable breadth and erudition. Elnathon Elisha Higbee, D.D., LL.D., was a man of ideal character, and according to a memorial of his life, a righteous man, the friend of humanity; as a youth foremost in athletics and sports, and as a man, a scholar, wise counsellor and orator. He was modest withal, and at his death was the most widely beloved man in the state of Pennsylvania.

As a boy Henry C. Higbee had a longing for the west, a desire which he was able to gratify in 1850, when he moved to Ohio, and the following year to Kentucky. In the spring of 1852 he started across the plains from Cincinnati, Ohio, which was then the center of great excitement over the favorable reports of gold which came from the coast. Coming by way of the Ohio, Mississippi and Missouri rivers to Leavenworth, he proceeded by way of the Platte river, arriving at Volcano, Cal., August 15, 1852. For thirteen years he engaged in mining in different parts of the state, spending the last few years in Amador and Calaveras counties, in the latter county investing heavily in copper mines, and eventually losing practically all that he had in the world. With a company of men he started for Arizona in the spring of 1867, but turned back to Los Angeles, and went to the Kern county mines, in the fall of 1867 coming to Visalia, where he made arrangements to purchase four hundred acres of land and engage in the stock business. He now has two hundred and forty acres, twenty of which are under fruit, eighty acres under alfalfa, and the balance under pasture. His home is located three miles south of Visalia, on the Santa Fe Railroad, and has numerous advantages of soil, situation and productiveness. Interest has been shown in the comfortable, pleasant as well as prosperous side of ranching, and the prevailing atmosphere of the home is one of good cheer, hospitality and unbounded good will. Mr. Higbee has been twice married, his first wife having been Martha A. Miles, of Minnesota, who died in California. The present Mrs. Higbee was Catherine Christie, of Schleswig-Holstein, Germany; by this marriage one daughter, Elna C., has been born. Politically Mr. Higbee is a Socialist.

DANIEL W. WALLIS. The ability to concentrate upon a given subject, to master its every detail, and correctly gauge its bearing upon the other industries of the world, has brought a two-fold distinction to Daniel W. Wallis, that of general superintendent of the enormous interests of Miller & Lux at Los Banos, and the reputation of being one of the best judges of horses in the state of California. Marked business ability, control of the resources and usefulness of others, and the power to focus and direct both men and interests, has further aided in his rise to prominence. At the outset of his business career Mr. Wallis had the advantages of good birth, a practical home training, and a good education. Born in Fayetteville, Ala., January 20, 1854, he is a graduate of the Fayetteville Academy and of the San Jose Institute and Business College.

The parents of Mr. Wallis were Daniel and Louisiana (Welch) Wallis, the former a native of South Carolina, and the latter of Alabama. There is martial blood on both sides of his family, his paternal grandfather, William Wallis, and his maternal grandfather, William Welch, both served in the war of 1812, the latter attaining the rank of lieutenant. William Welch served also in the Seminole war in Florida, enlisted from his adopted state of Alabama, of which he was a pioneer settler, and to which he removed from Tennessee. The paternal great-grandfather, John Wallis, was a soldier in the Revolutionary war, enlisting from Virginia, where his entire life was spent. William Wallis changed the spelling of the name from Wallace to Wallis. He was born in Virginia, eventually owned a plantation in the old Dominion, and in time moved to South Carolina, but died in Texas. Daniel Wallis was a boy when his parents moved to Alabama, and for several years he was a merchant in Fayetteville and owned and operated a large plantation both of which he conducted until his death. When Fort Sumter was fired on he chanced to be on the ground, and was appointed a member of the commissary department, a position which he resigned shortly after returning to his home. He thereafter improved the opportunity of contracting for government rifles, axes, saddles, bridles and general equipment, and to this end started factories in different parts of the state, of which he made a distinct success. He died the year after the close of the war, at the age of forty-six years, his wife having died in Alabama in 1857. There were five children in his family, four of whom are living, Daniel W. being the fourth child and only son.

Coming to California in 1871, Daniel W. Wallis completed his education and then engaged in the stock business in Monterey, San Luis Obispo and the surrounding counties, and for three years was located near San Miguel, raising sheep. The years 1876-77 proving disastrous to stockmen, he engaged in the cattle business with Dumphy & Hildreth, managing their extensive cattle interests with headquarters in San Francisco, and traveling throughout Idaho, Utah, and Nevada. Resigning in 1885, he engaged in the horse business in San Francisco, also conducting a large livery business, and at the same time interesting himself in mines in Madera county. The latter venture proving unsuccessful, he entered the employ of Miller & Lux as manager of the Santa Rita ranch, taking the place of Charles Warfield. Mr. Wallis' responsibility included the care of two hundred and fifty thousand acres of land. He resigned the position in 1890 to buy cattle and ship them from Arizona and Nevada, connecting himself with the firm of William Dumphy. At the same time he became manager of the firm's Monterey ranch of thirteen thousand acres, nine thousand of which were under the plow. His next position was with the Spreckels Sugar Company, as superintendent of the Tequiusquito ranch at Gilroy, his duties including the oversight of the ditching and the improvement of the buildings and ranch in general, also the sugar beet industry. Two years later, in 1900, he resigned to accept the superintendency of the Miller & Lux interests at Los Banos, which extend from Dos Palos to Newman, and cover about two hundred thousand acres. The greater part of this land is under the canal, and he has five hundred men in his division. The land is devoted principally to the general cattle business, as well as raising fine horses and mules.

In Nevada, at Battle Mountain, Mr. Wallis married Mattie A. Huntsman, a native of Nevada, and daughter of Dow and Nancy (Greer) Huntsman, natives respectively of Ohio and Missouri. Mr. Huntsman crossed the plains to California in 1847, soon after settling in Battle Mountain, Nev., where he engaged in mining and hotel business. He was a successful and thoroughly practical man, and previous to his death in December, 1903, while mining in the Lehigh valley, Utah, accumulated a competence in money and lands. In the early days, while on a journey to Washoe county, he chanced to meet John Mackey, who was out of provisions, and to whom he gave a sack of flour. Mr. Huntsman is survived by his wife, who still lives at Battle Mountain, and who, with four of her sisters, and her parents, crossed the plains in 1850. The marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Wallis occurred January 30, 1884. They have one daughter, Mary D. Wallis, a graduate of the Lowell high school, San Francisco, and a young woman of high literary gifts. Mrs. Wallis' reminiscences of the early days of Battle Mountain are interesting, and include accounts of many of the notable personages who contributed by their bravery and daring to the opening up of the west. She is a woman of extreme charm of manner, conversational ability of a high order, and great hospitality. Mr. Wallis is a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen, the San Leseur Lodge F. & A. M. of Kings City, Monterey county; the Humboldt Chapter, R. A. M., of Winnemucca, Nev., and the Eureka Commandery No. 2, K. T. Politically Mr. Wallis is a Democrat, and is a member of the county central committee. Both himself and wife are members of Magnolia Chapter, O. E. S., of Gilroy. Mrs. Wallis is a member of the Episcopal Church.

EDWARD E. VINCENT. It is impossible to overestimate the power of the press. As the newspaper finds its way into almost every home, it not only furnishes accounts of social neighborhood happenings and county news, but also presents in brief the issues before state and nation and influences every citizen in formulating decisions concerning important problems before the people. The true journalist has for his ambition not the mere recording of events, but the moral, educational and commercial upbuilding of his community, and it is this ideal that has stimulated Mr. Vincent in his labors as editor and proprietor of the Madera Mercury. When he established the weekly edition in March of 1885, the paper was necessarily very limited in the scope of its influence, for the county was less thickly populated than at the present time. However, as settlers became more numerous the circulation of the paper increased. About 1893 a daily was established, but after an experiment of five years it was discontinued, not being profitable at the time. With the progress made in the next two or three years the editor felt justified in again publishing the daily, and accordingly in 1900 it resumed its appearance in the homes of the people of Madera, appearing in the form of a six-column folio, while the weekly is a seven-column folio. September 28, 1903, the plant was destroyed by fire, but a new office and printing room was at once erected, and is now fitted up with a power press and a full equipment for job work.

Mr. Vincent was born in San Francisco November 1, 1853, and was an only son, having one sister, Mrs. Mary Dauguetger, now of Portland, Ore. His parents, Edward Joseph and Mary Josephine (Petri) Vincent, were natives of France, and came to California via the Horn in 1851. The father, who had previously been employed as a machinist in a surgical manufacturing establishment in France, took up the occupation of a miner on the American river and for almost twelve years followed the adventurous experiences of a prospector and miner in a frontier region. After his return to San Francisco he engaged in business until his retirement, and died in that city in 1881. His wife survived him nineteen years and died in Oakland when eighty-one years of age.

His initiation into the printing business Edward E. Vincent gained at the early age of eleven years and his first work was that of wrapping papers in the office of the Nevada City Transcript. During much of the time for sixteen years he was employed on the San Jose Mercury, where he filled different positions and gained a comprehensive knowledge of type-setting and printing. From that city he came to Madera in 1885 and established the paper with which his name is now inseparably connected. Staunchly Republican in his political views, his paper is the leading organ of that party in Madera county, and, in addition to the work done for the party through the columns of the paper, he has rendered efficient service as chairman of the county central committee. On the organization of Parlor No. 180 N. S. G. W., at Madera, he became one of its charter members and was elected its first president. Another order with which he has been actively connected is the Woodmen of the World. His marriage, which was solemnized in San Jose, united him with Miss Maggie James, who was born in Missouri, and came to California with her father, William James; her mother was a Miss Browning, a sister of Mrs. Knox Goodrich, of San Jose. In the family of Mr. and Mrs. Vincent there are three children now living, Joseph E., James Albert and Kittie.

ARTHUR M. McINTOSH, M.D. A man of scholarly attainments, and a close student of the best medical authorities of the day, Arthur M. McIntosh, M.D., is well fitted for his chosen work, being familiar with modern medical and surgical science as applied to the treatment of the human body and its organs. Though young in years and experience, he has made a most favorable beginning in his professional career, and gives promise of becoming ere long one of the best-known and most successful physicians of Kern county, as well as of Bakersfield, his present place of residence. He was born in Elko, Nev., a son of John McIntosh.

John McIntosh was born and bred in Canada, where he spent the first eighteen years of his life. Immigrating then to the United States, he located first in Elko, Nev., where he found employment as clerk in a general store. He was afterward in business for himself in Carlin, Nev., for twelve years, and then for a few years in Elko. Moving from the latter city to Lovelocks, Nev., he engaged in mercantile pursuits, and as a dealer in dry-goods and gentlemen's furnishing goods is now carrying on a thriving trade. He married Mary H. Munson, who was born in Stockton, Cal.

Spending twelve years of his boyhood days in Carlin, Nev., Arthur M. McIntosh attended the public schools of that city, and after the family returned to Elko entered the Elko high school, from which he was graduated at the age of sixteen years. Taking then the teacher's examination, he received a first grade certificate, and afterward taught school one term. Entering the University of Nevada, he completed the freshman year, in the meantime reading medicine. He subsequently continued his studies for a year at the University of California. In 1896 Dr. McIntosh entered the freshman class of the medical department of the University of California, and four years later, 1900, was graduated therefrom with the degree of M. D. The following twelve months Dr. McIntosh was acting assistant surgeon at the U. S. Marine Hospital at San Francisco, and was afterward resident physician at Waldeck's Sanitarium for a year. Coming then to Vacaville, Cal., he was associated in private practice there for one year with Dr. J. W. Stitt. Locating in Bakersfield in October, 1903, the doctor bought the office furniture, practice and good-will of Dr. Snook, and, as his successor, is winning a fair share of the city and suburban patronage, among his patients being some of the leading people of the community. He is a member of the Kern County Medical Association, of the State Medical Association and of the American Medical Association.

CASSIUS M. BLOWERS. This pioneer rancher of Grangeville precinct, Kings county, claims more than passing notice, as few, if any, have struggled with more disparaging circumstances, and still brought success out of what to the average man would have seemed an impossibility. His introduction to Kings county in 1874 disclosed a sandy desert, practically worthless, but with the establishment of the irrigating ditch, of which he was an earnest advocate, a new order of things was made possible to the pioneer. His ranch is located three miles northwest of Hanford and is valued at $250 per acre.

John O. Blowers, the grandfather of Cassius M., was a native of England and immigrated to the United States at a very early day, settling in Crawford county, Ohio, where he took up land from the government. He made his home there the balance of his life, and passed away at the age of eighty-four years. He was an active worker in the Methodist Episcopal Church and filled the pulpit of that denomination in Bucyrus, Ohio, being the pioneer preacher as well as pioneer farmer of the locality. His son, Lemuel Lane Blowers, was born on the Crawford county farm, making it his home until coming overland to California in 1850. The mines were attracting the newcomers at that time, and he among many others became interested in the mines on the American river. Four years later he took up land in Yolo county, but his death the following year, 1855, when only thirty-eight years old, prevented the consummation of his well-laid plans. His marriage united him with Caroline Foster, also a native of Ohio, and at her death in 1849 she left five children, of whom Cassius M. was the fourth.

Born December 20, 1845, Cassius M. Blowers was only four years old when deprived of the love and care of his mother. When ten years of age he was brought to California by his uncle, R. B. Blowers, who became a pioneer fruit grower of this state, and made the first raisins produced in California. On his uncle's ranch, near Woodland, Cassius M. Blowers spent his boyhood days. When fifteen years old he began life in new surroundings, and for the following eight years was engaged in teaming to Nevada and the mountain districts. His next venture was farming in Yolo county, but in 1874 he transferred his interests to Kings county, which has ever since been his home. He purchased the right to a railroad claim, paying therefor $600. As previously intimated, he found the land in a condition unfit for cultivation, being a sandy waste, and he at once put his shoulder to the wheel and assisted in the introduction of the Lower Kings river, Last Chance and People's ditches, which have been such a boon to Kings county. In 1877 the ditches were completed, and Mr. Blowers planted his farm to wheat, the following year setting out a few vines. This latter venture proved successful, and to Mr. Blowers is given the credit for shipping in box form, in 1883, the first raisins that were packed in what was then Tulare county, but which is now a part of Kings county. To him also is due the credit for having originated the system of having fruit cut by "piece work," paying cutters according to the amount of fruit handled. This system, which was inaugurated by Mr. Blowers in 1886, has since been generally adopted by the fruit growers of California. Mr. Blowers has added to his holdings as opportunity permitted, and now has two hundred and forty acres in the home ranch, forty-eight acres being devoted to vines, seventy acres planted to peaches, apricots and similar fruits, while the balance is in alfalfa and grain. He also owns two hundred and fifty acres in Fresno county, which is devoted to the raising of stock and alfalfa, besides eighty acres in the vicinity of Lemoore, which is planted to fruit, vines and alfalfa.

January 19, 1875, Mr. Blowers was united in marriage with Susie V. McLaughlin, a native of Ohio, and they have eight children, all of whom were born in Kings county on the home ranch. Hulbert Lane conducts a ranch of thirty acres in Kings county; Russell M. is a rancher and fruit raiser, owning thirty acres given him by his father; Olive G. is the wife of George Blowers, who conducts a machine shop in San Francisco; Francis carries on a ranch of fifty acres in Fresno county which was given him by his father; Bessie is the wife of Fred Arther, a rancher of Fresno county; and the three youngest children, Mary, Ralph and Viola Susan, are still at home with their parents. Politically Mr. Blowers is a Republican, and has always taken a keen interest in school affairs, having been a trustee for seventeen years. For about twenty years he has been president of the Last Chance Ditch Corporation, and has also taken an active part in the affairs of the Raisin Growers' Association.

AUGUSTUS MARION FIELD, M. D. To the student of history genealogy forms a most fascinating pursuit. Few vocations are more alluring than to trace the lineage of present generations back through the centuries of the past, and it is to be regretted that the lack of printing facilities in previous ages renders difficult a work that presents so many features of interest. While on his father's side Dr. Field finds the family records incomplete and little can be learned of his ancestry save that they were early and substantial residents of New England, fortunately the record of his maternal ancestry is more accurate and complete. His mother, who bore the maiden name of Sophia Amy Hays, was born in New York state, as was also her father, Corkins Hays, a soldier in the war of 1812, and for years a prominent farmer of Athens county, Ohio, where he died at ninety-six years of age. The wife of Corkins Hays was in maidenhood Amy Dake, and her father, Bartlett, was a son of Bartlett Dake, Sr., whose mother was a sister of George III of England and a daughter of George II. The lineage of Dr. Field can thus be traced back through five generations to one of the famous Georges of England.

Near Independence, Buchanan county, Iowa, Dr. Field was born October 19, 1860, being second among four children who attained mature years. His father, Orrin, was born near Athens, Ohio, where the grandfather, Elisha Field, conducted a blacksmith's shop and a farm. At an early age Orrin Field learned the carpenter's trade and after settling in Iowa he engaged in the building business in addition to improving a tract of farm land. From Iowa he went to Nebraska and settled near Tecumseh and in 1881 came to California, where he followed the carpenter's trade, as well as the occupation of an apiarist. His death occurred near Lemoore, Kings county, at about seventy years of age. During the Civil war he served as a member of an Iowa regiment and always afterward maintained a deep interest in the Grand Army of the Republic. At this writing his widow makes her home near Tulare.

When Augustus M. Field was a boy of nine years he went to Ohio and a year later began to earn his own way in the world, earning a livelihood among relatives of the family in Athens county, where during his youth he learned the builder's trade. In 1883 he went to Kansas and secured employment at his trade first in McPherson and then in Saline counties. When the day's work was ended the evening hours found him with books in hand, diligently endeavoring to acquire the education which had been denied him by stress of poverty. Coming to California in November, 1888, he bought a tract of land near Lemoore, and laid out the property in trees and vineyard, also devoted a part of the farm to general products. While improving the land he worked at the builder's trade as opportunity offered and meanwhile also took up the study of medicine under Dr. W. C. Yates of Lemoore. Later he took the regular course in the California Medical College of San Francisco, from which he was graduated in 1896. After some professional experience gained in San Francisco, he came to Tulare in March, 1897, and has engaged since in a general practice in this city. With a desire to broaden his professional knowledge, especially along the line of his specialties (diseases of women and children), he entered the medical department of the University of Southern California at Los Angeles in 1902, and the following year received his degree from that institution, making him a graduate from the two leading schools of medicine. With high professional aims, he is not content to relinquish his studies, but aspires to keep abreast with every discovery in the science of materia medica. By connection with the San Joaquin Valley Medical Society, by the reading of current medical literature, by a thoughtful study of the varied forms of disease and the different treatments thereof, and, indeed, by every means possible to an ambitious professional man, he has endeavored to attain a skill second to none in his community; and hopes to remain a close student of therapeutics as long as life is spared. Aside from certain interests in stock raising, he gives his whole attention to his profession. While living at Le-moore he married Miss Elnyra Stiles, a native of San Joaquin county, this state, and, like himself, a member of the Baptist Church. The Improved Order of Red Men and Fraternal Aid number him among their members, and he is further connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows at Tulare, having been initiated into that body during his residence in Kansas, where he was an active lodge worker and served as noble grand.

THOMAS B. MATTHEWS. Always a believer in the adage that "a rolling stone gathers no moss," Thomas B. Matthews is an illustration of its truth, for he presents an example of what steady and continuous effort in one channel of endeavor will accomplish, having devoted himself solely to farm pursuits and stock raising. He gave this business his best thought and energy, and as a reward for this singleness of purpose, capable management and business sagacity, he has acquired about one thousand acres of land in Fresno county, Cal., mostly in the vicinity of Selma, and has won an enviable reputation as a successful farmer and stock dealer.

Being next to the youngest in a family of seven children and the only son, Mr. Matthews was born June 19, 1858, in Salem, Mo. His father, Ransom B. Matthews, a Kentuckian, took up his residence in Missouri when he was a very small child, and this continued to be his home until his death in early manhood. He was united in marriage with Miss Buchert Anderson, who was born in Crawford county, Mo. She proved to be a worthy helpmeet, and to her lot fell the rearing and educating of their family, which duties she performed in an exceptional manner. Her last days were spent at the home of her son, in Fresno county, Cal.

The common school education of Mr. Matthews was supplemented by a more thorough course in the Salem Academy, and after leaving school he took up the occupation laid down by his father, and to this business the whole of the intervening years have been devoted. January 10, 1870, he arrived at Kingsburg, Cal., and very soon afterward engaged in farm pursuits there, renting land for two years from the railroad company. In 1881 he purchased an eighty acre tract one mile northeast of Selma, which is now his place of residence. Here he carries on farming in connection with stock raising, and has made a decided success of both lines of business. He handles from six hundred to one thousand head of stock per year, and buys and sells cattle at all times. Having added to his possessions from time to time, he now owns one thousand acres of land near Selma, also a tract at Trimmer Springs, near Kings river. Mr. Matthews has one hundred acres in vines devoted to the raisin grape, and two hundred acres in alfalfa.

By his marriage, in July, 1888, he was united with Annie Allari, who was born in San Francisco, Cal. Two children were born of this union, one died in infancy, and the other, a son, Ransom, was born September 4, 1895. Mr. Matthews has devoted himself exclusively to business and abstained entirely from any participation in public life, yet he has been a supporter in a financial way of public movements tending toward the betterment of his community. As vice president of the Farmers' Bank, and a stockholder of the First National Bank, he holds an indisputable place of prominence among the worthy citizens of Selma. He is also a director of the Fresno Meat Company, and is largely interested in the development of the lumber industry in Kings county. He is a Democrat in politics. Fraternally he affiliates with the Knights of Pythias.

JOHN D. MARTIN. A well-known resident of Tulare county, John D. Martin is actively identified with the advancement of its agricultural prosperity, being the owner of two ranches lying near Visalia. In the improvement of his land he takes pride, and has been quite successful. He belongs to the younger generation of business men, his birth having occurred August 14, 1873, in Saginaw county, Mich., where his father, George H. Martin, was born and reared, and where his grandfather, Philip Martin, was a pioneer settler.

Receiving excellent educational advantages, George H. Martin was graduated from college with the degree of M. D., and entered the medical profession. Removing to Texas in 1881 or 1882, he became a large land owner, and for several years was actively engaged in the practice of medicine, and also served as county clerk for one or more terms. He subsequently practiced law in Arkansas, in the Red River district, and served in the state legislature, but later returned to Texas, and there spent his remaining years, dying in Waco. Dr. Martin married Julia Browning, a native of Texas, and of the children born of this union two sons and two daughters are living. The elder son, Powell Martin, is a rancher in Texas, and John D., the youngest child, is the subject of this sketch and the only member of the family on the Pacific coast. The mother died in Texas.

Brought up in the south, John D. Martin received his education in the public schools of Arkansas, being afterwards graduated from the high school of Waco, Texas. During the days of his boyhood and youth he assisted his father in raising cattle and cotton on the home plantation, there becoming familiar with agricultural pursuits. At the age of fourteen years he began working for the Southern Pacific Railroad, in the bridge department. In 1888 Mr. Martin went to New Mexico, where for a time he was engaged in building flumes for the P. and I. Irrigation Company. Entering then the employ of the Santa Fe Railway Company, he assisted in building bridges in Arizona, between Ash Fork and Prescott. Coming to California in May, 1892, Mr. Martin located first near Bakersfield, but within a month settled near Visalia as a ranchman, working at first for wages. He subsequently engaged in the wholesale wood business in Tulare county, delivering wood in Fresno and Bakersfield. In 1897 he embarked in the wholesale and retail liquor business in Visalia, where he has two stores. He is also actively associated with the agricultural interests of the county, having a farm of four hundred and eighty acres, lying four and one-half miles northeast of the city. This ranch is irrigated by the Mathews ditch, in which he owns a one-eighth interest, and here he raises cattle, horses and hogs, and has two hundred and fifty acres planted to alfalfa. His other ranch, containing three hundred acres, lies six miles south of Visalia, and is devoted to general farming.

In Fresno, Cal., Mr. Martin married Effie Roadcap, a native of Texas, and they have one child, John. Mr. Martin is a true-blue Republican in politics, never swerving from party allegiance.

ALFRED H. BYARS, M. D. Through his recognized skill in the medical profession Dr. Byars of Madera has added luster to an honored name. His father, Gen. William Henry Byars, a pioneer of the Pacific coast, has been so long and intimately associated with the progress of Oregon that, were his life record given in detail, it would be found in many respects to be a history of his state. Born in Iowa, he was early orphaned by his father's death. In 1852 he left the surroundings of his youth to seek a home in the then unknown west. In company with his stepfather, Mr. Meyers, he crossed the plains with ox-teams and after a tedious journey arrived in Oregon. The land upon which the family settled and where they proceeded to develop a farm was situated near Oakland, Douglas county, on the Calapooia river. There he grew from youth into manhood. When Indians became hostile and threatened the lives of the pioneers, he shouldered his rifle and accompanied the volunteers who marched out against them. During the Civil war he was a member of the First Oregon Infantry. In the early days, before railroads had been built, he was employed as a mail carrier between Yreka and Eugene, making the trips on his pony. From that work he drifted into the newspaper business and became editor of the Roseburg Plain Dealer in Douglas county. Removing from that county to Salem, he was elected state printer and also acquired by purchase the Oregon Statesman, of which he was the editor. For one term he served as surveyor-general of Oregon. The various positions which he held were filled with such recognized ability and resourcefulness that he was still further honored in being selected as commander of the Soldiers' Home at Roseburg. After his retirement from that office he returned to Salem, where he now makes his home. While filling all of these important positions, at no time did he sever his connection with or his interest in the work of government surveying and contracting, in which he has built up a reputation for accuracy and painstaking care. In the work of the Grand Army of the Republic he has always taken a warm interest and has been one of the leaders of the organization in his state.

By his marriage to Anna Augusta, daughter of William Slocum, General Byars became associated with an old Kentucky family. In 1852 Mr. Slocum brought his family across the plains from Kentucky, making the trip with ox-teams and settling on a ranch near Myrtle Point, Coos county, Ore. Later he removed to Douglas county and died at Roseburg. During the Indian wars his son, Clay Slocum, bore an active part in quelling the hostility of the red men. General and Mrs. Byars became the parents of three sons and three daughters, of whom two sons and two daughters are now living. Of the sons Alfred H. resides in California and William F. is editor of the Goldendale Sentinel in Goldendale, Wash. In point of birth Alfred H. was third among the children. He was born at Wilbur, Douglas county, Ore., November 8, 1872, and passed his early childhood years in Roseburg, same county, but at the age of eight was taken to Salem, the family having removed to that city. Primarily educated in the grammar schools, he was later a student in the Willamette University and afterward was graduated from Armstrong's Business College in Portland.

On the completion of his classical studies, Dr. Byars began the study of the profession to which his active life is being devoted. Under Dr. Davidson of Fresno, Cal., he gained a preliminary knowledge of the science of materia medica in 1894. For a year he was a student in the medical department of the University of Oregon at Portland and for a similar period acted as interne nurse in the Fresno county hospital. From there he went to St. Louis, Mo., and took his second year's course of lectures in Barnes Medical College. During the summer vacation he was again engaged in the Fresno county hospital, returning in the fall to resume his studies at Barnes Medical College, from which he was graduated in 1898 with the degree of M. D. On his return to Fresno he was appointed superintendent of the hospital with which he had been connected previously, and continued in charge of the institution until 1899, when he came to Madera. Since opening an office in this city he has devoted his attention to his private practice and to his duties as district surgeon for the Southern Pacific Railroad. His home is presided over by Mrs. Byars, who was Annie E. Limbaugh, a native of Fresno county and of pioneer parentage.

Both in local and general elections Dr. Byars supports the Republican ticket. Since locating in Madera he has become identified with the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, of Fresno, and was made a Mason in Madera Lodge No. 280, F. & A. M., of which he served as worshipful master. He is further identified with Yerba Buena Lodge of Perfection No. 1, of San Francisco, Woodmen of the World and Foresters. With high ideals before him for both medicine and surgery, he keeps in touch with every development made in both, and, by the reading of professional journals and by association with the keenest intellects in the professional circles of the state, his own fund of theoretical knowledge is constantly expanding, while at the same time, by means of practical experience in the conduct of intricate cases, he is constantly adding to his professional information and gaining to an increasing extent the confidence of the people of his community. He is a member of Fresno County Medical Society, San Joaquin Valley Medical Society, the Pacific Society of Railway Surgeons and the California State Medical Society.

PAUL GALTES. Few residents of Bakersfield have been identified with the history of the town for a longer period than has Mr. Galtés. When he came here in 1871 there was no railroad. Travelers journeyed to and from in the old-fashioned stage coach. The desert village, with its dozen or more little shanties, presented an appearance far from attractive, yet with far-seeing discernment he believed that success awaited the efforts of those who had the fortitude and patience to endure hardships and surmount obstacles. The experiences that have since come to him prove his judgment to have been sagacious. In establishing himself in business in the town he was greatly aided by his thorough knowledge of the Spanish language, which enabled him to converse with the many Mexicans then resident in this locality.

A native of Spain, Mr. Galtés was born in the province of Catalonia, October 25, 1840, and there in boyhood he became familiar with the manufacture of irons for building purposes. At the expiration of four years' apprenticeship at this trade, when nineteen years of age, he began to work as a journeyman, and in that capacity traveled through many parts of Europe. In 1861 he crossed the ocean to Santiago de Cuba. On the day of his arrival he secured employment as clerk in a large dry goods store and continued for eight years with the same house. When the people in 1868 began to raise a war cry for independence he determined to leave, for he did not wish to take up arms against his native country. For this reason he left Cuba and sailed for Panama, thence proceeding by ship to San Francisco, where he landed December 23, 1868. The appearance of the country pleased him, but he found himself at great disadvantage on account of his lack of familiarity with the English language. On the advice of Archbishop Alamany of San Francisco, who had come from the same Spanish province as himself, he determined to devote some time to study, and accordingly entered St. Vincent's College in Los Angeles, where he devoted four months to language study. At the expiration of that time he secured employment in a bakery in Los Angeles. During the erection of the then leading hotel of the city he aided in the work and on its completion he was appointed steward, having charge of all the supplies. He went to work without asking what his salary was to be. After three months he was paid at the rate of $75 per month. During the fourteen months he continued in the position he carefully hoarded his earnings and when he left there for Bakersfield he had a small sum as a nucleus of his business enterprises.

Immediately after his arrival, in 1871, Mr. Galtés bought one of the shanties that were then utilized for business purposes. By the payment of a small sum he was enabled to secure the privilege of paying the balance in installments. With $600 worth of goods he began in business. Such was his success that by good management and having established a good credit in 1874 he had accumulated $27,000 in general merchandise. In 1878 he erected, at a cost of $18,000, the first brick block in Bakersfield, and there he conducted general mercantile pursuits until 1888, when he sold out and retired from business. Since then he has given his attention to the management of his numerous property interests and to the cultivation of his raisin vineyard of fifty-five acres. In all of his work he has received the co-operation of his wife, whom he married in 1874 and who was Mariana Laxague, a native of France near the Spanish border. Seven children were born of their union, but only four attained mature years. The eldest of these, Paul F., is studying in Santa Clara College, with a view to entering the Jesuit priesthood. The younger son, Felix J., a graduate of Santa Clara College, is now a clerk in the Bank of Bakersfield. The daughters, Amelia and Lucy, are students in the Convent of the Sacred Heart at Oakland, Cal. On the incorporation of the city of Bakersfield Mr. Galtes was elected a trustee, receiving a larger number of votes than any other candidate on the ticket, and during his incumbency of the office he rendered valuable assistance in promoting movements for the benefit of the town. Though loyal to the land of his adoption, he had never displayed a partisan spirit nor has he taken an active part in political affairs, his preference having been to devote himself wholly to his business enterprises. His greatest desire is to see the young men of the country build and own their own homes, realizing the importance and influence it will have upon the coming generations.

JOHN M. HENSLEY. Although not a native of California, the earliest recollections of Mr. Hensley are associated with scenes in this then frontier region. When he was a child of three years his father, J. J. Hensley, who prior to that year (1853) had been a farmer in Missouri, brought his wife and six children across the plains in wagons drawn by eight cows. The family followed the northern route via Salt Lake City and the Humboldt river to Calaveras county, where they established their home. After having devoted some years to mining without favorable results, in 1859 Mr. Hensley moved to Tulare county and embarked in the cattle business. During the fall of 1861 he settled on the Fresno river in what was then Fresno (now Madera) county, where he purchased a tract of raw land and gave his attention to the stock industry. On the Democratic ticket he was elected supervisor of Fresno county and filled the office for one term. His death occurred on Christmas day of 1902. In early manhood he had married Margaret Murray, who was born and reared in Missouri and died in Madera county, October 11, 1898. Her father, Hon. Thomas Murray, was active in the public affairs of Missouri and at one time served as a member of the legislature of that state. When the Hensley family crossed the plains in 1853 he accompanied them and settled at Petaluma, near which town he engaged in farm pursuits. His death occurred at Santa Rosa when he was advanced in years.

In the family of J. J. Hensley there were nine children, of whom one daughter died at five years of age. The others are as follows: Thomas J., a stockman in Madera county; Samuel P., who resides near Raymond, same county; A. H., who resides at the old home; J. M., of Madera; W. C., who remains at the old home farm; P. J., who lives in Fresno county; G. W., a resident of the city of Fresno; and Martha A., who is married and lives in Madera county. John M. Hensley was born in Cass county, Mo., November 10, 1850, and at three years of age was brought to California, passing his early childhood years in Calaveras county. In 1859 he accompanied the family to Tulare county and from there in 1861 moved with them to the Fresno river, six miles from Raymond. When eight years of age he began to help his father on the farm and from that time forward spent much of his time in the saddle.

Starting out to earn his own livelihood at sixteen years of age, Mr. Hensley secured employment with Jonathan Rae, a sheep-raiser. About 1870 he made his first independent venture by starting out in the sheep business for himself. On six hundred and forty acres situated at Woodville, Tulare county, he established a sheep ranch, which he conducted until the memorable dry year of 1877. The drought caused a loss of eight thousand head out of nine thousand and five hundred and so injured him financially that he sold out the balance of the flock. Returning to his old home, he secured several contracts from Fresno county for keeping up the old Buchanan road and for five years served as constable of Madera township. Meanwhile he bore an active part in Democratic politics and his services were recognized by his party in 1888, at which time he was nominated by them for the office of county sheriff. In the election he won by a majority of about five hundred and in January, 1889, took the oath of office, at the same time removing to Fresno to assume the management of the work.

At the expiration of his term of two years he was honored by re-election to the office with a larger majority than before, and continued in the position until January, 1893. In those days the sheriff's office brought unusual responsibilities and even perils, for the Daltons were here and the Sontag and Evans gang were committing constant depredations. With no small satisfaction Mr. Hensley succeeded in arresting Grant Dalton in Fresno, but he escaped after having been put in the Tulare county jail. The officers of the law pursued him into the mountains, where, in an exchange of shot between them and the desperado, Mr. Hensley's deputy almost lost his life. The Daltons were chased out of this county and went to Oklahoma, where they and others of their type were the terrors of that territory until finally they were killed at Coffeyville, Kan.

On the expiration of his second term as sheriff Mr. Hensley returned his attention to the sheep business. The prosecution of this industry took him into Wyoming, Montana and other parts of the west, where he bought and sold in large numbers. After carrying on the business for three and a half years he returned to Madera, in November, 1902, and resumed his residence in this city, which he has considered his home since 1885. The position which he now holds, that of under sheriff, he received by appointment in January, 1903. In religion he is an active member of the Presbyterian Church and one of its trustees. The lady who became his wife in Woodville, Cal., and who has since been his efficient col laborer and counselor, was Harriett R. Monroe, a native of Missouri. Born of their union are five children, namely: Etta, Mrs. A. L. Sayer, of Fresno; Walter J., of Madera; Irving, who is in northern California; and Arthur and Rea, who are with their parents in Madera.

JAMES J. SWEENEY. A representative citizen of Los Banos, James J. Sweeney is owner of a ranch of eighty-six acres adjoining the city, upon which he conducts a dairy, having from sixty to eighty cows, mostly Jersey, Durham and Shorthorn stock. His dairy is equipped with a separator, and upon the land he has erected ample accommodations for his stock. He ships cream to San Francisco and operates a milk wagon in Los Banos to supply his patrons daily. His entire life has been passed in the state in which he now conducts business. He was born in San Francisco May 12, 1861, and since has owed allegiance to the institutions and opportunities of the coast. His parents, Daniel and Catherine (Lombard) Sweeney, were born in county Roscommon, Ireland. His father was a tailor by trade, and in early manhood immigrated to Sydney, Australia, where he plied his trade until 1849. Setting sail for San Francisco, he arrived in California during the fall of that year, but instead of going to the mines he engaged in a draying business in the embryo metropolis. A shrewd and sagacious manager, he accumulated quite a fortune in valuable town property, but like many other men, became the victim of adverse circumstances, and lost practically all that he had attained. His death occurred at the age of fifty-eight years, his wife having died several years before, aged forty-eight. Three of the four children in the family attained maturity, and of these, Patrick is a barber in Dos Palos, and Garrat C. is a contracting plumber, steam and gas fitter in San Francisco.

J. J. Sweeney is a graduate of St. Mary's College, San Francisco, and for a time was book-keeper and apprentice to his brother, G. C., learning the gas fitter's trade. In 1884 he located in Hills Ferry and learned the barber trade under his brother Patrick, and when the town of Newman was started he established its first barber shop. For three years he was thus employed, and in 1890 came to Los Banos and started the first barber shop in this town. Nine years later, in 1899, he disposed of his shop in order to devote all of his time to ranching, having begun to raise sheep in the foothills in 1894. Later he bought four hundred and eighty acres of land thirteen miles southwest of Los Banos, known as the Aqua Fria ranch, which he still owns. A few years ago he disposed of his sheep to engage solely in dairying, and his present gratifying success would seem to warrant the wisdom of his decision at that time. His knowledge of sheep-raising is extensive and thorough, and this ability found recognition in 1903 when he was appointed by the board of supervisors as inspector of sheep for Merced county. He is a Democrat in politics, and is a member of Mountain Brow Lodge No. 82, I. O. O. F., of Los Banos, of which he is past grand; he is also past district deputy grand. Mrs. Sweeney is a member and past grand of the Rebekahs.

The married life of Mr. Sweeney has been a particularly happy one. Mrs. Sweeney was formerly Clara Hoffman, and was born in Alamo, Cal., a daughter of Henry and Elizabeth (Kornman) Hoffman, natives of Baden and Hesse-Darmstadt, Germany, respectively. Henry Hoffman came around the Horn from New York in 1852, and started a restaurant business in San Francisco. Eventually he drifted into the mercantile and hotel business in Alamo. In 1870 he came to Dutch Corners, and built the first hotel in what is now Newman. Here he also conducted a butcher business, later removing to Stockton, where he engaged in the sheep business on a part of the Aqua Fria ranch, having as many as twenty-five thousand head of sheep. Mr. Hoffman built the first hotel in old Los Banos, then known as Dogtown, ran a hotel and butcher business for several years, then returned to sheep raising on his ranch. He next ran a hotel on the old San Luis ranch for ten years, but finally returned to Los Banos, where his death occurred in February, 1892, at the age of fifty-six years. He was a Democrat in politics, and in religion a Lutheran. There were three daughters and one son in his family: Caroline, now Mrs. Gysin; E. H., a plumber by occupation; Clara, now Mrs. Sweeney; and Anna, the wife of Bernard Orogren, of this vicinity. Mrs. Sweeney is an artist of more than local reputation, is also expert with the needle, embroidering with exquisite neatness and coloring, and for many years has been at work upon a silk quilt of varied design, which, when completed, will be a wonder of workmanship and design. The practical things are happily allied with the artistic in the nature of Mrs. Sweeney, for she understands stock-raising and farming, and is her husband's ablest assistant and most earnest sympathizer.

THOMAS J. AKERS. A skillful agriculturist and fruit grower, Thomas J. Akers is carrying on a substantial business in his particular line of industry, his finely cultivated ranch lying four and one-half miles northwest of Visalia. He has been very successful in his methods of farming, and as a grain and peach raiser has gained an enviable reputation throughout this section of the county. From a twelve-acre orchard, in the season of 1904, he hauled one hundred eighteen thousand eight hundred pounds of peaches to the cannery, and these were conceded to be the finest delivered to any of the canneries belonging to the California Fruit Canners association, some of the fruit being by actual measurement four inches in diameter. A native of Pennsylvania, he was born in Wayne county, twenty-two miles south of Honesdale, August 12, 1844. His father, John M. Akers, settled in Wayne county when a young man, removing there from Monroe county, where he was born and brought up. In earlier life he followed the trade of a blacksmith, but was afterward engaged in farming until his death, at an advanced age. He married Mary Jane Nevins, who spent her entire life in Wayne county. Fifteen children were born of their union, twelve of whom grew to years of maturity, and of these eight are now living, three sons and one daughter being residents of California, namely: Mrs. Mary Ann Heberling, of Visalia; R. J., living with his brother, T. J.; Joseph, a blacksmith in Dinuba; and T. J., the special subject of this sketch.

Brought up on a farm, and educated in the district schools, T. J. Akers remained in his native county until after becoming of age. Starting for the Pacific coast in 1866, he sailed from New York City to Aspinwall on the Ocean Queen and from Panama to San Francisco on the Golden Age. At San Jose he formed a partnership with Billy Fitch, and established the first bus line between that city and Santa Clara, giving his patrons a thirty-minute service, in order to do which he kept thirty-two horses. At the end of eight years, in 1874, he sold out to a Mr. Millard, giving up the stage business on account of the rheumatism, which he had contracted by night work and the heavy fogs. For two years afterward Mr. Akers was unable to do any work. In 1878 he came to Visalia, at the time being unable to put on his coat without help, and hired out to a friend, Mr. Burrell, to ride the lines on horseback and keep up the fences. His health immediately began to improve, and within three months he had recovered the use of his left arm, and began driving a six-horse team on the plow. Mr. Akers continued thus employed for eighteen months, and subsequently worked for other stockmen for eleven months.

Wishing to establish a home of his own, Mr. Akers, in 1881, purchased one hundred and sixty acres of land, now included in his present home farm, lying four and one-half miles northwest of Visalia. Beginning at the very bottom, he broke it out, cleared the land, and sowed it to grain, being then the farthest removed from Visalia of any grain-raiser. Plowing deep for his first crop, he harvested twenty-two sacks to the acre, a most satisfactory yield. Meeting with encouraging success, he subsequently bought forty acres of adjoining land, having now two hundred acres in his home ranch, which is sub-irrigated from the St. John's river. He is also a stockholder in the Modoc Ditch Company. He raises grain, alfalfa, cattle and hogs, his farm being one of the most productive in the vicinity, and his estate, on which he erected a fine residence in 1899, being one of the most attractive and pleasant.

In San Jose, Mr. Akers married Mary G. Allen, a native of San Francisco, and they have two children living, namely: Mrs. Clara Housman of Visalia; and Mabel, at home. Mr. Akers takes a keen interest in public affairs, and for three terms of four years each has served as school trustee in the Willow district. In his political beliefs he is a Democrat. While living in Pennsylvania he joined the Odd Fellows, and is now a member of San Jose Lodge, I. O. O. F.

DEMETRIUS J. PRATHER, M. D. Although a comparatively new resident of Bakersfield, Demetrius J. Prather, M. D., has already acquired a fair share of the medical patronage of this locality, and is numbered among the most skillful and successful physicians and surgeons of Kern county. Talented, cultured and broadened by travel and experience, he inspires a feeling of confidence in those with whom he is brought in contact, whether professionally or socially. A son of Thomas F. Prather, he was born September 11, 1849, near Columbus, Ga. He comes from honored southern stock, being, according to tradition, the descendant of one of three brothers named Prather, who emigrated from England to the United States in colonial times, and settled in Maryland. His paternal grandfather, Thomas Prather, a life-long resident of Georgia, was a planter of prominence, and an influential citizen.

Mr Wood

A native of Wilkes county, Ga., Thomas F. Prather was the owner of a large plantation, and kept many slaves. During the Civil war he was captain of a company of militia in the Confederate army, and served throughout the entire conflict, being neither wounded nor taken prisoner, and at the close of the war surrendered. Prior to the breaking out of the war, he had sold his plantation, expecting to come west, and had taken his pay in Confederate money, which was worthless when the war was over. Beginning life anew in 1865, he rented a farm in Georgia, where for a number of years he raised cotton. Moving then to Union Springs, Ala., he there spent his remaining days, dying at the early age of fifty years, in 1873. He married Harriet Brown, also a native of Wilkes county, Ga. She was left an orphan when a little girl, and was brought up and educated by Gen. Robert Toombs, her first cousin. She died when about fifty years old. She bore her husband five children, namely: Gabriella T., wife of William Rankin, of Florida; Julius T., an invalid, residing in Fresno county, this state, was an officer in the Georgia State Reserve Militia during the war of the Rebellion; Anderson T., who died in 1883, aged thirty-five years, served with his brother Julius in the Georgia State Reserve Militia, and both served as guards at Andersonville prison; Demetrius J., the subject of this sketch, and Oscar, who died at the age of twenty-one years.

Spending the days of his boyhood on the home plantation, Demetrius J. Prather attended the village school and academy, laying a substantial foundation for his future education. His parents having lost their entire property, he was forced to work hard to earn his living, and for a while was employed in agricultural pursuits. When twenty-one years old he became clerk in a drug store, and also read medicine for a year. Going then to Mobile, Ala., he attended lectures at the Mobile Medical College, after which he was licensed to practice on a large plantation among the negroes, thus earning sufficient money to complete his medical course. Subsequently entering the Louisville Medical College, he was graduated with the degree of M. D. in the spring of 1876, and for the following seven years was engaged in the practice of his profession in Prescott, Ark. In 1883 Dr. Prather took a post-graduate course at the New York Polyclinic, and then opened an office in Little Rock, Ark., where he remained three years. Going again to New York City, he took a second post-graduate course at the same school in 1886. He then went abroad, and for a year studied in Vienna, Austria. Returning to Little Rock, he continued in active practice there one year, and then made another trip to Vienna, where he again studied, giving special attention to surgery and obstetrics. From 1890 until 1897 he was one of the leading physicians of Little Rock, Ark., but was forced on account of ill health to seek a more favorable climate. Coming thence to California, Dr. Prather remained in Los Angeles six months, and then located in Oakland, where he remained in active practice until February, 1901. Coming to Bakersfield at that time, the doctor has since been in continuous practice here, and has been very successful, his specialty being diseases of women, in which he exhibits rare skill.

In 1879 Dr. Prather married Gertrude Meredith, who died six months after their marriage. Politically he is a straightforward Democrat, and while a resident of Arkansas took a prominent part in public affairs. He was surgeon-general of the state for six years. Fraternally he is a member of the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks. He also belongs to the American Medical Association, to the Alameda County Medical Association and to the Kern County Medical Association. Dr. Prather is a man of good financial ability, and has acquired considerable valuable property, owning a ranch in Fresno county, and real estate in Bakersfield.

HON. MIRABEAU DALLAS WOOD. Active, enterprising, and of great business aptitude and talent, Hon. Mirabeau D. Wood holds high rank among the prominent citizens of Merced, and is ever among the foremost to forward all projects conducive to the public welfare. He is a man of solid worth, and his intelligence and abilities have met with due recognition from his fellow-men, who have elected him to many public positions of importance, in all of which he has served with credit to himself and to the honor of his constituents. A son of the late Igdaliah Wood, he was born May 22, 1846, in Gadsden county, Fla. He comes of English ancestry, his paternal great-grandfather having emigrated from England to the United States in colonial times, becoming a settler of South Carolina.

Born and reared in South Carolina, Igdaliah Wood was educated for the law, and after his admission to the bar was for some time engaged in the practice of his profession in his native state. Subsequently removing to Florida, he purchased a plantation, and was there engaged in agricultural and horticultural pursuits until his death, at the age of seventy-two years. He was a member of the Ancient Free and Accepted Masons, and belonged to the Methodist Episcopal Church. He married Eliza Dixon, who was born in South Carolina, which was also the birthplace of her father, Abel Dixon, a farmer and a soldier in the war of 1812. Her Grandfather Dixon, who was of Scotch descent, served in the Revolutionary war. Of the thirteen children born of their union, twelve grew to years of maturity, and four of the sons served in the Confederate army. The mother died in Florida, on the home plantation.

The youngest of the family of thirteen children, Mirabeau D. Wood, grew to man's estate on the home farm, receiving his education at private schools, and in Mount Pleasant Academy. In 1863 he enlisted in Company K, Sixth Florida Confederate Volunteer Infantry, as a private, and being assigned to General Bragg's division, served in many engagements in Kentucky and Tennessee, covering the retreat of the soldiers out of Kentucky after the battle of Perryville, and being at the front in the battle of Missionary Ridge, Lookout Mountain and Chickamauga. Subsequently taking part in the Georgia campaign, he was commissioned second lieutenant, and at the engagement at Kennesaw Mountain had charge of Company F, whose officers had nearly all been killed. July 22, at Peachtree, Lieutenant Wood was captured and sent as a prisoner to Johnson's Island, where he remained until paroled the following spring, when he returned to his Florida home.

In 1866 Mr. Wood became superintendent of a saw mill, a position that he retained two years. In 1868, at the age of twenty-one years, he was elected state senator, representing Washington and Holmes counties in the Florida senate. Resigning the senatorship at the close of the session, he started for California, and arrived in Sonoma county October 22, 1868, the day of the big earthquake. The same fall Mr. Wood began farming in Stanislaus county. Removing to Merced county in the spring of 1869, he bought six hundred acres of land on Bear creek, near Merced, and for ten years was successfully employed in farming and stock-raising. Going then to Sonoma county, he completed the course in the normal school at Santa Rosa, where he also taught school for some time.

Returning to Merced in 1882, Mr. Wood served as deputy county assessor for a year, and in the fall of 1882 was nominated on the Democratic ticket for county treasurer. Being elected, he served most ably for two years, when he was re-elected for another term of two years, and served, in all, from January, 1883, until January, 1887. Being then elected county assessor, he filled the office with eminent satisfaction until January, 1891. The ensuing two years he was engaged in the grocery business. In February, 1893, being appointed by the board of supervisors as superintendent of Merced County Hospital, he served until February, 1897, giving his entire attention to the duties of his office.

Embarking then in the grain business, Mr. Wood was first bookkeeper for the firm of Balfour, Guthrie & Co., in Merced, but was soon afterward made their agent, and in this capacity has since had entire control of their grain buying, warehouse, lands, etc., in Merced county. He is also carrying on a substantial insurance business, representing the Caledonian and the Fire Association of Philadelphia.

In Merced county Mr. Wood married Annie Rucker, who was born in Missouri, a daughter of A. G. Rucker, and died in Sonoma county, Cal. She bore him three children, namely: George Marvin, who died in Merced; Lou, wife of Bert Crane, of Turlock, Cal.; and Jesse D., engaged in business with his father, having charge of the shipping department. For his second wife Mr. Wood married, in Sonoma county, Maron L. England, who was born in Missouri, but reared and educated in Sonoma county, where her father was a pioneer settler. Seven children have blessed the union of Mr. and Mrs. Wood, namely: Bessie, Dallas England, Marjorie, Barton Dixon, Kenneth Eugene, Carol and Melville. Politically Mr. Wood has always been actively identified with the Democratic party. He was a member and the president of the first board of trustees of Merced, and for one term was a member of the County Board of Education. He is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church South and one of its trustees.

EDWARD GEORGE BURTON. Prominent among the substantial and successful agriculturists of Tulare county is Edward George Burton, of Visalia, a man of more than average ability and business judgment. From a long line of New England ancestors he has inherited those sterling traits of industry, honesty and thrift that are sure to bring success to the possessor, and win for him the respect and regard of his fellowmen. By persevering effort and diligent use of his native talents he has acquired a goodly share of this world's goods and obtained an assured position in the community in which he resides. A son of the late Asa Burton, he was born in Barton, Orleans county, Vt., January 2, 1835, and there spent his boyhood days.

Asa Burton was born in Norwich, Vt., and when a young man was there engaged in business as a clothier. Removing to Barton, Orleans county, he purchased land, and for a few years lived there as a farmer. Removing to Iowa in 1846, he settled near Fort Madison, Lee county, as a pioneer, and for three years carried on general farming. On hearing the glowing reports of the discovery of gold in California he came with the "forty-niners" to this state, and for nineteen months worked in the mines. Becoming ill, he returned to Iowa in 1851, and nine days after arriving home died from fever contracted in Panama. He married Minerva Beach, who was born in Rochester, N. Y., and died in Iowa in 1886. She bore him twelve children, eleven of whom grew to years of maturity, and six of whom are now living, Edward George, the seventh child in order of birth, being the only one on the Pacific coast.

Removing with his parents to Lee county, Iowa, when eleven years old, Edward George Burton obtained his education in the district school and at the Denmark Academy. In the pioneer labor of clearing a farm he assisted his father, remaining at home until attaining his majority. He subsequently taught in the district schools winters, and farmed summers, for four years, after which he began farming on his own account near Denmark, Iowa. Coming to Tulare county in 1885, Mr. Burton bought a ranch of seventy acres lying three miles northwest of Visalia, and here continued in agricultural pursuits. Subsequently taking up a homestead claim on White river, fourteen miles south of Portersville, he resided there nearly four years, during which time he improved a valuable ranch. This estate he still owns, but rents it. On account of sickness while there he returned to his original estate, near Visalia, and has since made this his home. He is largely engaged in stock-raising, breeding cattle, sheep and hogs, and raises large quantities of grain, grass and alfalfa, one half of his ranch being sowed to the latter crop. He is interested in the Modoc Ditch Company, and can irrigate his entire farm, although, being sub-irrigated, it does not need flooding.

In Lee county, Iowa, Mr. Burton married Miss Mary Jane Wren, who was born in Quincy, Adams county, Ill., the daughter of Daniel Wren, a well-known farmer. Mrs. Burton is a woman of culture, and prior to her marriage was a school teacher. Mr. and Mrs. Burton are the parents of two children, namely: Mrs. Edith Weston, living near Visalia; and Arthur, a farmer, residing near this city. Politically Mr. Burton is actively identified with the Republican party, and is a member of the County Republican Central Committee. Fraternally he belongs to the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and to the Knights of Pythias. Mrs. Burton is a valued and consistent member of the Christian Church.

CHARLES H. KINKLER. Among the prosperous and respected farmers and stockmen of Tulare county is numbered Charles H. Kinkler, of Visalia, a man of energy and ability, who is now giving his entire attention to agricultural pursuits. Although a skilled electrician and engineer, he prefers the free and independent vocation in which he is now engaged, and takes great pride and pleasure in the management of his ranch, which bears visible evidence of his industry, thrift and enterprise. He comes of excellent German ancestry, and was born in Philadelphia, Pa., March 29, 1866, a son of John Kinkler.

Emigrating from Germany, his native land, to the United States, John Kinkler settled in Philadelphia as a tanner and currier. He subsequently established a tannery in Quakertown, Bucks county, Pa., where he resided several years. Coming to California in 1882, he settled in San Francisco, and there operated a tannery on the old Mission road. Returning east, he died at Atlantic City, N. J., at the age of seventy-eight years. He married Elenore Seneff, who was born in Germany, and is now a resident of Atlantic City, N. J. Two sons and three daughters blessed their union, and, with the exception of one daughter, all are living.

The youngest child of the parental household, Charles H. Kinkler was brought up and educated in Philadelphia, attending the public schools of that city. From his boyhood he assisted his father in the tannery, and for three years after coming to California was similarly employed. The following three years he was employed as fireman on the steamboats of the bay and river. Returning then to land pursuits, Mr. Kinkler was for awhile chief engineer and electrician in the Chronicle building, San Francisco, and was afterward connected with the Edison General Electrical company as electrician until it was consolidated with the new organization under the name of the General Electric company. Under the new management, Mr. Kinkler continued in the same position, and installed plants in different parts of the state. In 1893 he came to Visalia as manager and superintendent of the company's plant, and served in that capacity for six years, when the plant was sold to the Mount Whitney Power Company.

Retiring from the electrical business in 1898, Mr. Kinkler began ranching on the Andrew Harrell place, and has met with success in his undertakings. Here he farms two hundred and forty acres of land, all under irrigation, and has one hundred and thirty-five acres sowed to alfalfa. He carries on general farming, devoting considerable attention to dairying, for which his ranch is admirably adapted, and has a good-bearing orchard of twenty acres. His farm is one of the best improved in the county, and his machinery is of the most approved modern construction. He has put in a pumping plant, with a steam engine of eight-horse power, with which he runs his silo, does his pumping and grinding, besides using it for domestic purposes.

In San Francisco Mr. Kinkler married Mary

Riordan, a native of that city, and they have six children, Elenore, Ethel, Charles H., Fern, May and Cleon. Politically Mr. Kinkler is a staunch Republican, and an influential member of the County Republican Central Committee. Fraternally he is very prominent in Masonic circles, and belongs to Visalia Lodge No. 128, F. & A. M.; to Visalia Chapter No. 44, R. A. M., of which he is past high priest; to Visalia Commandery No. 28, K. T., of which he is generalissimo; to Islam Temple, N. M. S., of San Francisco; and is a charter member of Visalia Lodge of Perfection No. 9.

JOHN L. CARSON, M. D., AND EMMA M. (NEWCOMER) CARSON, M. D. The medical profession of Bakersfield, Kern county, has among its able representatives John L. Carson, M. D., a physician of skill and acknowledged ability, and his talented wife, Emma M. (Newcomer) Carson, M. D., who has recently obtained her degree, and become actively associated with her husband in his practice.

A native of Illinois, John L. Carson was born in Washburn, Woodford county, and after completing the course of study in the grammar and high schools was graduated from Eureka College. He was subsequently employed as a clerk in drug stores in different places in Illinois and Kansas, and for two and one-half years was in business for himself as a druggist in Conway Springs, Kans. Going then to Chicago, Ill., he studied at Rush Medical College for a year, after which he was in business in Mobile, Ala., for a year, as a pharmacist. Having to leave the south on account of ill health, Mr. Carson came to California, locating in Los Angeles, where he attended medical lectures a year. Returning to Chicago, he then went to St. Joseph, Mo., where he was graduated from the Northwestern Medical College in 1894. Beginning the practice of his profession in Oakland, Cal., Dr. Carson remained there six months, and was afterward in Livermore, Alameda county, two years. In 1896 he removed to Bakersfield, and has here built up a lucrative patronage, his success having been assured from the first. He has a large general practice, and is also surgeon for the Santa Fe Railway Company at this place. He is very active in numerous medical associations, including the following named: the American, the San Joaquin valley, the Kern County, the California State and the International Railway Surgeons' Association.

August 12, 1889, in Los Angeles, Dr. John L. Carson married Emma M. Newcomer, who was born in Vanwert, Ohio, the daughter of a prominent merchant and capitalist. Her mother, who was the daughter of a physician of note, and had three brothers that were practicing physicians, was herself a graduate of both the old school and the homeopathic medical colleges, but never practiced medicine. Miss Newcomer was graduated from the Vanwert high school, and from her earliest days had greatly desired to study medicine. In 1885, on account of her health, she came to Los Angeles, and soon after began to read medicine. Owing to the urgent solicitations of her friends, she dropped the study for awhile, but resumed it in the winter of 1888 and 1889. In the fall of 1893 Mrs. Carson entered the medical college at St. Joseph, Mo., and continued her studies there for awhile, but was again persuaded to relinquish them. In 1900, determining to complete her medical education, she entered the College of Physicians and Surgeons in San Francisco, and remained there until the spring of 1903. Anxious then to finish her course of study as soon as possible, she entered the Illinois State Medical College, in Chicago, and at the close of the summer term was graduated with honors. Returning to Bakersfield, Dr. Emma M. (Newcomer) Carson immediately began the practice of her profession with her husband, and being a woman of rare culture, talent and judgment, will doubtless henceforth share with him the successes and honors of their professional lives. The Drs. Carson have a finely equipped office, among other things of use to them in their profession being a sixteen-plate static machine, the only one in Kern county. Dr. John L. Carson is a prominent member of the Masonic fraternity, and is also a member of the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks.

WILLIAM CALCOTE. Four and one-half miles northeast of Visalia, on Elbow creek, lies the valuable farm which is the home of Mr. Calcote and which was his birthplace as well. Few of the men now prominent in agricultural affairs in Tulare county are native-born citizens thereof, the majority having come from the east or from other parts of California; hence in his life an instance is furnished as yet seldom seen in any portion of the county. Having passed his entire life within the limits of the county, he is not only intimately acquainted with its people, but in addition has gained a thorough knowledge of the possibilities of its soil and its opportunities for those desiring to earn a livelihood.

The Calcote family is of southern extraction. In the family of Stephen Calcote, who was a farmer and a soldier in the war of 1812, there were nine children, but one alone survives, A. K., a native of Madison county, Miss., born near Canton, February 11, 1830. On account of being left an orphan at eight years of age he was early forced to earn his own livelihood and thus was prevented from gaining the education he greatly desired. After having passed the years of youth upon a Mississippi farm, in the fall of 1851 he removed to Marshall, Tex., where he followed teaming. From there in 1854 he crossed the plains with ox-teams, journeying via El Paso and Tucson to Visalia, where he arrived December 15, 1854. Later, during almost three years spent in the mines of Mariposa county, he met with fair success, and thus earned a capital sufficient to enable him to establish a home of his own. Returning to Tulare county, he was here married, September 1, 1856, to Miss Delila Harrell, who was born in Texas, and died in Tulare county, Cal., April 21, 1903. For years he cultivated his home farm on Elbow creek, where he made a specialty of stock-raising, but in 1901 he sold the place to his son, William, and has since lived retired from active labors. Ever since attaining his majority he has voted the Democratic ticket and has been a staunch supporter of party principles. Throughout the community where for years he has been a well-known farmer he bears the reputation of a progressive citizen, capable agriculturist and honorable man.

In the family of A. K. Calcote there were eleven children, eight of whom attained manhood and womanhood, viz.: William, the subject of this article; Henry, who owns a farm adjoining the old homestead; Jackson, who died in 1890, at the age of twenty-two years; Jefferson, a farmer in Sonoma county; Mrs. Mary Ledbetter, of Orosi, Tulare county; Ellen, wife of James Hill, and Daniel, both residents of Visalia; and Mrs. Etta Fenley, who lives in this county. On the farm where he now resides William Calcote was born December 31, 1857, and here as a boy he gained a thorough knowledge of agriculture in all of its details. The school where he studied the three R's stands on his father's farm, and he was a pupil there whenever he could be spared from the farm work. On starting out to earn his own livelihood at twenty-one years of age he engaged in grain farming, but later made a specialty of the stock business. In 1890 he bought one hundred and sixty acres thirteen miles northeast of Portersville, Tulare county. The land is irrigated by the Pleasant valley ditch and he was one of the directors of the company owning the ditch as long as he made his home there. Immediately after establishing his home on that place he began to set out fruit trees and finally had twenty acres in an orchard, of which four acres were in apples, three in prunes, ten in navel oranges, and the balance in different varieties. Twelve acres were under alfalfa and the remainder of the land was utilized for grain, which was raised by means of irrigation. On purchasing the old homestead he returned here in 1901 and has since rented the Portersville ranch. On his home place he has one hundred and sixty acres, all of which can be irrigated from the Mathews ditch. Seventy-five acres are under alfalfa. The raising of cattle and hogs has been his specialty, and in addition he buys and feeds large quantities of stock.

The marriage of Mr. Calcote was solemnized in Visalia and united him with Miss Janie Houston, who was born and reared in this city, her father, Richard Houston, having been a pioneer and stock-raiser in Tulare county. They have six children, of whom the eldest, Charles, is a forest ranger, and the others, Allen, Ora, Irene, Lila and Alta, are at home. Not only has it been Mr. Calcote's ambition to give his children good educational advantages, but through his efficient service as president of the board of trustees of the Elbow creek school district he has accomplished much in the interests of all the children of the district, and has proved himself a wise supporter of the free school system. In fraternal relations he is connected with the Woodmen of the World. The Democratic party has always received his vote and in former years he acted as a member of the county central committee, but with that exception has not been active in local politics, preferring to devote his attention wholly to his farm work.

JONATHAN K. MILLS. In the combination of real estate and ranching, Jonathan K. Mills has met with a success which places him among the representative men of this section, his home near Le Grand, Merced county, three sections of land which he rents for the purpose of raising wheat, barley and stock, being one of the best improved and well cultivated farms to be found in this region. In his real estate operations he has been no less successful, during his residence here of little more than a year having disposed of over a thousand acres of land, which has tended materially to develop the country and promote the general welfare.

Born in Putnam county, Ill., October 15, 1855, Jonathan K. Mills was a son of Pusey and Lydia (Hartley) Mills, both of whom were natives of Pennsylvania, who after their immigration to the Prairie state engaged in agricultural pursuits. The elder man died in that location. Reared to young manhood upon the paternal farm, Jonathan K. Mills was trained to the practical duties of an agriculturist, which life he early elected to follow. On becoming independent he located in Missouri and engaged in farming there for five years, when he decided to change his location, and accordingly removed to Kansas. Not quite satisfied with his second choice for a home he then came to California, in 1903 taking up his residence in this section and renting something less than two thousand acres of land in Merced county. His executive ability has proven equal to the enterprise and he is to-day numbered among the successful ranchmen of the county. Four hundred acres of his large ranch are devoted entirely to the production of barley, which runs as high as twenty sacks per acre.

In Illinois Mr. Mills was married to Olive Spencer, of Putnam county, and of this union were born nine children, four of whom are living, namely: Laura, Mary, Henry and Joseph. In his political convictions Mr. Mills adheres to the principles advocated in the platform of the Republican party, and fraternally he is associated with the Modern Woodmen of America.

DAVID S. EWING. Among the professional men who occupy a position of prominence in the esteem of the citizens of Fresno is David S. Ewing, an attorney of more than local note, and one who has won a wide popularity for the sterling traits which distinguish his character. Born in Fulton, Callaway county, Mo., October 24, 1866, he was the son of Henry Neal Ewing, who was a native of the same locality. The grandfather, James Ewing, was born in Kentucky and emigrated to Callaway county, Mo., in 1820, following the example of his father, who had crossed the mountains into Kentucky from his native state—Virginia. The family were of Scotch-Irish ancestry and inherited the sturdy traits which have made of these people some of our most desirable citizens. Henry Neal Ewing was reared in Missouri and educated at Yale University, after which, in 1849, he crossed the plains to California by ox-team. Upon his arrival he engaged in mining for several years, after which he returned to Missouri. He again crossed the plains, and again returned to Missouri during the Civil war. He removed to Kansas City in 1874, where he engaged in business for about six years, in 1880 bringing his family to California and locating in Fresno county. He was the third colonist of Fresno colony, where he purchased a farm one and a half miles southeast of Fresno and set out a vineyard and a forty-acre orchard, as well as made many other valuable improvements. In 1887 he sold out this property and located in Fresno, where his death occurred in 1890. In his religious convictions he was a member of the Baptist Church. His wife, formerly Carrie Martin, was born near Fulton, Mo., the daughter of William Martin, who was a native of Virginia and an early resident of Missouri, settling on a farm adjoining the property of James Ewing. He was of French and German ancestry, and a worthy and esteemed man. Mrs. Ewing died in Kansas City in 1878, leaving a family of six sons and two daughters, all of whom attained maturity and five sons now surviving: A. D., deputy county clerk of Fresno county; Harry M., of Fresno; Emmet M., who is in business in Victoria, British Columbia; Forest B., a sheep man of Nevada; and David S., the subject of this review.

The second son in his father's family, David S. Ewing was reared to manhood in Fulton, Kansas City, Fresno and the paternal farm in Fresno county. In 1883 he secured employment as a member of the surveying corps on the upper San Joaquin canal, where he remained for about two and a half years, after which, in 1887, he attended the Pacific Business College in San Francisco. Returning to Fresno county, he was employed in the city tax collector's office, and the following year became deputy county school superintendent under Prof. B. A. Hawkins. In 1890 and 1891 he served as chief deputy in the county tax collector's office. In all his official positions he acquitted himself honorably, doing credit to himself and those who placed him in his various capacities. From early boyhood, however, he had an eager desire to study law, and was not content even with the good positions which he so easily secured. At every opportunity he took up the ponderous tomes which held for him the realization of his ambitions, and in 1893 he was admitted to practice by the Superior Court in Fresno county, and began the practice of his profession. He formed a partnership with O. L. Everts, which firm was known as that of Everts & Ewing, and together they built up a general practice. This partnership still exists and is the oldest legal firm in the county. In 1895 Mr. Ewing entered the University of Michigan as a senior in the department of law, being graduated therefrom in 1896 with the degree of LL. B., and again taking up his practice in Fresno. Among the cases which Mr. Ewing has conducted or assisted in conducting may be mentioned those of the "Land Scrippers," The Cosmopolitan Exploration Company vs. the Gray Eagle Development Company et al, in which he took part, that being the first on record to decide against the "Land Scrippers"; and the case of J. G. Roberts vs. The Fresno Democrat Publishing Company, wherein the firm represented the defendant.

In Fresno, May 1, 1898, Mr. Ewing married Grace Maul, a native of Illinois. She was the daughter of Frank Maul, who was born in Germany, and after his emigration to the United States became a grocer in Illinois. He is now living retired in Fresno. Mrs. Ewing is a graduate of the Kewanee (Ill.) high school. To Mr. Ewing and his wife in Fresno, August 15, 1901, were born two daughters, twins, Blanche and Mildred. In his fraternal relations Mr. Ewing is a member and exalted ruler of Fresno Lodge No. 439, B. P. O. E., and Manzanita Camp No. 160, W. O. W., which he has served five terms as consul commander. In 1898 he was elected head escort of the Head Camp P. J. Woodmen of the World, and served two years. His wife is a member of the Episcopal Church. Politically he is a staunch adherent of the Democratic party, and is a member of the Chamber of Commerce. He is also a member of the Fresno County Bar Association.

O. L. EVERTS. The Everts family, represented in Fresno by O. L. Everts, attorney-at-law, were prominent citizens of New England for many years. The first of the name to seek a new location was Gustavus Everts, Sr., who came as far west as Indiana, settling in La Porte, where he followed agricultural pursuits. He was also a resident of Ohio for a time, and in that state his son, Gustavus A., was born. The latter, in young manhood, settled in Putnam county, Ill., and there engaged in stock-raising, making that place his home until his removal to La Porte, Ind., where he followed the same occupation. Deciding to take up his residence in the more remote west, he removed to Fresno, Cal., in 1884, and in this city engaged in the real estate business until the year before his death, when he sought retirement from the active cares of life. He died in 1897, at the age of sixty-three years. Fraternally he was a Mason, and in his political preference adhered to the principles of the Democratic party. For one term he served in the interests of his party as public administrator of Fresno county, Cal. His wife, formerly Rena Newport, was born in Bureau county, Ill., near the city of Princeton, the daughter of P. N. Newport, an extensive farmer and landowner, who now resides in Princeton. Mrs. Everts died in Illinois early in life.

The only child of his parents, O. L. Everts was born in Putnam county, Ill., February 11, 1869, and after the death of his mother, went to Kewanee, Henry county, Ill., where he made his home with his aunt, Mrs. H. E. Woodruff. He attended the public schools, in time entering and being graduated from the Kewanee high school. In 1887 he removed to Fresno, Cal., and engaged in the real estate business with his father. Previous to this, while a resident of Kewanee, he had read law during his vacations and the desire to make that profession his life-work was so strong in him that in 1889 he returned east, and became a student in the law department of the University of Michigan. Two years later he was graduated from that institution with the degree of LL. D., the year previous having been admitted to the bar of Michigan, and the same year he was admitted to practice in California. During his college life he was a member of the Phi Delta Phi, a college fraternity. He located, where he has since remained, in offices in the First National Bank building, and entered upon a general practice. In 1893 he formed a partnership with David S. Ewing, the style of the firm being Everts & Ewing. They have since conducted a general practice, and, by their success, winning a place among the most prominent attorneys in the city.

In his political convictions a Democrat, Mr. Everts has been called upon by his party to hold public office, in 1898 being nominated and elected district attorney; his election under the existing political conditions speaking eloquently of the high regard in which he is held. The following January he took the oath of office and served until January, 1903, when he retired, not caring for re-election.

During Mr. Everts' term about five hundred criminal cases in the superior court of the county, many of them being bitterly contested, were handled by his office, and the court records showing the percentage of convictions in the number of cases tried bespeak the ability and energy displayed by him in representing the interests of the people. His discharge of official duties was of so efficient and faithful a character that he won the commendation of the citizens of Fresno county, regardless of party affiliations. After leaving the district attorney's office, Mr. Everts continued the practice of his profession with his partner, Mr. Ewing. For three successive terms he has, with his partner, represented the public administrator of Fresno county. They are now the retained counsel of various banking institutions in the San Joaquin valley, and for other corporations of like character. A great deal of the oil litigation of the valley has been handled by this firm. Among the most notable cases in this connection might be mentioned the suit of the Cosmopolitan Exploration Company vs. The Gray Eagle Company.

In Kewanee, Ill., Mr. Everts was united in marriage on November 1, 1892, with Flora Maul, a daughter of Frank Maul, a merchant of that city, and they have one child living, Frank Gustavus Everts. In his fraternal relations Mr. Everts is prominent. Made a Mason in Kewanee Lodge No. 159, F. & A. M., he is a member of Trigo Chapter No. 69, R. A. M., of which he is past high priest, and of Fresno Commandery No. 29, K. T., and he belongs to Fresno Lodge No. 186, I. O. O. F., Modern Woodmen of America and the Independent Order of Foresters. An enterprising and liberal citizen, he takes a most active interest in all that tends to promote the general welfare and is now a member of the Chamber of Commerce. He is a member of both the County and State Bar Association.

Religiously, Mr. Everts in early life joined the Congregational Church. His wife being a member of the Episcopal Church, in late years their attendance and support have been given to that church.

WILLIAM HAMILTON MOFFETT. As representative of his district upon the board of county supervisors and as a leading business man of Visalia, where he has made his home since 1892, William Hamilton Moffett is well known throughout Tulare county. A native-born son of the golden west and a member of a pioneer family descended from southern ancestry, he was born in Sonoma county July 31, 1856. His father, James H. Moffett, a native of Tennessee, settled in Missouri at an early day and engaged in farming in McDonald county. When the Pacific coast attracted throngs of adventurous spirits he was induced by favorable reports to cast his lot with the hardy pioneers of the far west. Provided with the necessities of existence, and with ox-teams and wagons, he started across the plains in 1856, accompanied by his wife and family. On reaching Sonoma county he took up land and began to raise stock. In 1860 he removed to Mendocino county where the same industry engaged his attention. In search of a more satisfactory location he came to Tulare county in 1865 and settled in the Lemon Cove district, where he tilled the soil and also raised stock. At the time of his death in 1875 he was fifty-one years of age. Throughout his active life he was an earnest believer in the doctrines of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church and at one time officiated as an elder in the same. Politically he voted the Democratic ticket in local and national elections. Two years before his demise occurred the death of his wife, Virginia (Owen) Moffett, who was born and reared in Tennessee, and had reached forty-nine years of age at the time she passed from earth.

The family comprised seven sons and two daughters, namely: James P., now living in Arizona; M. L., who continues to make his home at Lemon Cove; William H. and Columbus B., who are business partners at Visalia; Amanda P., deceased; Virginia C., wife of Rev. J. A. Skaggs, of Selma; Henry Owen, deceased; Eugene L. and John L., who reside at Bakersfield, Kern county. Upon the death of their father the sons took charge of the home place, but in 1879 William H. started out for himself, buying a ranch near Naranjo, Tulare county, where he still owns a farm of one hundred and sixty acres. On leaving that place in 1892 he removed to Visalia, where he has since been interested in the livery and feed business. For two years he was connected with J. B. McKinley, then for three years had John H. Dodson as a partner, but since 1898 he and his brother have been the proprietors, and have built up an excellent trade in their special line. Realizing the need of good roads, he has been a firm champion of the plan of oiling the public highways, which he believes to be the most satisfactory scheme for solving the road problem. Reared in the Democratic faith, he has always been a supporter of the principles of that party and on the regular ticket, in 1900, was elected county supervisor for a term of four years.

The marriage of Mr. Moffett took place at Lemon Cove, Tulare county, and united him with Louisa Pogue, who was born and reared in this county. Five children were born of their union, but two, Florence P. and May, are deceased, those living being named Elsie E., J. A. Aubrey and Mildred. The religious faith of his parents, that of the Cumberland Presbyterian denomination, represents the doctrines with which Mr. Moffett is in greatest sympathy in matters of religion. Fraternally he holds membership in various societies of Visalia, including the Knights of Pythias, Woodmen of the World and Native Sons of the Golden West.

ALFRED E. DEWEY, who makes his home near Escalon, although still a young man, bids fair to make his mark in the world, as he is an honest and hard-working man. Born August 24, 1873, in the province of Ontario, Canada, he is a son of Henry and Margaret (Osborn) Dewey. Henry Dewey and his wife were natives of Canada, but came to California in 1881, spending a year at Selma, Fresno county, and later moving to Kings county. Although a moulder by trade, Mr. Dewey engaged in the nursery trade while in Kings county, and thousands of fruit trees were planted in that county by his hand. In 1896, however, the family removed to San Joaquin county on account of the ill health of some of its members, and they located on the Myer's ranch, remaining there until the death of the mother, at which time the father came to live with Alfred E.

Alfred E. Dewey is at present engaged in cutting the timber off the bottom lands, carrying this on by means of a steam saw which he owns. He also raises fruit to some extent and devotes part of his time to raising stock, principally hogs. His marriage united him with Miss Dessie Hall, a native of San Joaquin county, and a daughter of John Hall, whose biography appears elsewhere in this history. To Mr. and Mrs. Dewey have been born the following children, Alvin, Ernest and Myrtle. A Republican in politics, Mr. Dewey is true to the interests of his chosen party, as he also is to the interests of his adopted state and country.

LEWIS H. APPLGATE. In California, as well as in Oregon, the name Applegate is synonymous of true worth and integrity, and the identification of this family with the early history of both states is well known. Lewis H. Applegate has been a resident of California since 1870 and has been identified with Merced county for nearly thirty years. He was born in Goshen, Clermont county, Ohio, December 21, 1844, a son of Perrine and Susan (Frybarger) Applegate, the former a native of New Jersey and the latter of Ohio. His paternal grandfather, Elijah Applegate, also born in New Jersey, was of Welsh descent and by occupation was a carpenter and farmer. He removed to Ohio when his son Perrine was but three years old and in that state he followed the occupation of a millwright, erecting many of the early mills of the state. He died in Ohio when forty-five years of age. Perrine Applegate was reared and educated in Ohio and upon leaving school he learned the carpenter's trade under the supervision of his father; his later years, however, were spent in agricultural pursuits. He passed to his final rest in 1888, aged seventy-two years, being survived ten years by his widow, who died in 1898. They became the parents of sixteen children, fourteen of whom reached years of maturity, and of these twelve are still living. With the exception of the two who died in infancy, their family consisted of the following: Andrew J., a manufacturer of Anderson, Ind.; Oliver H. P., a traveling salesman of St. Louis, Mo.; Thomas F., a member of the Thirty-fourth Indiana Volunteer Infantry, who died during the Civil war; Angeline, wife of William McClelland, of Goshen, Ohio; Lewis H.; Sallie E. Spence, of Goshen; William P., a successful rancher of Merced county; Margaret C. McClintock; Susan A. Stouder; John P., now deceased, who came to California in 1875; James B., a successful druggist of Perkinsville, Ind.; Joseph H., a farmer near Goshen, Ohio; Lydia A., a deaconess of the Methodist Episcopal Church, engaged in missionary work at Salt Lake City; and Pearl W., vice-principal of the grammar school at Goshen. The two eldest sons also have military careers, Andrew J. as a soldier in Company G, One Hundred and Seventh Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and Oliver H. P., as color sergeant in the Second Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

Reared on his father's farm, Lewis H. Apple-

gate attended the common school of his district, supplementing it by a course in Goshen Seminary, after which he began teaching school and so continued until coming to California, since which time he has been engaged in farming. The appearance of the state at that time, with its sparse settlements, was a striking contrast to the many thriving business centers of the present day, scattered throughout various parts of the state. The first year of his residence was spent in Stockton, which place he left intending to go to Nevada. At Knight's Ferry, however, a short stop was made, and he was induced to change his route. In 1872 he arrived in Merced county, remaining but a short time, when he proceeded to Stanislaus county, where he farmed near Turlock, till 1875. Returning to Merced county that year, he, with a partner, rented land six miles east of Merced and for ten months followed general farming. He then embarked in a similar business for himself, renting the ranch upon which he now resides, and which is located along Bear creek, nine miles east of Merced, where for the past twenty-eight years he has given his entire time and attention to raising stock and grain. As he has prospered, he has added to his acreage from time to time, and has made valuable improvements on the land in shape of buildings, etc. His home place contains eleven hundred and sixty acres, devoted to raising grain and stock; another ranch which he owns, seven miles east of Merced, contains six hundred and forty acres, also devoted to the same industry; one mile from Atwater he purchased another section of land devoted almost entirely to the cultivation of barley; in Fresno county he bought a forty-acre alfalfa ranch, and twenty acres in the Yosemite colony, Merced county, which is also devoted to alfalfa. He has always been an advocate of advancement and when called upon to do so has aided all projects that had for their object the development of the county.

Mr. Applegate has been prominently connected with the Grange, having served as overseer two terms and president and master four terms. He is an active member and a director of the California Grain Growers' Association, the object of which is to establish a uniform ocean freight rate from San Francisco to Liverpool, England. He is a Democrat in politics, though never an aspirant for office.

COLUMBUS FAY. Not only were the paternal ancestors of Mr. Fay participants in the colonial and Revolutionary wars and the second struggle with England, but his maternal progenitors, the Abbotts, were also of patriotic stock and bore an honorable part in all of the early wars in which our country engaged. Both settled in Massachusetts during its pioneer history and afterward wielded an influence in the agricultural development of various sections of New England. Edward Fay, Jr., and his father, whose name he bore, were natives of Vermont, the former born at Underhill and there reared to maturity, but later a pioneer of Jefferson county, Wis., subsequently removing to Richland county, the same state, where he died at sixty-three years of age. The wife of Edward, Jr., was Sarah Abbott, a native of Vermont, and a daughter of Timothy Abbott. Like her husband she passed the latter part of her life in Wisconsin and died before attaining old age. Of their five children only one son and one daughter grew to maturity. The subject of this article, who was the youngest of the children, was born in Jefferson county, Wis., October 19, 1848, and grew to manhood in Richland county, that state, where he had such advantages as the country schools of that day and locality afforded. After the death of his father in 1870 he had charge of the home farm, but in January, 1872, started out for himself, traveling through the middle states in search of a suitable location. While traveling through Kansas he met a cattle buyer, with whom he secured employment to assist in driving a herd of two thousand head of cattle across the plains to Nevada. Eight men constituted the force of employes under whose guidance the cattle were driven at a rate of from twenty to twenty-five miles per day. After seventy days from Ellsworth, Kans., they landed at Humboldt wells, in Nevada.

A few weeks later Mr. Fay arrived in Alameda county, Cal., where he secured employment on a farm near Haywards. During the six years of his residence there he made infrequent trips to Oregon and Washington, going as far north as Seattle. In the fall of 1879 he came to Tulare county and settled at what is now Lemoncove, where for five years he engaged in raising grain on a tract of thirteen hundred acres. The ensuing four years were passed on a grain farm near Dry creek. In 1889 he removed to the Millwood road, in the vicinity of Visalia, and settled on a tract of ninety acres which he purchased the following year. Here he has since made his home, engaging in the dairy business with a herd of fine Jersey cows and raising alfalfa by the aid of excellent irrigation facilities. Having given his attention closely to the work of his farm he has had little or no leisure for participation in local politics, nor has he borne any part in the same aside from voting a straight Republican ticket at all elections. The fact that he is thoroughly awake to the need of educational facilities is shown by his efficient service in the capacity of member of the school board of Elbow district.

The marriage of Mr. Fay was solemnized near Visalia and united him with Miss Nannie E. Kelly, who was born in Arkansas and removed to California in company with her parents, Greenberry and Sarah Kelly. The family settled in Tulare county, where Mr. Kelly died, and his widow has since remained on the old homestead. Of the union of Mr. and Mrs. Fay there are two children. The son, Clarence, who is now fifteen years of age, attends the high school of Visalia, and the daughter, Gracie, who is six years of age, is a pupil in the district schools. In religious connections Mrs. Fay is associated with the Methodist Episcopal Church and fraternally she holds membership in the Magnolia Circle, Women of Woodcraft, her talents making her a welcomed worker in both the church and the fraternal organization.

AMBERSON BRANDON. There is perhaps nothing of which a man may be more proud than that of gallant service in the cause of his country, nor is there any service that lives longer in the memory of a grateful people. Mr. Brandon was among those who early offered their services to their country in her hour of peril and who never deserted their post until peace crowned their efforts. He enlisted in 1863 in Company M, First California Regulars, and served three years in Arizona and New Mexico, fighting the Indians. He was appointed sergeant and honorably discharged from service at Fort Selden, N. M., in 1866. At the close of his military career he returned to California and turned his attention to teaming and sawmilling in Amador county, and later in Stanislaus and Merced counties, where he has since been engaged in farming.

Since locating in Merced county, in 1896, he has brought about a revelation in farm methods, operating his extensive farms upon the most approved of methods. His home ranch, eight miles from Le Grand, contains thirty-nine hundred and eighty-nine acres, while at one time he farmed seven thousand acres of land in the county. He has two Holt traction engines, the only ones in Merced county, and in connection he also has two separators, with a thirty-four-foot cut. Each engine is a forty-five horsepower, and requires three hundred and fifty gallons of oil per day to operate. Upon his extensive ranch, machinery is made to supersede hand labor; each engine requires only three men, engineer, fireman and water tender, to operate it. The wheels of these gigantic engines, which themselves weigh seventeen tons, are forty-two inches wide, being six feet and eight inches in diameter. Each engine hauls eighteen eight-inch standard plows, turns the furrows, harrows and plants at the same time. The magnitude of this work must be seen to be understood or appreciated.

In Jefferson county, Wis., Mr. Brandon was born, August 31, 1845, a son of Z. P. and Martha (Enyart) Brandon. The former, a native of Virginia, accompanied his parents to Ohio in early boyhood, where he was reared on a farm and subsequently located for a time in California. When Amberson was about twelve years old his mother died. In 1849 the father came to California to seek his fortune in the mines. Returning to his home in Wisconsin in 1851, he brought his family across the plains to California. In Eldorado county he followed mining and farming until his death in 1892, aged sixty-five years.

Mr. Brandon remained at home until his enlistment in the army, and at the close of the hostilities returned to California. He went into Amador county and purchased with a partner a sawmill, operating it successfully for nine years. At the close of that time he again took up farm life, this time in the vicinity of Turlock, Stanislaus county, which continued to be his home until 1884. Removing to Merced county, he rented land until 1902, when he purchased the ranch upon which he still lives. By his marriage, August 31, 1868, in California, he was united with Julia Misenheimer, a native of Illinois and a daughter of Hartwell and Sarah (Williams) Misenheimer, the former born in North Carolina and the latter in Illinois. In 1853 they came overland to California and are now respected residents of Tulare county, Mr. Misenheimer being eighty years of age and his wife seventy-four. Eleven children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Brandon, all living except one, namely: Susan, wife of J. T. Flanagan; Bernice, wife of E. T. Cunningham; Howard; Myron (deceased); Frances, wife of J. R. Baxter; Lloyd, Roger, Audley, Gladys, Roscoe and Horace. A self-made man in the truest sense of the word and one of the most widely known men in his locality, Mr. Brandon stands deservedly high. He is a member of the Grand Army of the Republic. In politics he is a Republican. It is to such men as he California owes much of her prosperity and greatness.

JOSEPH H. NOBLE. As a natural result of his thrift and industry Joseph H. Noble has become a prosperous citizen of Madera county, Cal., which has been his home since 1880. The farm which he now occupies, and which he purchased in 1902, contains three hundred and twenty acres, the west half of District No. 20, and is devoted to raising grain and alfalfa. He is also interested to some extent in stock-raising, and it is his intention to give more attention to this latter industry each year, with the ultimate idea of changing his entire farm into a stock ranch in time. At present one hundred acres are in alfalfa, and the balance devoted to wheat and barley. His place is located four and a half miles west of Madera, and since purchasing it he has added all of the improvements, in buildings, ditching and checking.

Mr. Noble was born in Marshall county, Ill., June 8, 1859, a son of Elisha and Margaret (McKinney) Noble, both natives of Ohio. Elisha Noble went to Illinois when about twenty-two years of age and spent many years engaged in farming. In 1878 he removed to Nebraska and in 1889 was induced to come to California and locate in Madera county, where he lived until his death in 1901, aged seventy-four years.

The boyhood days of Joseph H. Noble were spent upon his father's farm in Illinois, and he obtained his education in the schools of that state. In 1878 he accompanied his parents to Nebraska and with them subsequently located in Madera county, Cal. He has been a life-long farmer and rancher, and enjoys the prestige he has gained solely by incessant years of toil.

While a resident of Nebraska Mr. Noble was united in marriage with Harriett Becker, and of this union four children have been born: Joseph C., Cora, Minnie and Clinton. In politics Mr. Noble is a Democrat, though never an aspirant for office. As a business man and a citizen, Mr. Noble has won a host of friends and is highly esteemed by all who know him.

HIRAM B. ALGER. The People's market, owned and operated by the firm of Morgan & Alger, successors to John R. Parr, is one of the most popular and well-conducted enterprises of the kind in Tulare county. As an adjunct to the business life of Visalia the market is without a peer in its facilities for catering to a large and exacting trade, its promoters being men of proved ability and integrity.

Hiram B. Alger, junior member of the firm of Morgan & Alger, owes his birth and early training to Delaware county, Iowa, where his life began on a farm near Edgewood, October 1, 1867. His father, Myron H. Alger, was born in New York in 1844, and was a babe in arms when his parents located in Delaware county in 1845. His entire life has been spent on a farm, and he still makes Delaware county his home, his wife, formerly Cynthia J. Robinson, having also survived the changes of existence. There were four sons and three daughters in this family, and Hiram B., the oldest, was the first to assume the responsibility of self support, engaging in school teaching in different parts of Iowa after leaving the Upper Iowa University, which he attended for one year. Later he engaged as brakeman on the Central Iowa Railroad, using his wages to secure further educational advantages for himself, a fact which indicates the resource and adaptiveness which has characterized his entire life. Returning to farming in Iowa, Mr. Alger came to California in 1901, and in Visalia engaged in the meat-market business, later becoming a member of the firm of Morgan & Alger, purchasing the business of John R. Parr. The plant covers twelve acres the firm owning their own slaughter houses, and besides supplying the home trade, the products are shipped throughout the county. Mr. Alger has a thorough understanding of his business, has a large acquaintance with stock and business men, and from the beginning of his residence here has impressed the community with his earnestness and sincerity and his keen desire to please.

In political affiliation Mr. Alger is independent, and in religion he is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He was reared in an atmosphere of piety and responsibility, and has never departed from the belief that a man owes much to his church, and that his influence is largely augmented thereby. He is active in the business and social circles of the church, is secretary of the board of trustees, and contributes generously toward its general support. His marriage with Alice Schroff, a native of Pennsylvania, occurred in Iowa, and of this union three sons have been born, Otto Dean, Donald Wayne and Merle H. Mr. Alger is fraternally connected with the Modern Woodmen of America and the Royal Neighbors.

LEVI N. TURNER. In no part of the United States is a more correct appreciation placed upon personal valor and courage than in the west. Possibly conflict with the red men of the plains, with pioneer conditions startling in their crudeness, and with the terrible journey across the prairies and mountains in the early days, are too closely allied with the present to permit of laxity in giving to each man his due where aught of generosity has been required of his nature. It thus happens that the soldier comes into his own again as he gathers around the camp-fires. He is given warm greeting because of his experiences when he embarks in trade, and at all times carries with him the sense of security in the people's esteem, which must needs warm his heart and inspire him with love for all mankind. Such a one is Levi N. Turner, a soldier of the Civil war, who is also a successful hardware merchant of Delano, and whose many fine traits of character have contributed to the

Behind his honored name and successful career Mr. Turner has an ancestry which claims a voyager of the Mayflower, and early bearers of the name settled in what now is Turner, Me. From Androscoggin county later members moved to Milo, Piscataquis county, where Levi N. was born April 4, 1838, and where his father, Lyman, was reared and learned the carpenter trade. In early life the father married a Miss Flanders, also a native of Maine, and with her and his children removed overland to Wisconsin in 1845. Settling in Dodge county in the midst of a dense timber district, he cleared a small farm, improved it to general produce, and lived upon it until locating in Faribault county, Minn., in 1873. He conducted a fairly successful grocery business in Minnesota for a few years, and died there in 1893, at the age of eighty-eight years. During the Civil war he was a member of the Home Guard. His wife lived to be seventy-five years old.

Levi N. Turner was seven years old when the family removed to Wisconsin, and remained there until 1865, in the meantime acquiring a common school education, and learning the carpenter trade. In Blue Earth county, Minn., he followed carpentering for five years, and in 1870 engaged in a general merchandise business in Winnebago City, remaining there four years. Afterward he erected a flouring mill in Blue Earth county, operated it successfully for ten years, and upon disposing of it in 1892, took up his residence in California in his present home in Delano. He has found the hardware and implement business lucrative and congenial, and has invested his earnings in paying quarters, owning ten acres in his home place, forty acres six miles south, and one hundred and sixty acres seven miles north of Delano. His home place, on the outskirts of the town, has a pleasant and comfortable residence, with flowers, shrubs and trees, which contribute to the beauty and pleasure of life in this delightful state. In the meantime he has taken a keen interest in the general affairs of the town, has been more or less prominent in politics, and has been especially helpful in organizing the board of trade, and in serving as its vice-president. He has been a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen since 1876.

The war experience of Mr. Turner stands out in bold relief among the incidents which have made his life interesting and useful to his fellow-men. He was working in the lumber camps in Wisconsin when the war broke out, and October 14, 1861, enlisted as a private in Company F, Twelfth Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and participated in many of the battles; served with Grant in the western army, and with Sherman on his march to the sea. In front of Atlanta, Ga., he was wounded in both thighs by the same ball, and was laid up in the hospital at Rome, Ga., from July 21, 1864, until the following October. He was promoted to the rank of sergeant in 1863, and to first lieutenant in 1865, and might have received still further honors, had he been able to rejoin his regiment in January, following his release from the hospital. Mr. Turner established a home ere success had begun to come his way, marrying Mary E. Weaver, a native of New York; they have had three children, two of whom are deceased. Florence E., the wife of Rev. W. L. Miller, residing in Litchfield, Conn., is the only child living.

CHARLES C. FISHER. Four miles from Visalia, Tulare county, is located the farm of Charles C. Fisher, consisting of one hundred and twenty acres devoted principally to the dairy business. Mr. Fisher is one of the early settlers of this vicinity, having located here in 1879, when he first came to California. He bought this property and made all the improvements, putting up adequate buildings, cultivating the land, and assisting materially in the upbuilding of the best interests of the county. He was born in York, Livingston county, N. Y., August 27, 1830, the youngest in a family of ten children, all of whom attained maturity, although but two sons and two daughters are now living. His father, Josiah Fisher, was born in Massachusetts in 1784, reared in New Hampshire, and in young manhood settled in Livingston county, N. Y., where he engaged as a cabinet and chair maker. In New York state he also engaged in the saw-milling business and the manufacture of lumber, as well as operating a farm which he owned. In 1832 he removed to Michigan and started the first shingle machine in Grand Rapids. Later he located near Elkhart, Ind., where he bought a mill and farmed until 1839. In the last named year he returned to Livingston county, N. Y., and on his old farm resumed agricultural pursuits and also conducted a milling business until his death in 1853, at the age of seventy years. His wife, formerly Orena Goss, was a native of Claremont, N. H., who died in New York.

In childhood Charles C. Fisher accompanied his parents to the state of Michigan, and later to Indiana, when nine years old returning to the scenes of his birth, where he received his education in the subscription and public schools. He remained at home, learning the saw milling, machinist and carpenter trades, until 1853, when he went to Coldwater, Mich., and entered the machine shops of that place. Later he went to Ligonier, Ind. In 1857 he went to Kentucky, and following this located in southwest Missouri, later locating in Union county, Ky., where he followed saw milling until the breaking out of the war. He then sold out, and returning to Indiana, bought a small farm and in addition to running this he also ran a grist mill at Albion for two years. Returning to Kentucky at the end of this time he conducted a portable saw-mill there for three years, after which he became a master machinist in a large distillery at Uniontown, Ky., on the Ohio river. This establishment has since been rebuilt, and today is the second largest of its kind in the world. Resigning his position in the distillery in 1879, Mr. Fisher came to California the same year. Locating in Tulare county he purchased the farm where he now makes his home, and later bought one hundred and sixty acres near the lake, in Kings county, and also one hundred and sixty acres near Dunlap, Fresno county. His home place is irrigated by the Modoc ditch.

In Kentucky, Mr. Fisher married Martha Culver, a native of Union county, that state, where her death occurred. Politically Mr. Fisher is a Jacksonian Democrat and casts his ballot for the principles of his party. Interested in local affairs, he gave an acre of ground for the Willow school, in the building of which he was one of the chief factors, and has served as school trustee for several terms. One of the early recollections of Mr. Fisher is his trip over the first railroad of the state of New York, the track being wooden rails 4x6, strapped with iron.

BENNI J. HENRY. Conspicuous among the enterprising and progressive agriculturists of Visalia is Benni J. Henry, who during the past quarter of a century has been actively identified with the industrial prosperity of this section of the state. Kind-hearted, accommodating and pleasant, he is everywhere respected, and is held in high regard throughout the community. Of Scotch-Irish descent, he was born, November 13, 1853, in Savannah, Wayne county, N. Y., a son of John and Margaret (Ferguson) Henry, the latter of whom died in Visalia, while the former is still living.

Brought up on the home farm, in Wayne county, N. Y., Benni J. Henry was educated in the district schools, in common with the neighboring children, being well drilled in the three "R's." Beginning life as a wage-earner at the age of fifteen years, he first worked on a farm at Union Springs, Cayuga county, and was afterward for two years employed in the factory of D. M. Osborne & Co. Making a bold push to the westward in 1877, he came to California in search of a favorable opportunity to advance his welfare, and for a year resided on the line between Santa Clara and Santa Cruz counties. In September, 1878, Mr. Henry came to Visalia, and the following ten months was employed on the Burrell ranch. Buying his present farm of forty acres in 1879, he at once began its improvement. Clearing the land, he erected a good residence, and has since been prosperously engaged in tilling the soil, raising alfalfa, principally, for which his land is well fitted, being under irrigation, the water coming from the Modoc ditch. Mr. Henry also carries on a part of the old Kelsey ranch, renting fourteen hundred acres of it. There he has good pasture land, raises extensive crops of grain, and has an eighty-acre vineyard and a valuable orchard of ninety acres. He has an especially fine farming outfit, running three eight-horse teams, and having all the necessary machinery and appliances for successfully carrying on his large and lucrative business. He is much interested in stock-raising, keeping a superior grade of cattle and horses.

In Auburn, Cayuga county, N. Y., Mr. Henry married Jennie Ferguson, who was born in the north of Ireland, and into their pleasant household seven children have been born, namely: Gertrude, wife of Charles Smith, city marshal of Visalia; Edith, wife of John Daily, a farmer, living near Goshen, Cal., and Mamie, Robert Lee, Grover C., Earl and Lillian, living at home. Politically Mr. Henry is a steadfast adherent of the Democratic party and is now serving as school trustee in the Willow district. Fraternally he is a member of the Woodmen of the World. Mrs. Henry is a most estimable woman, and a member of the Methodist Church.

HON. CHARLES A. HART. Foremost among the pioneer inhabitants of Fresno county was Judge Charles A. Hart, deceased, who in young manhood dauntlessly pushed his way across the continent to a new and uncultivated country, to whose development and advancement he devoted his best efforts and energies. A descendant of a fine old family of New York, well bred and well educated, he rapidly became an acknowledged leader in the establishment of beneficent enterprises in Millerton, the first county seat of Fresno county, and for half a century occupied a post of honor and influence in legal, financial, political, agricultural and social circles.

Judge Hart was born in Geneva, N. Y., November 7, 1820. His father, Hon. Truman Hart, was a well-known banker of western New York, and for several terms represented his district in the New York state senate. His mother, Susan Carpenter, was also a native of New York state. Removing in childhood with his parents to Palmyra, N. Y., Charles A. Hart attended the grammar and high schools of that town, and was afterward graduated from the Genesee Wesleyan Seminary at Lima, N. Y. The year following the completion of his college course he was employed as civil engineer and surveyor on the New York & Lake Erie Railroad, having charge of the construction of that portion of the road between Elmira and Binghamton. Returning home upon the expiration of his contract, he studied law for four years in the office of Theron R. Strong of Palmyra, one of the most noted legal practitioners of western New York in those days, and after his admission to the bar was engaged in the practice of his profession for one year in partnership with A. G. Hemingway. Removing then to New York City, he entered upon an entirely new avocation, engaging in business as a commission dealer in wool, hides, leather, etc. Enterprising and far-seeing, and doubtless actuated somewhat by a spirit of adventure, he then decided to put his fortunes to the hazard on the Pacific slope, where he hoped to find a realization of his dreams of future prosperity. Joining a party of forty New England men in 1848, he proceeded by steamer to Brazos, Texas, where the company secured a good outfit and started upon their tedious journey across the wild desert for southern California. The region which they traversed afforded one of the least known and most dangerous routes overland, though the shortest to their destination, and the risk that they took was most appalling. After a long and tedious journey, during which they had numerous skirmishes and other difficulties with the Indians, principally Navajos and Apaches, they arrived at Hill's Ferry, Merced county, Cal., August 7, 1849. Anxious to begin their search for gold with as little delay as possible, the party continued up the Merced river, upon the banks of which they accidentally discovered two "rockers," which had been left there by prospectors. Although entirely ignorant of mining, they started for the diggings with the rockers. On their way they were fortunate enough to meet Captain Cutler, who had served in the Mexican war under General Taylor, and from him received some excellent advice and information in regard to gold mining. For two years thereafter Mr. Hart and his companions worked most successfully in the mines, finding gold in large quantities, not infrequently averaging sixteen ounces per day each.

Upon the expiration of his mining experience Mr. Hart located at Fort Miller, Mariposa county, where he opened a law office and engaged in the practice of his profession. When Fresno county was erected from a portion of Mariposa county in 1856, and Fort Miller became known as Millerton, and was made the county seat, Mr. Hart was appointed the first county judge, and filled the office with eminent satisfaction to all concerned for one term. Upon retiring from the office, he resumed private practice until 1874, when, his health failing, he acted upon the advice of his physician, Dr. Leach, and retired to his farm, comprising over two thousand acres of fertile and valuable land. When the federal government abandoned Fort Miller as a military post in 1863, Judge Hart purchased the post buildings, one of which he remodeled and ever after occupied as a residence. In the care and cultivation of his land he always took great pleasure, paying especial attention to stock-raising and the culture of fruit, in the latter industry being a pioneer in the San Joaquin valley. After the removal of the county seat to Fresno in 1874, Judge Hart never resumed his legal practice, but made Fort Miller his home until a short time before his death, which occurred May 13, 1903, at the home of his son, Truman G. Hart, No. 233 Blackstone avenue, Fresno, at the venerable age of eighty-three years.

February 18, 1865, Judge Hart was united in marriage with Mrs. Ann (Brénnan) McKenzie, a native of Ireland. By her marriage to Sergeant James McKenzie, who came to Fort Miller with the United States army in 1854, she became the mother of three children, namely: W. H. McKenzie, a capitalist of Fresno; Mary Jane, wife of J. C. Hoxie of Fresno, and E. P. McKenzie, deceased. The only child born of the union of Judge and Mrs Hart is Truman G. Hart of Fresno, of whom a brief sketch may be found elsewhere in this volume. Mrs. Hart is highly esteemed by all who have the pleasure of her acquaintance. She is now making her home in Fresno, with her daughter, Mrs. Hoxie.

Judge Hart belonged to that rare type of men who pursue to a consummation their plans in life, in spite of all obstacles which may arise in their paths. In early life he enjoyed unusual advantages in preparing himself for a career in the law, and he brought with him to California those high ideals so characteristic of the well-born and well-bred son of the Empire State. Throughout his life he was actuated by the highest motives, and though the early days of California were fraught with opportunities to gain wealth and temporary eminence by the adoption of questionable means thereto, he was never known to pursue a policy in any way subject to adverse criticism. His life was pure and blameless, both in public and private affairs, his frequently manifested public spirit and liberality of heart and mind endearing him closely to a multitude of friends. The beneficent effect of his life and work upon the welfare of Fresno county cannot be overestimated, for during the earlier days of the county's development he was one of the most potential factors in placing it upon a sound and substantial basis, high-minded and unselfish motives governing his participation in public affairs. His name will be handed down in history as that of one of the most striking characters and finest citizens in the San Joaquin valley, and the record of his life deserves a permanent and conspicuous place in the historical literature of the commonwealth.

ELONZO P. DAVIS. The present city marshal of Bakersfield is eminently qualified for his responsible position, having firmness, tact, strength of character, and broad and liberal tendencies. He is one of the pioneers of this section, and well understands the various human elements which comprise its varied, strenuous life. He was born in Arkansas September 22, 1853, and from his father, Isham T. Davis, inherits the courage and personal influence felt by all associated with him in whatsoever capacity. The elder Davis was born in Tennessee, as was also his wife, formerly Mary Farley, the latter of Scotch extraction. He was a man of iron will and a natural soldier, the beating of a drum or the passing of martial music arousing in him the spirit of tented field and the rush of opposing forces. He shouldered a musket in the Mexican war, the Seminole and all the other Indian wars, and seemed to be protected by the very strength of his courage and daring in the face of danger. He was perfectly at home on the frontier, and as a pioneer of Kern county, where he lived for some years, and where he died after an exceptionally active and useful life. He reared a family of four sons and four daughters.

Bakersfield was a small town when Elonzo P. Davis, the present marshal, arrived in its midst, and at that time he started the livery business with which his name and activity has since been associated. From a small beginning his business has grown with the development of the city. Mr. Davis has been one of the staunch advocates of good horses in this section of the country. In years past he has raised many blooded horses, and still has on hand several valuable animals. His livery equipment is modern and complete, and his name has stood at the head of enterprises of the kind for many years. He has taken a keen interest in Democratic politics, understanding only too well the prejudices and animosities with which the politician in this section has to deal. After an unusually riotous campaign he was elected marshal of Bakersfield in 1903, but the ballots were destroyed by fire, and through a miscount his opponent assumed the office. Mr. Davis, however, contested his right in the superior court, a ruling in his favor being secured in January, 1904, backed by the approval of the board of city trustees, who maintained that his election has been eminently fair. Thereupon he took up the duties of the office, and has since proved his ability to maintain order in a district noted for its reluctance to give up the old-time frontier methods. January 4, 1882, Mr. Davis married Maggie Hope Taylor, a native of Virginia. They have five children, Myrtle, Elonzo, Pearl, Marvin and Erma.

JOHN W. WHITWORTH. Alike in England and America successive generations of the Whitworth family have been characterized by high principles of honor and firmness of purpose. The family was founded in the United States by Henry Whitworth, Jr., a native of Lincolnshire, England, who settled in Ohio in 1848, but soon went farther west to St. Louis. Later his father, Henry Whitworth, Sr., also crossed the ocean and settled in Ohio, where he passed his last days. A brother, John, entered the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal Church and for forty years preached the gospel in the Ohio conference. When the discovery of gold in California attracted countless thousands to the Pacific coast Henry Whitworth, Jr., with the ambition of a young and ardent spirit, determined to seek his fortune across the plains. Accordingly in 1849 he started with a body of emigrants and followed the old Sante Fe trail and the Gila river, proceeding up the coast to old San Jose and thence to Tuolumne county, where he gained his first knowledge of placer mining. Sufficient success met his efforts to induce him to continue mining for a number of years, much of his work meanwhile being in quartz mills and mines. Finally, having wearied of the hardships incident to mining, in 1863 he left the mines and settled upon a farm in Contra Costa county. About 1868 he removed to the west side in Merced county, where he secured an unimproved tract of government land consisting of three hundred and twenty acres. Under his constant and industrious care the uninviting tract was transformed into a neat estate, where waving fields of grain betokened each year a bountiful harvest to repay the farmer's diligent cultivation. Little by little his possessions increased until finally he acquired control of one thousand acres. The management of such a large acreage necessitated much toil, but he was a man of energetic temperament and was never happier than when directing large interests. Although he accumulated a competency he remained an active worker at an age when most men feel they are privileged to retire from agricultural cares. Indeed, his activities were never relinquished until death came to him, February 15, 1897, at the close of seventy-two busy years. His wife who bore the maiden name of Ann Hall, was born in Lincolnshire, England, and died in the San Joaquin valley in 1877. They were the parents of two sons, George Henry and John W., and a daughter, Mrs. Mary J. Butts, of Merced county.

During the residence of the family in Tuolumne county John W. Whitworth was born April 8, 1859. Early in life he decided to become a farmer, hence he endeavored to acquire a thorough knowledge of agriculture in all of its details. However, he has followed general agriculture less than dairying, the latter having been his principal occupation for a considerable period. The property which he owns consists of eighty acres under the ditch on the hill and creamery roads, about two and one-half miles south of Newman, in Merced county, directly across the line from Stanislaus county. The land is under alfalfa, which he uses as feed for his herd of thirty cows and the other stock that he keeps on the farm. When the New Era Creamery Company was organized he became one of the first stockholders and has since retained his close connection with this pioneer industry of its kind. Though not active in politics, he has always favored Democratic principles and never fails to support the men and measures of the organization. Personally he is a genial, companionable gentleman, who not only enjoys a reputation as a successful dairyman, but is esteemed as a valued citizen, accommodating neighbor and unselfish friend.

CHARLES MANTER. Although a resident of California for more than forty-two years, it was not until recently that Mr. Manter settled upon his fine little fruit farm, two miles and a half west of Hanford, in Kings county, for during the period of his residence in California he has devoted his time and energies to various occupations, principally to mining and ranching. A descendant of sturdy New England parents, and himself a native of Franklin county, Me., where he was born April 6, 1843, Mr. Manter is next to the youngest child in a family of six children born to James and Maria (Norton) Manter, and grandson of Benjamin Manter. The latter, a native of Massachusetts, was for many years a resident of that state, and early took to life on the water. He was a whaler, and upon several occasions took a trip around the West Indies. Late in life, he retired from the sea and moved to Franklin county, Me., when that locality was yet all heavy timber land. Here he cleared and improved a farm upon

The father of Charles Manter was born upon the above named farm in Franklin county, Me., and was a life-long resident of that vicinity. He followed farming and at the time of his demise was eighty-one years old. His wife, who was born in the same state, passed away at the age of sixty-two years, leaving six children. The boyhood days of Charles Manter were spent upon the home place and he assisted his father in farm pursuits until he attained the age of nineteen years. In January, 1862, he left his New England home for California, the trip being made by water and by the Panama route. Upon reaching his destination, he located for a brief time in Placer county, but afterward found employment on a toll road in Nevada county, where he worked for a short time. Returning to Placer county, he worked on a farm for a couple of years as farmhand and during the winters he contracted at getting out timber for the mines.

During the Civil war Mr. Manter showed his patriotism by enlisting in Company I, Eighth California Regiment, and saw about a year's service at San Francisco and vicinity, afterward returning to the mining district. Here he took up mining with disastrous results, losing everything, and for a year afterward he was deeply in debt. Leaving the mines, he secured work in the flour mills of Marysville, where he worked for a time, but mining still held out inducements to him in spite of his loss and caused him to return to the mines of Sierra and Plumas county, where he worked for wages until the fall of 1871, during which time he was again on the road to prosperity. In the fall of that year he went to Portersville, Tulare county, and became foreman of a large sheep ranch for several years. In December, 1876, he purchased a number of sheep which he took to a recently purchased eighty-acre tract in what is now Kings county, and upon this land, about three miles east of Lemoore, he followed sheep ranching and horse raising until January, 1903, selling out at that time. Soon afterward he purchased twenty acres of his present farm, which he planted in peaches and vineyards, and in the fall of the same year, by an additional purchase, he added twenty acres of land adjoining, the greater part of which is also in vines and peaches. His vineyards contain mostly the celebrated raisin grape, which is so extensively grown in this locality. Mr. Manter is unmarried and his present prosperity is due to his undivided efforts, as he began entirely without capital, and, as a perusal of the above facts will show, he has encountered many difficulties, which he finally overcame.

During his short residence in this vicinity he has already gained the good will of his neighbors and he affiliates with but one fraternal order, the Masons. Politically a Republican, Mr. Manter could never be persuaded to accept office, preferring as he does to devote his undivided time to his business pursuits.

ARCHIE ALEXANDER MAYES. From the first years of manhood the energies of Mr. Mayes have been directed to agricultural pursuits and for the past thirty-five years he has been a resident of Stanislaus county, Cal., easily ranking at the present time among the most successful dairy farmers of this county. It was in 1896 that he purchased an eighty-acre tract of land one mile and a half northeast of Crow's Landing and engaged in farm pursuits on his own behalf. He now owns sixty-six acres of his original purchase. His attractive and convenient residence is surrounded by lawns, family orchards, etc., and the land not used as pasturage is devoted to raising alfalfa. His dairy is supplied by fifty-five choice cows, and he disposes of his dairy products to the local creamery.

Mr. Mayes is well connected on both paternal and maternal sides of the family. He was born June 19, 1848, in the vicinity of Lexington, Rockbridge county, Va., which was also the birthplace of his father. He is the seventh child in a family of nine born to Albert and Elizabeth (Turner) Mayes, the latter born near Lynchburg, in Amherst county, Va. A farmer by occupation, the father spent his entire life in Rockbridge county, and died in 1855, his widow dying four years later.

The mental training of A. A. Mayes, obtained from the common schools near his home, was necessarily very limited, owing to the unsettled state of the country during the Civil war, which brought about hard times. Obligated early in life to become self-supporting, he naturally chose the occupation of his father and engaged in farm pursuits. After the termination of the war, about 1867, Mr. Mayes left the home of his boyhood and went to Missouri, locating for a couple of years in Pike county near Clarksville. During this time he worked as a farm hand and in 1869 he came to California, which has been his home almost ever since. In the San Joaquin valley, at the junction of the Orestimba creek and the San Joaquin river, he obtained work on a farm and for twenty-five years was in the employ of Crow Brothers, being identified with their business up to 1896. In 1875 he severed his connection with farm pursuits for a time and for one year officiated as superintendent of a street railway in Stockton, then owned by the Crow Brothers. He subsequently took charge of their stock and cat-

the ranch in Nevada for a short time and during the remainder of the time he worked for them he was employed in the San Joaquin valley on the Stanislaus county farms.

The home ties of Mr. Mayes date back to the year of his residence in Stockton, for it was in that city that he married Miss Ella Delano, a woman of high intellectual attainments, who was born in Massachusetts. Mr. and Mrs. Mayes have one daughter, Myra D., and one son, Albert Alexander. The political views of Mr. Mayes coincide with straight Democratic doctrines and he has had much to say and to do in the guidance of that party in his section. His estate is kept in prime condition, clearly giving the best evidence as to the thrifty character and methodical habits of the owner, who has won an enviable reputation, not only as a keen, up-to-date farmer, but also as a clear-headed business man.

FRANCIS W. LAUGHLIN. The worthy descendant of an honored pioneer family of Stanislaus county Francis W. Laughlin has spent the major part of his life within its limits, and has been actively associated with its agricultural and industrial development and progress. A son of the late James E. Laughlin, he was born March 1, 1857, in Linn county, Kans. His grandfather, William Laughlin, was born in Kentucky, his parents having removed there from South Carolina. Becoming an early settler of Osage county, Mo., he took up land, and was there engaged in tilling the soil the remainder of his life.

A native of Missouri, James E. Laughlin was born October 20, 1829, in Osage county, where his earlier years were passed. From there he migrated to Linn county, Kans., and was there prosperously engaged in farming a number of years. In 1862, with horse and mule teams, he came overland to California, bringing his wife and two children, following the wagon trail through Murphy and Copperopolis, in Calaveras county. At once locating in Stanislaus county, he entered three hundred and twenty acres, being the first person to take up land back from the river, and doing so against the protest of his neighbors, all of whom predicted that he would soon be starved out. He began raising grain, and was so successful that he afterward purchased one hundred and sixty acres of adjoining land, and on his ranch of four hundred and eighty acres continued his agricultural labors for thirty years. Selling out in 1890, he continued his residence in that locality for two years, but was retired from active pursuits. In 1902 he removed to Oakdale, where he subsequently lived until his death, October 26, 1903, at the age of seventy-four years. He married Sarah

E. Moore, who was born in Tennessee, but was reared in Osage county, Mo., whither her father, Patrick Moore, settled as a pioneer farmer. She survives her husband, and now makes her home with her children, having one son and one daughter, namely: Francis W., the special subject of this sketch, and Mrs. Sarah E. Pyeatt of Madera county.

Coming with his parents to Stanislaus county when five years old, Francis W. Laughlin here received all the advantages for obtaining an education that the district schools afforded. Being bred to agricultural pursuits, he naturally adopted farming as his occupation, and at the age of twenty-one years rented and operated a ranch on his own account. In 1886, having made considerable money in his chosen work, he bought three hundred and twenty acres of land, not far from the old homestead, and there carried on general farming for six years. Selling that farm in 1902, Mr. Laughlin located in Oakdale, about one and one-half miles from the village, where he owns and occupies a finely improved ranch of two hundred and forty-five acres. His land is well watered by the ditch and yields him large crops of alfalfa and grain. Most of the time Mr. Laughlin resides in Oakdale.

Mr. Laughlin married, in San Francisco, Mrs. Mamie J. (Gable) Armstrong, who was born in Calaveras county, where her father, William Armstrong, a pioneer farmer and stock raiser, spent the larger part of his life, dying there in 1890. Mr. and Mrs. Laughlin have one child, namely: Alpha. Politically Mr. Laughlin is a strong Republican, and fraternally he is a member of Oakdale Lodge No. 275, F. & A. M. Mrs. Laughlin is a faithful and valued member of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

ROBERT H. WALLIS, a prosperous citizen living five miles east of Le Grand, figures prominently in the affairs of the community. Besides his home ranch of eight hundred and forty acres, five miles east of Le Grand, and the four-hundred-acre ranch adjoining, he leases and owns one hundred and sixty acres of land in the foothills, all of which is almost entirely devoted to the raising of grain, especially barley, of which splendid crops are obtained, and some attention is also given to stock raising.

Robert H. Wallis is a son of John K. Wallis, a native of England, from which country he journeyed to the United States when but seven years of age, accompanying his parents. Locating in Wisconsin, John K. Wallis, when of sufficient age, commenced farming. In 1850 he came to California by way of the Isthmus of Panama, and settled near Sonora, Tuolumne county, where he remained six years, engaged in mining. At the end of that period he went back to Wisconsin, again coming west at a later date; this time crossing the plains, through Colorado to Utah, where he mined until death claimed him in 1870, owing to an accident in the mines. He married Elizabeth James, who, like her husband, was born in England and reared in Wisconsin.

A native of Iowa county, Wis., Robert H. Wallis was born October 14, 1859, and reared on his father's farm in that section. At the age of ten years he hired out at $5 per month to work on a farm. Like his father, he was attracted westward and in 1881 came to California and located near Modesto, where he engaged as a hired hand. As he grew more prosperous he rented land, and in 1885 made a permanent settlement on the ranch where he now lives. He took for his life companion Rosa Dickinson, who bore him two children, John S. and Rosa R. In 1895, Mrs. Wallis' death occurred, a sad bereavement to the family and a large circle of friends. Mr. Wallis is a progressive and public-spirited citizen. He is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and politically is an adherent of the principles advocated by the Republican party.

SAMUEL LA FAYETTE RITCHEY. In DeKalb county, Tenn., April 12, 1867, S. L. Ritchey was born, a son of Micajah M. Ritchey. The latter was a native of the same state and in 1870 he brought his family to California. He first located on the present site of Modesto, Stanislaus county, where he engaged in blacksmithing and farming for a number of years. In 1882 the family removed to Merced county where the father and his sons are all prominent and successful ranchers, widely known and esteemed for their business ability as well as personal worth. Their ranches are numbered among the first in point of cultivation and improvement in this section.

Reared and educated in Stanislaus and Merced counties, S. L. Ritchey has known no other home. He remained on the paternal ranch and assisted in the home duties until 1892, in which year he took up independent operations and has since been engaged in farming for himself. He is now located one and a half mile from Le Grand, on Mariposa creek, where he has eighty acres of land, six of which are devoted to the cultivation of orchard fruits and a vineyard. He has a well two hundred and seventy-five feet deep, and a twelve horse-power pump, while in many other ways his ranch is well improved. Following the training of his boyhood and young manhood he gives to his work an intelligent and practical interest, and conducts his farming enterprise in a methodical and business-like manner.

Mr. Ritchey married Stella Turner, a native of Texas, and they are the parents of two children, namely: Roscoe and Donald. Politically he adheres to the principles advocated in the platform of the Democratic party, and in his religious affiliations is a member of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church.

RICHARD CHATTEN. Living retired in the city of Visalia is Richard Chatten, better known among his personal friends as Dick Chatten, who since October, 1852, has been recognized as one of the upbuilders of Tulare county. He was born in Ontario, Canada, December 11, 1826, the fifth in order of birth of nine children born to his parents. He received his education in the common schools of Canada and New York, and in 1849 returned to Canada with his father, but that same year came back to the States with the determination of going to what was to him the unknown west, which held alluring prospects. After spending six weeks in Illinois he journeyed to St. Louis, and April 1, 1850, he left Leavenworth, Kans., with an emigrant train for the long trip across the plains, reaching California in September of that year.

In Eldorado county he engaged in mining for a time, then followed that same occupation in Mariposa county at Quartsburg and Cotterville until August 1, 1852. During this time he had contracted chills and fever, and, after leaving Cotterville he spent some time in Los Angeles, and in October of that year came to Tulare county, where he pre-empted one hundred and sixty acres of land ten miles west of the present city of Visalia. Being in its primeval condition, he at once began improving it with buildings, and embarked in the stock raising business. From this small beginning he added from time to time until he acquired four thousand acres in the same locality; six hundred and sixty acres of this is now known as the Mineral King orchard, which he disposed of at a very satisfactory price. He removed to Visalia in 1886 and has since made this city his home, though superintending the work of his various ranches up to the present time.

January 12, 1854, he married Margaret Glenn, who was born in Tennessee and who died in Visalia, leaving one son and three daughters, namely: Eliza, wife of Louis Whitendale, near Visalia; Frances, Etta, and Thomas. For a second wife, Mr. Chatten married, in 1892, Mrs. Leah (Miller) Davis, widow of the late Thomas H. Davis, a pioneer of Antelope Valley. Mrs. Chatten was born in Arkansas and crossed the plains to California in 1856, and since 1857 has been a resident of Tulare county. Mr. and Mrs. Chatten are much respected by a wide circle of acquaintances in Tulare county. A Republican in politics, Mr. Chatten has never aspired to official positions. He was made a Mason in 1857, and is a member of the Blue Lodge, Chapter and Commandery, of Visalia.

In all movements that have had for their object the advancement of the social, moral, educational and industrial welfare of Tulare county Richard Chatten has been a prominent factor. He has watched the growth of the county and of California with practical eye, and himself is one of the substantial, conservative and progressive men of the San Joaquin valley, and to such men as he California is indebted for much of her present prosperity.

CARL C. CLAUSEN, a successful rancher of Merced county, was born in Denmark April 27, 1849. He remained in his native land until 1870, when he set sail for the new world and finally found himself in Detroit, Mich.

Since 1870, Mr. Clausen has seen many places in the United States, working in a number of different parts before settling in California. Two years of his time were spent in Illinois, three years in Clear Creek county, Colo., and in November, 1879, he came to California, locating in Solano county. There he farmed one year and in 1880 came to Merced county, where he has since resided, with the exception of the year 1894, when he paid a visit to his native land. He was married in California October 12, 1897, to Julie Jacobsen, also a native of Denmark. Three bright children, Carl, Albert and Emery, now bless their home.

Mr. Clausen is a Republican in his political views and stands high in the esteem of his fellow citizens. From working on a farm for wages, in his earlier years, he has worked his way up in the world, next leasing a half-section of land and raising grain. In 1897 he purchased his present ranch of eight hundred acres, besides which he owns a good timber claim in the Sierra mountains and leases two sections of land near Le Grand. All his farming land is devoted to grain and his success is richly deserved.

HENRY CALCOTE. The purchase of forty acres in 1894 formed the nucleus to which Mr. Calcote has added from time to time until at this writing (1905) his landed possessions aggregate two hundred and forty acres in one body, located four and three-quarters miles northeast of Visalia, and adjoining the old Calcote homestead now owned and occupied by his brother, William. While various farm products are grown on the land, a specialty is made of the stock business and a large portion of the acreage is devoted to pasturage, while forty acres are under alfalfa. Water from the Mathews ditch furnishes adequate irrigation facilities and enhances the value of the property. Not only has the owner been successful in raising and feeding cattle and hogs, but he has also won exceptional success as a dairyman, and possesses the necessary equipment for this industry, including a modern separator of approved make. The improvements on the place, including a neat farm house, prove him to be a man of energy and resourcefulness, possessing the thrifty qualities necessary to modern farming.

On the Calcote homestead near his present home Mr. Calcote was born September 18, 1859, being a son of A. K. Calcote, whose life record appears elsewhere in this volume, in the biography of William Calcote. Little of special moment occurred to mark the boyhood years of Henry Calcote. The winter months were spent in attendance upon the school of the Elbow creek district, while in the summer he aided his father in caring for the stock and cultivating the land of the home farm. On attaining his majority he started out for himself, his first independent work being as a farmer on the St. John's river, where for seven years he managed the Togue place of one hundred and forty acres, and engaged in raising grain, cattle and hogs. In 1894 he bought forty acres adjoining the homestead and this place, with its subsequent additions of land, forms his present home and the scene of his activities. Like his father, he favors Democratic principles. At one time he was a member of the election board and he has also served as a member of the school board.

The marriage of Henry Calcote occurred in Visalia and united him with Miss Mary Kate Spiese, who was born in Pennsylvania. They have had five children, four now living, Manie, Della, Fred and Leta. Mrs. Calcote is the only survivor among the four children of Fred and Sophia (Zimmer) Spiese, natives respectively of Nassau and Bavaria, Germany. Her maternal grandfather was lost at sea. The paternal grandfather, Jacob Spiese, a native of Nassau, and a shoemaker by trade, came to America in 1846 and settled at York, Pa. At the opening of the Civil war in 1861 he enlisted in Company I, Eleventh Pennsylvania Cavalry, in which he served for three years. After the expiration of his term of service he became a member of Company A, Two Hundredth Pennsylvania Infantry, where he served until peace was declared. After the war ended he returned to York, Pa., where he died at seventy-two years of age. Of his four children (all still living) Fred was third in order of birth, and was born in Germany, November 24, 1842. When four years of age he accompanied his parents to America. March 15, 1860, he was apprenticed to the carpenter's trade, and followed the occupation until 1863, when he responded to an emergency call for volunteers in the state militia to protect the railroad bridges of the state. During 1864 he enlisted in Company A, Two Hundredth Pennsylvania Infantry, of which his father and brother, Lewis, also were members. The regiment was assigned to the army of the Potomac and participated in a number of the last engagements of the memorable war. With his father and brother he took part in the grand review and then received an honorable discharge, June 30, 1865, after which he resumed carpentering in his home neighborhood.

From 1872 until 1875 Mr. Spiess was a resident of Pittsfield, Ill., and then came to California, settling in Visalia and following the carpenter's trade. Later he began to take contracts for houses and business blocks. While living in Pennsylvania he married Miss Zimmer, a woman of estimable character and a helpmate to him in all of his undertakings. Fraternally he is connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and Gen. George Wright Post No. 111, G. A. R., in the work of both of which he maintains a deep interest.

WILLIAM WHEALAN, one of the leading agriculturists of Merced county, possesses exceptional qualifications for the business to which his life has been devoted, and for a period of forty-two years has been identified with the steady growth and development of California. He was born in Seneca county, Ohio, February 17, 1838, and was reared on the farm owned by his father, who was one of the most prosperous and prominent men in his locality. John Whealan, a native of Ireland, came to the United States at an early date, locating in Ohio, and it was there that the greater part of his life was spent, dying there at the advanced age of eighty-four years, six months and eighteen days. He married Mary Barbara Swalley, who was born in Pennsylvania and at the time of her death had attained the age of eighty-two years.

William Whealan remained in the east until twenty-four years of age. In 1862 he went to New York city, taking passage on a steamer bound for the Panama district en route for California. After crossing the isthmus he completed the journey to San Francisco on the steamer St. Louis and soon after his arrival in that city he left for Placerville, where he tried his luck in the mines. Very soon, however, he abandoned this course and returned to San Francisco, where he was engaged as longshoreman for several years. In 1865 he turned his attention to farming, setting first in Napa county and in 1871 in Merced county, renting land until 1875, when he felt able to purchase a place of his own. He then bought the ranch of three hundred and twenty acres upon which he now resides, located eight miles east of Merced, and which is devoted to raising stock and grain. Not having sufficient land for his needs he rents two sections of land, which he devotes to wheat and barley. The prosperity and thrift of the owner will be seen from the comfortable residence, substantial and well-filled barns and finely fenced fields.

By his marriage in Napa county, Cal., March 31, 1867, Mr. Whealan was united with Cynthia Halterman, a daughter of Joseph and Abigail (Barnett) Halterman, who immigrated to California in 1854 with their family, from Ohio, where Mrs. Whealan was born. Mr. and Mrs. Whealan have an intelligent family of nine children, named in the order of their birth as follows: Dena, the wife of George Landis, of Merced; Loretta, who became the wife of Howard Wills, of Le Grand; Ida, the wife of William Sering, of Merced; Minnie; Hattie; Frankie, wife of George D. Farr; William Blaine; Belle and Eugene. The family are members of the Presbyterian Church. Fraternally Mr. Whealan is a member of the Odd Fellows, and Woodmen of the World. In his political views he is ever to be found in the ranks of the Republican party. Mr. Whealan's widespread reputation as a successful stock and grain raiser is the result of a wise selection in choosing his life calling, engaging in the line of work for which he was best fitted and the one most congenial to him. By his public spirit he has gained recognition as one of the men who have ever had the best interest of the county at heart and with time, influence and means have liberally supported all projects that would advance the interests of the citizens.

ALEXANDER BARBOUR. An expert in the use of tools of all kinds, with a special aptitude for mechanical pursuits, Alexander Barbour was for many years actively identified with the upbuilding of Newman as a carpenter and contractor. A man of great integrity and business ability, honest and honorable in all his dealings, he has won the respect and esteem of his fellowmen, and the high regard in which he is held gives evidence of his upright and manly life. Coming from a long line of thrifty Scotch ancestry, he was born September 15, 1843, in the Island of Bute, a son of Hugh Barbour.

A native of Scotland, Hugh Barbour was born on one of the Cumbrae Islands, near Bute, in the Frith of Clyde, and was there brought up to agricultural pursuits. Immigrating to this country in 1849, he settled in Bradford county, Pa., where he followed the occupation to which he was bred in his island home, and was there employed in general farming until his death. His wife, whose maiden name was Margaret Hunter, also was born on one of the Cumbrae Islands, Scotland, and died in Bradford county, Pa. Three boys and two girls blessed their union, and of these the three sons are living, namely: James, living on the home farm in Pennsylvania; Hugh, in Seattle, Wash.; and Alexander, the subject of this sketch.

But six years old when he came with his parents to the United States, Alexander Barbour was educated in the common schools of Pennsylvania, and afterward served an apprenticeship at the carpenter trade. Leaving home in 1877, he removed to Ogle county, Ill., locating at Kings, where he worked at his trade for eleven years. Coming from there to California in 1888, Mr. Barbour purchased his present home estate of thirty acres, situated two miles northeast of Newman, where he has thirty acres of land, on which he raises fine crops of alfalfa. For ten years after coming here, he continued as a contractor and carpenter, assisting in the erection of many houses and public buildings, including among others the building of the Methodist Episcopal Church, for which he took the contract, and helped to finish the Newman school building and the Russ hotel.

In Towanda, Pa., Mr. Barbour married Martha Greening, who was born in Orange county, N. Y., a daughter of Hubert Greening. Her father was a native of New Jersey, as was also her mother, Elmira Lundy. Settling in Pennsylvania soon after his marriage, he there engaged in agricultural pursuits until his death. Mr. and Mrs. Barbour have one child, namely: Edward M. Barbour. In politics Mr. Barbour is a strong Prohibitionist, and while living in Illinois was active in public affairs, serving as justice of the peace and as school director.

MRS. ALICE A. HANNA. Not since Oakdale took on the dignity and importance of a postal station have the affairs of Uncle Sam been more satisfactorily attended to than under the administration of Mrs. Alice A. Hanna, the present incumbent of the office. Receiving her appointment from President McKinley in 1898, Mrs. Hanna was re-appointed by President Roosevelt in July, 1902, and in the meantime the bulk of matter to be cared for had increased materially with the town's continuous growth, calling for more expeditious methods and larger capacity. That she has been equal to all demands upon her ingenuity and ability admits of no possibility of doubt, and neither does the fact that the citizens appreciate the dependability and stability of their always genial and accommodating postmistress. This high esteem is also enjoyed by the efficient assistant postmistress, Miss Adella A. Hanna.

Mrs. Hanna represents a family numerously identified with the early and later history of Stanislaus county, and one which has reflected credit upon its business, agricultural and judiciary growth. Born in the state of Massachusetts, she is a daughter of L. T. and Sarah (Smith) Hill, of whom the father was born in Vermont and the mother in New Hampshire, and who became very early settlers of Dixon county, Neb. Mr. and Mrs. Hill are at present making their home in Soquel, Santa Cruz county, the former having long since retired from active life. In Vermilion, S. Dak., Mrs. Hanna married J. E. Hanna, son of Judge John Hanna of McConnellsville, Ohio, and thereafter lived principally in South Dakota and Nebraska until coming to California in the fall of 1891. Settling in Oakdale, the climate, wonderfully rejuvenating to the majority, seemed to disagree with Mr. Hanna, who died a few months later without having realized the advantages of climate and business among which he dwelt. His wife continued to reside here, making many friends, and by her strong character and ability winning a stable place in the homes of the elect of the city. Her appointment to the postmastership was received with general approval, and her subsequent admirable management has but strengthened her in the popular regard. Faithfully she is caring also for her children, educating them to the best of her ability and preparing them for lives of usefulness in the future. She is a member of the Presbyterian Church and one of the church's most zealous and earnest workers.

Mention of Mrs. Hanna's family would be incomplete without according due honor in these pages to Judge C. S. S. Hill, her paternal uncle, who, after a career of exceptional activity and usefulness, and while making his home with Mrs. Hanna in Oakdale, died at the age of ninety-two years. This veteran member of the bench viewed complacently his many mile-posts, reflecting in appearance and manner the temperate and sound mind which governed his creditable undertakings. Coming to California in 1852, he soon after stepped into a waiting niche at Knights Ferry, where he became known as one of its most successful pioneer merchants and postmasters, and as probate judge for many years. While Oakdale was still a small village in 1870, he took up his residence here, and for years was one of its most prominent and progressive citizens, interesting himself in its educational and civic advancement, and contributing of his time and means to such of its institutions as demanded his assistance. Besides owning large tracts of land in the country, he owned and laid out several additions to Oakdale, built several houses, and otherwise contributed to its lasting welfare. The passing years saw no diminution of his interest, although failing powers necessitated less strenuous participation in general affairs. His niece, Mrs. Hanna, spent the years from 1872 to 1874 in his family, and the strong bond of sympathy and good fellowship then formed between them never waned or was interrupted. His was a fine, strong character, and one upon whom his friends and associates could invariably rely. The twilight of his life was unhampered by many of the weaknesses and signs of impairment which often visit and remain with the older grown, and it was felt by all who knew him that his life was one of exceptional worth and interest.

FREDERICK NELSON. Adjoining Oakdale is what is unquestionably the finest almond orchard in Stanislaus county. Not only are the twenty acres covered with finely developed and prolific trees, but the grove presents an aspect of thrift and painstaking care equaled but rarely exceeded in any part of the state. Its owner, Frederick Nelson, has always maintained that whatever was worth doing at all was worth doing well, and in confirmation of his theory his orchard rears its beautiful trees and puts forth its rich, time-honored harvest, guarded as faithfully through the years as a child whose conduct depended upon its sympathetic and kindly surroundings. Mr. Nelson is essentially a lover of the things that have their growth in the soil, and the process affords him endless study and interest. He counts no effort too great to accomplish the best possible on his ranch, and the soil responds generously to his practical and earnest efforts. His home ranch consists of a pleasant California home and of an orchard of various kinds of fruit, intended solely for family use. That he has been successful is evidenced a mile south of Oakdale, where he owns his farm of two hundred and thirty-nine acres, devoted principally to grain raising and under a high state of improvement. His chief pride, however, is his almond orchard, under whose shady trees he wanders gratefully and gladly, feeling the success imparted by their sturdy and unfailing production and the promise held out by the advantages of the climate and soil in which he lives.

Mr. Nelson was born in Ostrejötlan, Norrköping, Sweden, May 14, 1845, and is the second oldest of three sons and three daughters born to his now deceased parents, Nels and Fredericka (Maller) Nelson, the former of whom was a contracting stone mason. Of this family, reared in an humble and God-fearing home, two sons and one daughter are now living in America, all having made their own way in the world, having had few educational or other advantages in their youth. Frederick was obliged to support himself at the age of eleven, when he found work on a farm near his home, and since that time he has had no help whatsoever in a financial way. Frugal and saving as are the majority of his countrymen, he had sufficient means to come to America in November, 1868, and after locating in Burlington, Iowa, he worked for the railroad there, later going to St. Joseph, Mo., and in 1873 gave further rein to his ambition by coming to Sonoma county, this state. Working on a ranch near Stockton for a couple of years, he began farming for himself on the Calaveras river in San Joaquin county in 1877, devoting his land to grain and cattle, and in time moving to the Latimer ranch, where his former success continued unabated. In 1891 he came to Oakdale and bought twenty-seven acres of his present ranch, adjoining the town, where he has since made his home, and which has richly improved under his energy and good management.

August 28, 1876, Mr. Nelson married in Stockton, Mary Johnson, a native of Vermland, Sweden, who became the mother of six children, the oldest daughter Emma, dying at the age of twenty. Ida is now Mrs. Adams of Sonora; Albert is a farmer of Ione, Ore.; Minnie is the wife of George Crawford of Oakdale; Anna Florence is the wife of J. H. Powell of Oakdale; and Roy Austin is at home. In national politics Mr. Nelson is a Republican, but in local affairs is guided by existing conditions. For five years he was a trustee of the school board in San Joaquin county and has always taken a keen interest in the cause of education. In religion he is a Methodist, and has for years been a trustee, at present serving also as steward. He is a progressive and enlightened citizen, representing the best traits and attainments of the people of Sweden, and finding in his adopted country many who rejoice at his success and his ready adaptation of American customs and language.

GEORGE D. FARR. The grain and stock resources of Merced county have made independent fortunes for many industriously inclined land owners, with the result that it is one of the best known sections of the state to be devoted to these commodities. One of the most prominent of the grain and stock raisers in the vicinity of Geneva is George D. Farr, owner of two hundred and fifty acres of land, including the town site of Geneva. Prior to the purchase of his present home place he farmed three and one-half sections of land. In his family lives Michael Farr, the father to whom he owes his early training and education, and whose ambition and hardihood resulted in establishing the family on the coast. The elder Farr was born in Canada, and there married Catherine Nash, with whom he began housekeeping on a northern Canadian farm. He was successful and saved money, and with his wife came to California in 1852, sailing from New York to Aspinwall, and from Panama to San Francisco. After three years of success and failure in the mines along the American river, he began farming in Santa Clara valley, in 1856 removing to San Joaquin county, and from there to Contra Costa county. In the latter county he had a ranch of two thousand acres devoted mainly to stock. He lived for a short time in Livermore, Alameda county. In 1889 he sold his land and came with his son to his present farm near Geneva, where he is enjoying fair health and is in good spirits, notwithstanding that seventy-six years have passed over his head.

George D. Farr was born on his father's farm in Contra Costa county, May 11, 1867, and when old enough to assume responsibility entered into a business partnership with his father. It was largely through his advice that the Contra Costa farm was sold and the one near Geneva purchased. Mr. Farr has effected a transformation in his property, has made many improvements and has exerted every energy to make his ranch a model of its kind. He is progressive, cautious and painstaking, and is one of the best authorities on grain and stock raising in the county. Since locating here he has married Frankie Whealan, a daughter of William Whealan, a prominent rancher in their neighborhood. Four children have been born into the Farr household: Viva, who was accidentally killed September 7, 1904; Zytta, Curtis and Stanley.

SAMUEL JONATHAN REYNOLDS GILBERT. The Gilbert family was once prominent in English history, the first American emigrant being a member of the bodyguard of the king. Through an entanglement which endangered his life he was forced to leave the country and chose as his safest location the American colonies. This was before the Revolutionary war, and since that time the family has flourished on American soil. The great-grandfather of Samuel J. R. Gilbert served valiantly in the Revolutionary war, in which he was taken prisoner, and returned to the country of his forefathers.

J. R. Gilbert, born in Woodstock, Vt., in 1806, emigrated to Ohio in the early '40s and located in Akron. After the discovery of gold he crossed the plains to California in 1849, being captain of a large train which he organized. He engaged in mining in Shasta county for a short time, after which he took up the general merchandise business. In 1852 he returned east for his family, bringing them to California via the Nicaragua route. The remainder of his life was spent in this state, his death occurring in 1879. He is survived by his wife, formerly Dorcas Fillebrown, born in Boston, Mass., in 1816, and she now makes her home with her son, S. J. R. Gilbert, in Visalia, at the age of eighty-nine years. Of her three sons, one is deceased, while the other two, Frank W. and S. J. R., are engaged in business together in this city.

Samuel Jonathan Reynolds Gilbert was born in Akron, Ohio, June 20, 1847, the second child in his parents' family. He was not quite six years old when he came to California, so the greater part of his education was received in the common schools of this state. In young manhood he engaged with his father in the general merchandise business in Shasta, afterward, in 1871, going to Redding, Shasta county, where he put up the first tents of the town, for a time thereafter acting as assistant railway agent. He then entered into the hardware and plumbing business and met with a success which justified his continuance for nearly twenty years. In the fall of 1891 he went to Fresno and for four years was associated with the plumbing department of Kutner, Goldstein & Co. In August, 1900, he came to Visalia and engaged in the tinning and plumbing business, the style of the firm name being Gilbert & Son, the latter being his son Fred S. Gilbert. From a small beginning the business has grown to remunerative proportions and they now cater to an extensive and lucrative trade.

In Shasta, Cal., Mr. Gilbert was united in marriage with Elizabeth Wilhelm, a native of New York and the descendant of an old German family. Born of this union were four sons and three daughters, of whom one daughter is deceased; Mary Winifred is the wife of J. P. Eaton, a prominent business man of Redding, where he conducts a stationery store; George W. is a dentist of Fresno; Fred S. is in business with his father; Walter F. is located in Portland, Ore.; Stella May became the wife of F. W. Velie, assistant cashier of the First National Bank of Portersville; and J. R., completes the family. Fraternally Mr. Gilbert is prominent as a Mason, having joined the organization in Redding, Cal., in 1880. He is past master of Blue Lodge No. 303 of Portersville; belongs to Visalia Chapter No. 44, R. A. M.; Visalia Commandery No. 26, K. T.; and Islam Temple A. A. O. N. M. S., of San Francisco. Politically he adheres to the principles advocated in the platform of the Republican party. Mr. Gilbert is a broad-minded, public-spirited citizen and has always given his best efforts to advance the general welfare in whatever community he has made his home. While a resident of Redding, Cal., he was one of the prime movers in securing that city as the county seat and his aid was invaluable, as it was one of the hardest struggles in the history of that section. He acted as secretary of the immigration committee of that county and in every way made his own interests parallel with those of the city, county and state which he had made his own by adoption. Since his location in Visalia he has shown the same liberal and enterprising spirit and works with the same earnestness toward the progress and advancement of this city. He is a prominent social figure and occupies a position of importance in the business world, as well, enjoying to an unusual degree the esteem of all who know him.

GUY KILBURN. Numbered among the more prominent and prosperous of the earlier pioneers of California was the late Guy Kilburn, of Newman, who came to this state in 1852, and from that time until his death, January 23, 1903, was actively identified with its agricultural and industrial prosperity. A man of sterling worth and integrity, honest and upright in all of his dealings, he gained the respect and good will of the community in which he resided, and his death was deeply deplored as a public loss. He was born November 17, 1836, in Tioga county, Pa., which was also the birthplace of his father, Wells Kilburn.

Reared to agricultural pursuits, Wells Kilburn was engaged as a tiller of the soil in his native state until 1852, when, with his family, he came by way of the Isthmus of Panama to California, being shipwrecked while en route. Taking up land in Napa county, he was there engaged in his independent occupation of a farmer the remainder of his life. He married, in Baltimore, Md., Ann Guy, a native of that city.

Having obtained the rudiments of his education in his native county, Guy Kilburn completed his early studies at a college in Baltimore, Md. Coming with the family to the Pacific coast, he assisted his father in improving a farm, and afterward engaged in farming on his own account in the Napa valley. Removing to Contra Costa county in 1867, he followed his chosen occupation in Antioch for a year. In 1868 Mr. Kilburn located at Hills Ferry, and having purchased the ten hundred and twenty acres included in his homestead, which lies four miles north of Newman, he began the improvement of a farm. He was for many years successfully employed as a grain raiser, but devoted the latter years of his life to stock-raising and dairying, carrying on an extensive and profitable business until his decease.

In Napa, Cal., Mr. Kilburn married Jeannette A. Smith, who was born near West Liberty, Iowa, a daughter of Egbert T. Smith. A native of New York state, Mr. Smith was born and reared on Long Island, his birth occurring in 1817. When a young man he journeyed on horseback to Ohio, locating in Franklin, where he took up a tract of timbered land, from which he cleared a farm. In 1835 he continued his journey westward to Iowa, where he continued as a tiller of the soil for nearly a score of years. Coming from there to California via Panamá in 1852, he was employed in mercantile pursuits at Marysville for two years, and then went to Napa county, where he took up land, which he managed during his remaining years of activity, living in Napa until his death, in 1879, at the venerable age of eighty-five years. Mr. Smith married Sarah Schencke, who was born in Ohio, a daughter of Rev. William Schencke, and died, in 1851, in Iowa. Of the union of Mr. and Mrs. Kilburn nine children were born, namely: Stella, wife of William C. Smith, of Stockton, Cal.; Ada, at home; Ruth, wife of George Stewart, of Stanislaus county; Kate, wife of F. M. Eachus, of San Francisco; E. S., living at home; Ella, wife of W. G. Wilson, of Madera county; Mabel, wife of L. M. Doty, of San Francisco; Charles L., of San Francisco; and Guy, at home. Politically Mr. Kilburn was a staunch Republican in his views; religiously he was a member of the Episcopal Church; and fraternally he was an active and influential Mason, having passed through all the different organizations of the Masonic order, and taken the thirty-second degree. He became a Knight Templar in the Stockton Commandery. Since the death of Mr. Kilburn, the family have sold the dairy business, and two hundred acres of land. The balance of the property is rented for dairy purposes.

ASA EDWARD MOUTREY. As manager of the Le Grand Rochdale, a general merchandise establishment of this place, Mr. Moutrey ranks among the most prominent business men of this section. A native Californian, he was born in Plainsberg, Merced county, November 16, 1874, a son of Thomas L. Moutrey. The latter was born in Missouri in 1847, his parents being natives of Kentucky. In young manhood he married Elizabeth Hayes, also a native of Missouri and the daughter of Upton Hayes, of Kentucky, a grandson of Daniel Boone. When five years old Thomas L. Moutrey removed to Texas with his parents, and while a resident of that state served as soldier in the Confederate army, being then but seventeen years of age. After the close of the war he followed farming in Texas until 1871, in which year he came to California, first locating in Mariposa county and engaging in agricultural pursuits for some time. In 1873 he removed to Merced county and located at Plainsberg, where he engaged in ranching until 1903, when he removed to Madera, where he remained one year, now making his residence in Le Grand. Four children were born to himself and wife, namely: Asa Edward, the subject of this sketch; Lemuel, Margaret and Fleda.

After attending the public schools of his native county, Mr. Moutrey entered the Pacific University at San Jose and studied for two and a half years. He then returned to Plainsberg and engaged in ranching for a number of years, in 1903 accepting the position of manager in the building of the store of the Rochdale Company, since which time he has been in their employ. This business is incorporated at $10,000, and carries a full line of general merchandise, three men being employed in the discharge of the work. The ability of Mr. Moutrey to plan and execute and his thorough understanding of the details of the business have added to the profitableness of the enterprise, as well as his uniform courtesy and desire to please the public winning many friends, who regard him both personally and commercially as an acquisition to the society of the place. In fraternal circles Mr. Moutrey is an Odd Fellow, a Mason and a member of the Woodmen of the World. Politically he is a staunch adherent of the principles advocated in the platform of the Democratic party.

JOSEPH LARKIN MOFFETT. Numbered among the active, enterprising and prosperous agriculturists of Tulare county is Joseph Larkin Moffett, who owns and occupies a well-tilled alfalfa ranch, advantageously located about five miles east of Visalia. Liberal, thoughtful and full of energy, he is ever ready to lend a hand toward the establishment of any good project, and these sterling characteristics have made him respected as an honored and useful member of the community. A son of Henry Moffett, he was born February 13, 1860, in Mendocino county, this state.

Although a native of Tennessee, Henry Moffett was brought up in Missouri, where his parents settled as pioneers when he was a lad. In 1856, convinced by the glowing descriptions of California that this state was surely the emigrant's eldorado, he joined a party bound for the Pacific coast, and crossed the intervening plains with ox teams. Locating in Mendocino county, he took up land and carried on dairying and farming for a number of years. Coming to Tulare county in 1864, he took up land in the Antelope valley, sixteen miles east of Visalia, and continued in his independent occupation. He was quite successful, and became owner of valuable tracts of land in the Sand creek district. Removing to Visalia in 1887, he was there engaged in the hardware business until 1895, when he sold out his stock to King & Co., and invested the proceeds in land. Taking up his residence in Orosi in 1898, he is a hale and hearty man of seventy-six years, living retired from active business. He is a steadfast supporter of the Democratic party and a valued member of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. He married Charlotta Smith, a native of Missouri, and they became the parents of thirteen children, eight boys and five girls, Joseph Larkin of this review being the third child in order of birth.

Having completed his early education in the district school, Joseph L. Moffett served an apprenticeship at the carpenter's trade, at which he worked for ten years, being employed in Visalia and Porterville. Turning his attention then to agricultural pursuits, he owned and operated a threshing machine outfit for eighteen summers, being employed in the San Joaquin valley, and at the same time carrying on general farming and stock raising. In 1899 Mr. Moffett purchased his present home ranch, which is situated five miles east of Visalia, and of which he had previously had the management for several years. It contains eighty acres of rich and fertile land, and in addition to raising large crops of alfalfa he raises hogs and cattle. A thorough-going farmer, paying strict attention to the details of his line of industry, Mr. Moffett has been successful in his undertakings.

In Visalia Mr. Moffett married Maggie Carter, who was born and bred in Tulare county, and they have eight children living, namely: Joseph Otto, Henry Clyde, Charles, Ewell, Dorothy, Claris, and Rena and Vena, twins. Politically Mr. Moffett is a staunch Democrat, having never swerved from the faith in which he was reared, and fraternally he belongs to the Visalia Lodge, W. O. W., of which he is a past officer.

MOSES DODGE. The possession of a ten-acre ranch two miles west of Fresno has brought Moses Dodge a realization of his desire for an ideal country existence and a competence. The modern improvements which add to the value of his property are entirely of his own making, for when he settled in Fresno in 1884 the ground was an undisturbed prairie, and at present is under cultivation to fruit and alfalfa. He is engaged in general farming and some stock raising, in both of which departments of country activity he is well schooled. Mr. Dodge was born in Olney, Suffolk county, Me., October 4, 1831, a son of Moses and Mary (Leman) Dodge, who had besides, two older and six younger children, four of whom are living. The family was established in America during early colonial times by an ambitious Scotch ancestor, who presumably settled in Massachusetts. Moses Dodge, Sr., died when his son was five years old, having never moved from his native state. He was survived by his wife until her ninety-seventh year.

Owing to the death of his father, and the large family dependent upon the care of his mother, Moses Dodge, Jr., at the age of six years, went to live with a relative in Edgecomb, Lincoln county, Me., and was there reared and educated until his twenty-first year. He then went to Bath, Me., and learned the ship carpenter's trade, two years later removing from there, but for ten years continuing to work at his trade. April 26, 1861, he arrived in San Francisco, after a journey by way of the Isthmus of Panama, thereafter working at his trade for three and a half years, a part of the time at Mare Island. In 1865 he returned to his home in Maine and engaged in farming near Newcastle, and in 1866 married Esther Glidden, now deceased, who became the mother of one son, Walter W., who is married and has one child, Roland, and is a resident of Fresno. In 1884 Mr. Dodge returned to the west and bought his present ranch and in 1894 was again married, in Fresno, to Laura E. Hoffman, a native of Ohio. Since his return to California he has made many friends among his progressive and hospitable neighbors. During his long and active life he has derived pleasure from association with the Masons for many years, and now holds a demit from the Massachusetts lodge. He is a Republican in politics, and in religion is identified with the First Baptist Church of Fresno.

JACOB IPSSEN. The success which Mr. Ipsen has achieved has been entirely the result of his own efforts, for he came to Merced county a stranger in a strange land, with no knowledge of either language or customs, and with only his own energy and ambition upon which to build his hopes for a future. He now owns a ranch of four hundred and eighty acres adjoining the town of Le Grand, Merced county, while the Santa Fe Railroad passes through a part of his property, which is given over entirely to the cultivation of wheat and barley, the average yield being seven sacks per acre.

A native of Denmark, Mr. Ipsen was born February 19, 1856, on Bornholm Island, which is sixteen by twenty miles in extent. He is a son of Peter and Margarita (Funk) Ipsen, farmers of Denmark, who never left their native country. Jacob Ipsen received his education in the public schools of Denmark and was reared to young manhood on the paternal farm. He remained at home until attaining the age of twenty-six years, when, in 1882, he came to California by way of New York City, and after reaching the west located in Merced county, where he worked on the ranch which he now owns for a period of three years. He then rented land and raised grain until 1900, renting from two to four thousand acres of land and devoting the same principally to wheat. In the meantime he purchased his ranch and now gives his entire time to its cultivation and improvement.

In California Mr. Ipsen married Anna Hansen, also a native of Denmark, and they have one son, Arthur, now eight years old. Mr. Ipsen is a Republican in his political convictions, and fraternally affiliates with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows; he also belongs to the Encampment. He is a self-made man and has acquired a competency since coming to California, as well as winning for himself the esteem and confidence of his fellow-citizens.

HOWARD C. KEELEY, who has served Stanislaus county as county recorder and auditor, has made his influence felt in both political and business circles of the community and has made for himself a position of prominence among its representative citizens. He was born at Chillicothe, Mo., December 3, 1867, being the sixth child and the youngest son in a family of five sons and four daughters born to his parents, Conrad and Louisa (Miller) Keeley, the former born in Pennsylvania, near Philadelphia, and the latter born in that city December 29, 1832. The father was a carpenter and builder by occupation, and foreseeing greater opportunities in the middle west he removed from his native state to Illinois, afterward locating in Iowa, from which state he removed to Chillicothe, Mo. In the last named place he followed his trade as well as being employed as a farmer. In 1869 he emigrated to California and located at Sonora, where he was likewise employed, fifteen years later seeking a home near Oakdale, Stanislaus county. After four years of the same kind of employment he removed to the neighborhood of Modesto, same county, engaging in farming seven miles north of the city until his death, which occurred January 20, 1900, at the age of seventy-one years seven months and twenty days. In politics the elder Mr. Keeley was a staunch Republican, and at the time of his country's need he enlisted in Company G, of the Missouri Regulars and served from 1861 for a period of three years. His wife survives him, now living upon the home place seven miles north of Modesto, at the age of seventy-one years.

After receiving his preliminary education in the common schools of California, Howard C. Keeley entered the commercial college of Stockton, from which he was graduated in 1898. His first employment afterward was as manager of the Grange Company Warehouse at Montpellier, Stanislaus county, in which connection he remained until 1896. He then entered upon a general merchandise business in that place, in his intercourse with the public winning many friends who recognized his evident ability in public capacity. A Republican in politics, and for five years a member of the Republican county central committee, he was nominated and elected by that party to the office of county recorder and auditor in 1902, acceptably discharging the duties of the same. In Ripon, this state, he was united in marriage with Lillie Ida Melton, of Iowa, whose father Jesse, also a native of Iowa, came to California in the '60s and located in Stanislaus county, where he engaged in farming. His death occurred at Ripon when about seventy-five years old. To Mr. and Mrs. Keeley have been born three children, all of whom are at home with their parents: Jesse C., Clarence and Walter. Fraternaly Mr. Keeley is a member of the Woodmen of the World.

FRANCIS E. MCKEE. A well-known business man of Le Grand, Merced county, is Francis E. McKee, a dealer in general merchandise in this place with W. C. Kroh. He was born in Grant county, Wis., June 12, 1871, a son of Eli McKee, a native of New England. The elder Mr. McKee located in Wisconsin in an early day and engaged in agricultural pursuits until 1872, when he came to California. He settled in Ripon, San Joaquin county, and there became a successful rancher, remaining in that location until his death at the age of sixty-five years. His wife, who survives him and still makes her home in Ripon, was formerly Elizabeth Dickinson, a native of Wisconsin, and the daughter of Putman Dickinson.

Mr. McKee has practically known no other home than that of his adopted state, being reared and educated in San Joaquin county and remaining in the paternal home until manhood. He remained in that county until 1899, the last five years of his residence being engaged in a mercantile enterprise in Lathrop, with B. F. Eastman. In 1899 he came to Le Grand, in September of that year opening a branch store in partnership with Mr. Eastman, which continued about one year, at which time he purchased Mr. Eastman's interest and conducted the business alone until January, 1903, when W. C. Kroh purchased an interest in the business. They have since developed the business and continued to add to an already extensive patronage, now carrying a stock valued at $13,000, in the disposal of which the services of four men are required. They are men of undoubted business ability both to plan and execute, of integrity and honor, and hold a high place in commercial and social circles.

Mr. McKee married Laura Williams, a native Californian, and the daughter of Mark Williams, a pioneer of the state. They have one child, Neva, who was born in San Joaquin county. In his political convictions Mr. McKee is a Republican and as a popular man of his party was chosen to the office of deputy assessor of Merced county. Fraternaly he affiliates with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and the Fraternal Aid Society.

CHARLES M. WELCH, an honored agriculturist and stock-raiser owning two hundred and ninety-seven acres of land devoted to diversified farming, has worked his way from a small beginning, and is entitled to the credit due all deserving and persevering men. Mr. Welch is a native of California, being born near Waterford, Stanislaus county, October 25, 1868, a son of Charles E. and Sarah E. (Ramsey) Welch, California pioneers of 1852, the former a native of Maine, and the latter of Missouri.

Philip Welch, the grandfather of Charles M., also was born in Maine, and was a man of pronounced courage and ambition, as were all of the California pioneers of 1849. Leaving a well-tilled and paying farm, he embarked on a steamer to the Isthmus of Panama, crossing which he re-embarked for San Francisco, finally locating in Tuolumne county, where he achieved fair success as a miner. Charles E., his son, in 1852 gathered together his belongings and joined his father on the coast, journeying hither by the same route, and riding across the Isthmus on a mule. He also succeeded as a miner, and eventually settled near Waterford, Stanislaus county, where he owned a thousand acres of land, and rented the Hartley ranch of three thousand acres, for three years. He was married in Stanislaus county to Sarah E. Ramsey. He operated on a large scale in both stock and grain raising, leaving a competency to his family at the time of his death in San Francisco, at the age of fifty-seven.

Educated in the public schools of Stanislaus county, and at the Stockton Business College, Charles M. Welch grew into a knowledge of general farming, of which his father had made a success. He assisted with the work of the home and Hartley ranches for three years. In 1900 he went to Kings county and farmed a couple of years, and during that time purchased his present ranch of two hundred and ninety-seven acres, one hundred of which consists of rich bottomland, and upon which he located in 1903. Already his ranch shows the effort which he is expending upon it, and while he has the advantage of the work of former owners, his methods are more progressive, scientific, and practical, having behind them a younger brain and more vigorous physique. In 1898 Mr. Welch married Anna Feldhaus, daughter of John Feldhaus, and born in Merced county. Two children have been born into their home, Arlita and Lorina. Mr. Welch has never aspired to political office, although he is an active Democrat, having the greatest confidence in the tenets of his chosen party. He is gifted with an agreeable and jovial nature, a keen sympathy for those less fortunate than himself and a generous heart for the deserving and temporarily embarrassed. Mr. Welch is one of the popular and successful men of the vicinity of Snelling.

GEORGE LAUGHEAD. Until the early part of the year 1904 the roll call of the courageous men who came to California in 1849 included the name of George Laughead, to whose remote home in bleak Nova Scotia penetrated the glad news of discovered gold, and whose ambitious nature responded to so rare an opportunity of acquiring a fortune. Working in his little shop in the English dependency yielded him a fair income, for he was a good blacksmith, doing thoroughly and well whatever task came his way to perform, yet at best there was little promise for the future, more especially of the large kind held out by the practically unknown west. He was a single man when he crossed the Isthmus of Panama and sailed up the coast to San Francisco, having no one to care for but himself, and no hindrance in his way save that of absence of money and influence.

After an unsuccessful mining experience Mr. Laughead more fully appreciated the advantages of his trade, and, locating in Stockton, applied it with fair results. First and foremost he was a lover of the soil, and his shop became restricted and unsatisfying as he saw around him the chances of land ownership and development. Coming to the San Joaquin valley, he farmed on the west side of Stanislaus county, finally acquiring large tracts of land, which he set out in wheat, becoming one of the largest grain raisers of his section. He thought nothing of having a thousand acres under wheat, and at present his family own his farm of six hundred and forty acres near Westley, another one-hundred-acre tract in the same locality, and a mountain ranch of over eighteen hundred acres. After years of successful tilling of the soil, acquired solely through his own efforts, and maintained in order by his excellent management and enterprise, he was counted one of the progressive agriculturists of Stanislaus county. His death was not unexpected, but was nevertheless deeply regretted by appreciators of true and capable manhood, and he was followed to his last resting place by many who had known him in the early days, as well as by those who had shared his later years of prosperity. He was respected by all who knew him, and was held up as representative of a class of men who stand alone in the history of the county, both as to the courage required of them, and the nature of the work they accomplished. In San Francisco, October 1, 1897, Mr. Laughead was united in marriage with Mrs. Isabell Langille, who is the mother of two children, Samuel and Howard Langille, who reside with their mother. Mr. Laughead was a Republican in politics, and fraternally was connected with Modesto Chapter No. 49, R. A. M. Mrs. Laughead, who is a native of Nova Scotia, is a consistent member of the Presbyterian Church at Grayson.

ROBERT W. FIX. A prominent citizen of Merced county is Robert W. Fix, a successful ranchman located on two hundred and forty acres about one mile from Plainsberg, and engaged in the raising of grain, for which purpose he also rents six hundred and forty acres. He has been located in the San Joaquin valley since 1876 and has met with a success which has numbered him among the representative men of the county. Born in Bartholomew county, Ind., February 3, 1840, he is a son of William Fix.

William Fix was a native of Wheeling, W. Va., and of German ancestry. In manhood he married Margaret Monroe, a native of Kentucky and of Scotch ancestry. He went to Indiana when a young man and engaged in farming pursuits, where he remained until about 1851, when he located in Davis county, Iowa. Seven years were passed in that location when they removed to Macon county, Mo., where he farmed for seventeen years. His last move was to the state of Texas, where he died at the age of eighty-six years. His wife died in 1903, also eighty-six years old.

Robert W. Fix was reared in the states of Iowa and Missouri and received his education through the medium of the public schools. In Missouri he married Frances Vickers, a native of Kentucky, and in 1872 they removed to Texas, where he farmed for four years. On account of his wife's health he sold his farm in Texas and came to California, and in Merced county he worked as a ranch hand for seven years. He then rented a section of land and raised grain for a number of years. In 1897 he purchased his present ranch of two hundred and forty acres and has since made this property his home, giving his most earnest efforts toward its improvement and development. Of the seven children born to himself and wife three are now living, namely: Effie, wife of Robert Burchell; Cecil, wife of E. T. Russell of Lodi, this state; and Ora. Mr. Fix is a Republican politically, and in the interests of his party has served as school trustee. He is a prominent member of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

DANIEL H. GRUBB. Grain and stock are the two commodities upon which Daniel H. Grubb depends for a livelihood, preference being given to the former, of which he has several hundred acres. Mr. Grubb is one of the successful grain raisers of the vicinity of Snelling, where he purchased five hundred acres in 1883, and where he also rents twelve hundred acres of grain land. He is an energetic, well informed, and popular farmer, aiming at the best along agricultural lines. He was born near Madisonville, Monroe county, Tenn., September 12, 1837, a son of Darius and Sarah (Haskell) Grubb, natives of Virginia.

Darius Grubb was reared on a Virginia plantation, and as a young man went to Tennessee, where he farmed near Madisonville, and where he lived to be fifty-five years old. Daniel H. was eight years old when his father died, and he continued to live at home until after his marriage to Sarah E. Carson, a native of Tennessee. She was born in Madisonville, Monroe county, October 30, 1840, and marrying at the age of twenty-one years, remained in Tennessee until her husband removed to California. Mr. Grubb left his farm to enlist in the Confederate army in Company G, Sixty-third Tennessee Volunteer Infantry, under Captain Grubb. His company surrendered at the battle of Vicksburg, July 4, 1863, and he soon afterward returned to his home in Tennessee. The conditions in the south after the war influenced him to seek a more promising location, and early in 1869 he came to California, having sailed from New York December 28, 1868, arriving in San Francisco on the ship Golden City, after twenty days on the water. He first went to Stockton, of which he had heard much, but not realizing his expectations of securing work removed to Oakdale. Later he farmed in Stanislaus county for two years. Not content with his location he went to Fresno, but soon returned to Stanislaus county, and farmed until 1883.

Mr. Grubb was a prudent as well as good worker, and in 1883 it was possible for him to realize his ambition of owning a farm of his own, which is located a mile and a half from Snelling. Mr. Grubb is a Democrat in politics. His farm has kept him far too busy to permit of office seeking, being averse to public life of any kind. He is a staunch friend of education, and has been glad to give his children better opportunities than he himself had in his youth. In the order of their birth the children are: Elizabeth D., the wife of J. L. Allen; Charles F., George, James, Daniel H., Jr., and William.

Mrs. Grubb died September 6, 1902, at her home near Snelling. Her life had been devoted to her home, her husband, and her children, all of whom were at her bedside when she passed away. She had been in poor health for nearly three years, but was a brave and patient sufferer. Hers was a beautiful life, given to many kindnesses and acts of charity. Her passing was not only a loss to her family but to the community at large.

Mr. Grubb enjoys the confidence of the community in which he lives and is regarded as one of its best informed, most public-spirited and influential farmers.

ADOLPH BERTRANDIAS, a liquor merchant of Snelling, was born in San Francisco September 25, 1852, and is a son of Alphonse and Frances (Bedadet) Bertrandias, natives of France, the former born February 25, 1823. Alphonse Bertrandias was a carriage-maker and a carpenter during early life. In 1847 he landed at Valparaiso, Chili, South America, and arrived in San Francisco in January, 1850. Until 1853 he mined in Calaveras and Mariposa counties, after that followed his trade of carpenter, and in connection therewith managed a bathing resort in Mariposa county until 1861. At Hornitos he engaged in the lumber business from 1861 until 1869, then went to San Francisco, and from there to Merced in 1872, purchasing some town lots which he improved and made his residence in that city until 1874, when he again returned to San Francisco, where he has since lived a retired life. He was fairly successful in the various lines of business in which he engaged, was always respected by his associates and the public at large, and accumulated a fair competence. Besides Adolph, his oldest son, he has a son Emile, who was born in 1857, and is now a resident of Oakland.

After completing his education in the public schools of Mariposa county, Adolph Bertrandias started to learn the trade of harness making in 1868, following this trade in San Francisco, and later in Snelling, until taking up his present business. He established a home of his own in 1884, his marriage with Rebecca McSwain taking place on January 16. Mrs. Bertrandias was born in Missouri, March 10, 1860, a daughter of Neil and Mary E. (Miller) McSwain; the latter a native of Kentucky, makes her home with her daughter, Mrs. Bertrandias, and is past eighty-one years of age. Mr. and Mrs. Bertrandias have had five children; Neil A. and Adlai, a son and daughter, survive; two sons and one daughter died in childhood. Mr. Bertrandias is a Democrat in politics, and is a member of the Knights of Pythias. He is a descendant of a family substantially connected with the pioneer days of the state, and he himself is recognized as a straightforward, intelligent member of the community, having many pleasing and admirable traits of character.

JAMES G. MACKEY. Among the agriculturists who gave the best years of their life to the development of Kings county, who lent their good name and noble aims to the foundation of its prestige, and who then passed on to the bourne from which no traveler ever returns, must be mentioned James G. Mackey, to whom his community owes much, because of his perseverance and fine traits which characterized his sojourn in the west. During the years of his greatest activity, Mr. Mackey was one of the leading grain and stock raisers in the vicinity of Hanford, and his farm of six hundred and forty acres, now occupied by his widow and five children, bears every evidence of his orderly and systematic habits, his thrift and progressive spirit. He did not become a land owner through any chance of inheritance, but worked long and faithfully for the right to leave those dependent on him secure from want and in the possession of one of the most beautiful and well-equipped rural homes in Kings county.

The life of Mr. Mackey began on a farm in Rockbridge county, Va., where his birth occurred September 1, 1854. He developed early aspirations as an educator, and, after graduating from the high school of a near-by town, taught school for a few terms and also acquired business experience as a clerk in a general store. In 1876 he found his way clear to come to California. Soon afterward he obtained employment on a ranch in what is now Kings county, and after two or three years rented a farm upon which he started to raise grain on a small scale. So successful was he in this department of activity that he rented more and larger tracts, in time having several hundred acres of rented land under grain. The problem of threshing his own products suggested the purchase of a threshing-machine, to which he later added a header, and operated the same throughout the country for several years. In time he bought eighty acres in Fresno county, and later eighty acres of the present home, adding from time to time until a section had been acquired. He also invested in one hundred and sixty acres in Tulare county. During his last years he devoted his land to stock and general ranching, instituted about all the improvements known to the agricultural world, and built the beautiful home, which illustrated his appreciation of the comforts and luxuries of life.

February 9, 1882, Mr. Mackey married Callavan Woodcock, who came to California with her parents in 1875, from Arkansas, her native state. Five children were born of the union, of whom Minnie C. married Robert Cavanaugh, and is established in a home of her own, while Jasper G., John W., Arthur A. and Annie Maude are living at home. Mr. Mackey was a substantial and painstaking man, and sociable in his nature, being devoted to his friends and hospitable in his home. For many years he was active in politics, and not only served as county supervisor for four years, but was a trustee of both the county and town schools of Hanford. Fraternally he was connected with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. The estate of this honored pioneer is valued at $30,000, all accumulated through his own labor and without the sacrifice of principle or the good will of any of his associates. He was popular and highly esteemed, and one of the county's most deserving and successful settlers. He died at his home five miles northeast of Hanford, June 10, 1902.

WILLIAM YOUND. One of the extensive grain raisers in Merced county is William Yound, who, in partnership with his brother, George, owns a section of land fourteen miles north of Merced, and four miles from Snelling. They also lease eighteen hundred acres, both properties being under grain, in the raising of which they have achieved marked success. Mr. Yound is an American from every standpoint save that of birth, for he was just five weeks old when his parents, James and Elizabeth (Prescott) Yound, crossed the seas in a sailing vessel, hoping for larger opportunities in America.

James Yound was a brick mason by trade, a calling which he followed for many years in Manchester, England, where his son William was born December 25, 1848. He came direct to New Orleans from the English port, finally locating in St. Louis, where he was known as the leading contractor for ten years. In 1859 he crossed the plains with his family in an ox-train of forty wagons, on the way experiencing many strange happenings, and often encountering the Indians who seemed kindly disposed. Inclement weather, illness, and swollen streams retarded their progress, so that over a year had elapsed ere they arrived in California. For some years the family lived in Eldorado county, where the father engaged in mining, after which he went to Stockton and followed his trade until 1869. He then moved to Merced county and assisted in the construction of many of the first buildings in the town of Merced, working at his trade until shortly before his death at the age of sixty-three years. During the last years of his life he owned a ranch ten miles south of Merced, where he had a dairy, and also raised grain and stock. In politics he was a Republican.

William Youd owes his early education to the public schools of Eldorado and Amador counties, and his agricultural knowledge to his father's teachings and his own observation and experience. He was ambitious as a boy, and still more so as a man, and in 1863 went into partnership with his brother, George, renting four sections of grain land. Since then the brothers have purchased six hundred and forty acres, and continue to rent eighteen hundred acres, all devoted to grain. Mr. Youd married Laura Thompson, a native of Mississippi, and daughter of James Thompson, who came to the coast in 1881. They are parents of three children, namely: Bert, twenty-two years old; Charles, eighteen; and William T., twelve. Mr. Youd is one of the influential and progressive men of his neighborhood, and ranks among the successful and extensive grain-growers of Merced county.

GEORGE A. KAHL. A prosperous rancher. George A. Kahl is located near Plainsberg, Merced county, engaged in the cultivation of an extensive property, having three hundred and twenty acres in his own ranch, and, with his brother, Ernest D. Kahl, is conducting the interests of the old homestead, which consists of thirteen hundred and eighty acres. Their interests are largely given over to the raising of wheat, barley and cattle, as well as other stock, the sale of hogs alone in 1903 amounting to $1,000. Mr. Kahl is a progressive and enterprising farmer and by his business-like methods and thorough system has met with a success which places him among the representative men of the community.

With the exception of five years and five months, every year of Mr. Kahl's life has been spent in Merced county, where he was born September 26, 1866. He is a son of Adam Kahl, whose biographical sketch appears on another page of this volume. At the age of sixteen he had finished the public school course and then entered the Stockton Business College, passing five years preparing himself by a commercial education for a successful prosecution of whatever line of work he might choose to take up. Afterward he spent five months in San Luis Obispo county. Returning to Merced county, he has since made this his home, engaging in the cultivation of his extensive ranch. He is a prominent man in his community and has been called upon to serve in public capacity, for ten years, from 1891 to 1901, discharging the duties of justice of the peace. He married Mabel B. Gardner, a native of Tennessee and a daughter of William Gardner. Of this union were born five children, namely: Georgia W., Helena W., Guy and Mabel L., and Evelina M., the second child, is deceased. Politically Mr. Kahl is independent, reserving the right to cast his ballot for the man whom he considers best adapted for official capacity. Fraternally he was a member of the Merced Parlor No. 24, N. S. G. W., for ten years; is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and Ancient Order of United Workmen.

THOMAS IDLE. The life which this narrative sketches began in Lincolnshire, England, January 26, 1854, where Thomas Idle was born, son of Thomas Idle, Sr., a native of the same locality, and his wife, who was formerly Elizabeth Carnal. His father being a farmer Thomas Idle, Jr., was reared to the practical duties incident to an agricultural life, remaining at home until attaining the age of twenty years. He then, in 1874, immigrated to the western world, seeking the greater opportunities of America. Coming direct to California he located on the Sacramento river where he found employment in the work to which he had early been trained, continuing in this occupation for ten years. In 1877 he returned to England on a visit and on coming back to California he located in Davisville, Yolo county, where he remained for some time. In 1886 he came to Fresno county, purchasing a property of twenty acres, located two and a half miles southeast of the city of Fresno. Since that time he has doubled the number of acres, has made many improvements, and has brought his property under a fine state of cultivation. He now devotes thirty-two acres to the cultivation of raisin grapes, while he has seven acres of fruit trees, among which are one hundred and ten fig trees. Mr. Idle was an active member of the Raisin Growers' Association during its existence. Politically he is an adherent of the principles advocated in the platform of the Democratic party.

WILLIAM M. LITTLE, JR., is one of the popular and successful farmers of the vicinity of Snelling, Merced county. The farm of one hundred and sixty acres, which yields abundant harvests of wheat, alfalfa and general produce, has been in the possession of his family since the fall of 1862, having been bought by his father, William M. Little, Sr., a few months after completing the journey across the plains from Randolph county, Mo. The father was born in Virginia, and when young removed with his parents to Randolph county, Mo., where he married Mary J. Thomas, a native of Kentucky, and at present an occupant of the home ranch on the Merced river. Mr. Little was a man of strong personality, and, having learned the carpenter trade as a boy, determined to come to the west, where he supposed larger fields awaited him. He was not long in locating on the Merced river farm, which he improved and worked with his sons, and where he died in 1888, at the age of fifty-seven years. He took a keen interest in the political and other situations in which he found himself, and while in no sense an office seeker, became prominent in the deliberations of the Democratic party in Merced county. At one time he was defeated for the office of county treasurer by a small majority, and he served acceptably on the school board of his district for several terms.

William M. Little, Jr., was born October 15, 1862, near Hopetown, Merced county, on what is now the Barefield ranch, and has devoted all of his life to farming. He has been manager of the home place for several years, living there with his mother, and realizing a liberal yearly income from the rich bottom-land along the river. In 1890 he married Eva Means, a native of Merced county, who was born in March, 1872. Her father, William L. Means, came to California in 1850, having previously served in the Mexican war, enlisting from his native state of Alabama. Mr. and Mrs. Little have four children, Leslie, Flossie, Clarence and Howard. Like his father, Mr. Little is a supporter of the Democratic party, and fraternally is identified with Snelling Lodge No. 121, I. O. O. F. He is an agreeable, approachable man, broad-minded and public spirited, and wielding a progressive influence in his neighborhood.

FRANK W. HICKOX. Prominent among the active and prosperous business men of Bakersfield is Frank W. Hickox, one of the leading contractors and builders of the place. A skilled mechanic, possessing inventive genius and artistic ability, he is well qualified by his native talents as well as by his knowledge and experience for his present occupation. In the fulfillment of his various contracts he is careful, painstaking and honest, and his work invariably stands the test of time. A son of the late George Hickox, he was born July 13, 1859, in Rockford, Ill.

Born and reared in Michigan, George Hickox remained in his native state until early manhood, when he settled as a farmer in Winnebago county, Ill. In 1858, on account of ill health, he came to the Pacific coast, and for a year was employed in mining on the Klamath river. Returning to Illinois, he remained there until 1861, when he removed to Central City, Colo. There he engaged in placer mining, being half owner of the Franklin mine. He also bought a mountain ranch, from which he carried on a profitable business by supplying the miners of that locality with vegetables. Embarking in a new venture, he assisted in putting up smelting works, but on account of the ignorance of the manager of the smelter the enterprise proved a failure. Selling his interest in the mine for $60,000 he put a large part of the sum into the smelting works, but was again unsuccessful. He subsequently devoted his time to the care of his ranch, living on it until his death, in 1875, at the age of fifty-three years. He was a staunch Republican, and a typical representative of the self-made men of his day, winning success through his own unaided efforts, his father, who was a farmer, and a Methodist minister, being unable to give him much financial help. He married Eliza Hemminway, who was born in Vermont, where her father, Dr. Joseph Hemminway, was a practicing physician. She died at the age of fifty years, in Colorado.

Accompanying his parents on the long trip by stage across the plains to Colorado, Frank W. Hickox spent his boyhood days on the home ranch. Until twelve years old he attended the little country school near his home, but afterward, for three terms, followed the trail on foot across the mountains to Central City, to continue his studies at the public school of that place. The family then lived for two years on a ranch in the valley, and he attended the schools in Golden City, after which all returned to the mountain ranch. At the age of eighteen years Mr. Hickox began learning the trade of miller, serving an apprenticeship of three years in Golden City. He subsequently spent two years learning the carpenter's trade, after which he worked as a journeyman in New Mexico, and then in different places in Colorado, including Pueblo, Silverton and Colorado Springs. In 1879, during the great booming excitement in Leadville, he helped build many of the houses then erected. Coming to California in 1886, Mr. Hickox started in business as a contractor and builder, and has since filled many contracts of importance, putting up, among other buildings of note in Bakersfield, the high, grammar and H street school buildings; the Grand hotel; the J. J. Mack, the L. P. St. Clair, and the Dinkelspiel brothers' residences; the Producers' Bank building; and many other large business blocks and residences, including his own handsome residence, on the corner of Sixteenth and F streets. He also erected two business blocks in Tehachapi, and the Kern hotel at Kern City. Since taking up his residence in Bakersfield Mr. Hickox has been very successful in a financial as well as in an industrial way, and has accumulated a good property. He owns an interest in oil lands and stock in the Sunset district, and is proprietor of a well-paying brick yard in Kern City. In 1895 he erected the brick high school building in Fresno, costing about $50,000, and is now supervising the erection of the new Methodist Episcopal Church building in Bakersfield, which will cost about $22,000.

In Durango, Colo., in 1882, Mr. Hickox married Orilla Hart, a native of Missouri, and they have two children, namely: Maude E., now preparing to enter the Leland Stanford, Jr. University, at a school in Palo Alto; and Ada F., living at home. Politically Mr. Hickox is an adherent of the Republican party, and for a short time served as city trustee from the fourth precinct of Bakersfield.

JOSEPH S. MITCHELL. An enterprising young ranchman of Merced county, located in the neighborhood of Le Grand, is Joseph S. Mitchell, who was born in Nebraska February 1, 1865, a son of J. S. Mitchell, Sr. The latter was a native of Kentucky, who removed to Missouri in young manhood and there served in the Confederate army under General Price. After the close of the war he engaged in the work to which he was trained in his younger days, becoming a successful farmer in the state of his adoption. Feeling, however, that opportunities for advancement lay in the remote west, he came to California in October, 1874, bringing his family and locating in the neighborhood of Snelling. He there engaged in the dairy business, remaining in this county until his death. He married, in Springfield, Ky., Juliet Montgomery, who was a sister of the late J. A. Montgomery of Snelling, Merced county. Their children were named, in order of birth, as follows: Mary, James, Anna, Robert, Joseph S., William and Ella.

From his native state of Nebraska Joseph S. Mitchell accompanied his parents to California when nine years old, and was reared near Snelling, where he attended school in pursuit of an education. At the age of twenty years he became dependent upon his own resources, renting as a first venture along agricultural lines one hundred and eighty acres of land, where he farmed for about eleven years. With his accumulated savings he purchased, in 1896, his present ranch, which consists of one hundred and twenty acres, since which time he has given his best efforts toward its development and proper cultivation. In conjunction with his cultivation of this land he also rents eight hundred acres, which is given over entirely to grain. Mr. Mitchell's home is presided over by his wife, who was formerly Jennie Turner, a native of this county and the daughter of J. T. Turner. They are the parents of five children, namely: Merle, Joe, James, Hugh and Isabel. In his political convictions Mr. Mitchell is a staunch Democrat and has been a member of the Democratic central committee for the past four years.

FRANK NISSEN RASMUSSEN. Prominent among the native-born citizens of California who have spent their lives within the state, in every possible way aiding its development, whether relating to its agricultural, manufacturing or financial interests, is Frank Nissen Rasmussen, a well-known farmer and dairyman, living about a mile east of Crows Landing. Of Danish stock on the paternal side, he was born May 24, 1876, in Ferndale, Humboldt county, a son of Jacob Rasmussen.

Born, reared and educated in Denmark, Jacob Rasmussen immigrated to the United States in 1871, and the following two years was a resident of Iowa. Coming to the Pacific coast in 1873, he lived for a time in Marin county, and then settled in Humboldt county, where he cleared and improved a large ranch, and built up an extensive business as a dairyman, establishing the first dairy in the Eel River valley. By energetic industry and good management, he acquired a competency, and is now living at Ferndale, retired from active pursuits. He married Christina Nissen, who was born in Schleswig-Holstein, Germany, and they became the parents of two sons and two daughters, of whom Frank Nissen, the special subject of this sketch, is the oldest child.

After completing his studies in the public schools of Ferndale, Frank N. Rasmussen entered St. Mary's College, in Oakland, where he was graduated in 1895. Returning then to Ferndale, he secured a position as clerk and book-keeper, and there proved himself capable and competent. In 1898 he took charge of the Crown Creamery, in Ferndale, a large private creamery, which was supplied with milk from farms that aggregated several hundreds of acres of land, and managed it most satisfactorily to all concerned for four years. Coming to Stanislaus county in 1903, Mr. Rasmussen located at Crows Landing, buying his present ranch of two hundred and forty acres, all of which is irrigated by the canal, and has since made a specialty of raising alfalfa, for which his land is well adapted.

Politically Mr. Rasmussen is a loyal supporter of the principles of the Republican party. Fraternally he is a member of Ferndale Lodge, F. & A. M.; Ferndale Chapter, R. A. M.; Eureka Commandery, K. T.; the Shrine of Islam, and the Eastern Star. A man of genuine worth, he is highly esteemed by all.

HANS PETERSEN. During the sixteen years of his life in Stanislaus county Hans Petersen was known as an industrious and capable dairyman and farmer, and as a man who earnestly strove to maintain the good name of Denmark on the western coast. He developed a sincere and practical appreciation of the new country to which he came in his vigorous manhood, and set about applying his native adaptability to its improvement. While successful as a tiller of the soil and thoroughly at home in the peaceful occupation to which his life was devoted, he was not born to the occupation, for his father, Peter Petersen, was a musician, who liked better to evoke sweet sounds from his instrument than to toil under the burning sun in a harvest field from sunrise to sundown.

Born in Jutland, the mainland of Denmark, his youth must have witnessed the strife engendered between his own and the southern country of Germany, and its subsequent government by the latter power. Nevertheless, he acquired a practical common school education, and possibly the poverty of the majority of his countrymen illy accorded with the surging ambitions which visited his own heart and brain. At any rate, he immigrated across the sea to America in 1872, and in the vicinity of Oakland engaged in farming until 1877. Various causes conspired to influence his return to Denmark at this time, one of which was Anna Jepsen, daughter of Peter and Cecil Maria (Jorgensen) Jepsen, farmers living in the vicinity of his own home. His marriage to his well remembered schoolmate followed shortly upon his arrival in Jutland, the ceremony taking place in the town of Varde. Afterward Mr. Petersen settled on a farm and remained there until 1882. Mrs. Petersen was educated in the public schools and in early youth evidenced the good judgment and business ability which has marked her management of her husband's estate. Her father died in Denmark in 1887, and her mother lived until 1902.

The memory of the clear skies and wonderful climate of California abided with Mr. Petersen continually, and doubtless with this balmy land his own northern home compared unfavorably. After selling his farm and bidding adieu to the friends of his youth and manhood, he again set sail for the United States, bringing his wife with him and purchasing a small place in Oakdale of about fifteen acres. Later he bought the fifteen-acre tract now owned and occupied by his wife, and in time bought other property, both improved and unimproved, in the town. A little later he bought four hundred and eighty acres ten miles southeast of Oakdale on Dry creek, and for the balance of his life engaged in dairying there with gratifying success. It was while out at this farm that he contracted blood-poisoning in 1898, and died two weeks later, on May 26. Since then his wife has superintended the large farm, but instead of dairying has utilized it for stock raising, as a less arduous and exacting occupation. Mr. Petersen was a staunch Republican, and in religion was a Lutheran. He was a busy and energetic man, practical and substantial, and prone to look on the bright side of life in general. He possessed the requisites for popularity among his fellow-men, and was invariably looked up to as an honest and fearless man of affairs.

Mr. and Mrs. Petersen were the parents of two children, Peter Marion and Albert. The latter was drowned June 18, 1888, at the age of four years, five months and fifteen days.

DAVID WILLIAM MORRIS. The present postmaster of Modesto is a man who well deserves the esteem and confidence which is given him by his fellow-townsmen. Though not a native of California nor yet of the country wherein he has made his home for so many years he has still given his best efforts toward the promotion of the welfare of city, county and state, as well as having enlisted in the cause of the country in time of war, having served as captain in the Spanish-American war. A native of Cardiganshire, Wales, he was born April 21, 1860, a son of Morris and Mary (Lloyd) Morris, both likewise natives of the same locality. The father was a farmer by occupation and still makes his home in Wales, being now seventy-two years old, while his wife died there aged seventy years.

Reared to manhood in his native land, Mr. Morris received his education in the common schools, upon the completion of the course securing employment with a grocer, a business which he afterward took up for himself. This work occupied his attention until 1882, but foreseeing greater opportunities on the American continent he immigrated in that year, and landing in New York City remained for a short time in that locality. His next move brought him to the Pacific coast, from San Francisco journeying at once to Modesto, Stanislaus county, where he has since made his home. Upon his locating here, he first engaged in running a restaurant, with which interest he remained connected until 1887, combining then a news agency with the printing business. For twelve years he worked on the News. At the breaking out of the Spanish-

American war he was made captain of Company D, Sixth California Regiment of Infantry, National Guards, being mustered into the United States service May 10, 1868. Until December 15 of the same year this regiment performed guard duty at Fort Point, and was then mustered out of service. Returning then to Modesto Mr. Morris once more resumed his business relations, handling in his news agency the San Francisco papers, cigars, stationery, etc. April 24, 1902, he received the appointment to the office of postmaster of Modesto, a third-class office, and he has since acceptably discharged the duties of the same.

Mr. Morris was married in San Francisco to Mrs. Lottie Leet, a native of New Brunswick, having come to California with her parents. Her father, Joseph Ridgeway, a native of England, was a manufacturer and came to California, his death occurring in San Francisco. To Mr. and Mrs. Morris have been born two children, both of whom are at home with their parents, namely: Florence and Irma. Fraternally Mr. Morris is a member of Lodge No. 118, B. P. O. E., of Stockton, and Knights of Pythias of Modesto. Politically he is an adherent of the principles advocated in the platform of the Republican party. He now ranks as major of the Sixth California Regiment, National Guards, and is much esteemed and liked by all his associates and fellow-citizens.

THOMAS KEARNEY. The first immigrant of this family was Samuel Kearney, who came to the United States in 1855. He was born in Ireland in 1816 and reared to manhood upon a farm; then learned the trade of shoemaker, which he followed in Massachusetts, where he located upon crossing the ocean. He remained in the Bay state considerably less than a year, for in 1855 he came to California by way of the Isthmus of Panama, and after landing in San Francisco went at once to the mines of Tuolumne county. He continued the occupation of miner for nine years, when, in 1864, he went to San Joaquin county and secured employment on a ranch, returning to the avocation to which he had been early trained on the Emerald Isle. Until 1868 he worked for other people, when he rented land and for two years engaged in the cultivation of grain. Coming to Stanislaus county in 1870 he rented land for a like period, and then he purchased the present Kearney home, where he lived until his death in 1900 at the age of eighty-four years. His wife, formerly Sarah Vine, also a native of Ireland, still survives him and makes her home on the family ranch at the age of seventy years. The children born to them are as follows: Michael, of Oakdale; Edward, of San Francisco; Mary E., who became the wife of Larry Smith; and Thomas, the personal subject of this review, whose birth occurred in Tuolumne county, October 9, 1860.

After the death of his father Thomas Kearney assumed charge of the home ranch, which consists of four hundred and eighty acres, located four and a half miles southeast of Oakdale. The interests of the place are practically given over to the cultivation of grain, in which Mr. Kearney has been very successful, making a place for himself among the enterprising ranchmen of the county. In his political convictions Mr. Kearney follows the example of his father and gives his support to the principles of the Democratic party. His father, Samuel Kearney, had served as school trustee for many years.

ANTONE LEONI. In every section of the west are evidences of the thrift and perseverance of men who have passed their childhood in the shadows of the Swiss Alps, and who, after crossing the Atlantic ocean, have developed remarkable loyalty to the country and institutions of their adoption. While all departments of activity seem to be within range of their varied powers of accomplishment, the pastoral life rests with comparative ease upon the shoulders of the sons of Switzerland, and especially are they at home in the development of vineyards and in the general science of horticulture. Antone Leoni belongs to this class of worthy citizens, and in his efforts to ally himself with the fruit-growing industry of Kings county has achieved a success worthy his industrious and painstaking methods.

It was while working on his father's farm in canton Ticino, Switzerland, that Mr. Leoni conceived the idea of coming to California, having heard much about its climate and natural advantages, and believing that it offered superior inducements. He was fifteen years of age when he set sail from European shores in 1875, having been born October 15, 1860. Arriving in San Francisco, he remained there for a time, working at the painter's trade, to which he had applied himself in his native land. December 18, 1875, he came to Kings county and for seven years worked on the ranch of his uncle near Grangeville, during that time laying by every dollar possible, until, in 1883, he found himself in a position to engage in independent farming. Moving to his present farm of eighty acres, three miles south of Hanford, he found a waving wheat-field, which he improved and set to general farming, in a few years setting out a small orchard. Each year he added to his orchard and decreased his general produce, until at present his entire farm is set out to grapes, peaches and apricots. He has ample facilities for caring for his fruit,

In 1896 Mr. Leoni was married to Sadie Lane, who was born and reared in California, and of this union one son has been born, Nelson Leoni. Mr. Leoni has never desired to specially identify himself with politics, and his vote has always been determined by his appreciation of the character and abilities of the candidate in question. He is highly respected by his fellow-horticulturists, and has made many warm friends since taking up his abode in this part of the state.

ELIHU B. BEARD. Until recently the name which heads this review was borne by a man who gave no little of a long and useful life to the pioneer cause of California, making his presence felt in agricultural, commercial and political circles of Stanislaus county and the city of Modesto, in the latter making his home from 1873 until his death in 1902. Following the inevitable course of the old pioneers he has passed away, but he shall be long revered in the hearts of those who are now enjoying the material aid which he gave to the county in the early days of its history.

A native of Indiana, Elihu B. Beard crossed the plains to California in 1850, arriving in the west with but $1 upon which to lay the foundation of that wealth which all expected to gain at that period in the history of the state. Like the great majority of people who sought the west at that time he engaged in mining for a while but later sought the more certain returns of a mercantile life. In 1853 he removed to Dry Creek and purchased a small ranch with the proceeds of his few years' work. This proved a successful venture and he later engaged in sheep raising, continuing to add to his land until, at his death, he owned seven thousand acres. On removing from his ranch he located first in San Jose, Santa Clara county, remaining, however, only a short time until coming to Modesto, where he gave his attention entirely to the interests of his large property and also loaned money. A Democrat in his political convictions he became a man of strong influence in political circles, as early as 1854 being elected assessor, in which capacity he continued for many years. Later in life he was elected to the state legislature, where he served two terms, his faithful support being given ever to the interests of his constituents. He was also surveyor for one term. Commercially he became much interested with the business life of Modesto, being connected with the banks of the city many years previous to his death. In religion he was a member of the Christian Church, though his father was a Quaker minister in Indiana, in which state the elder man's death occurred. Mr. Beard lived to be seventy-five years old, retaining his faculties and his helpfulness in the affairs of the community up to the time of his death.

In the fall of 1856 Mr. Beard was united in marriage with Annie E. Kennan, a native of Missouri. Her father, Thomas, was born in Kentucky and later in life engaged as a farmer in Boone county, Mo., in which state his death occurred while en route to California. In 1854 the mother, Nancy (Cave) Kennan, brought her children to California by ox-teams, the journey consuming six months. They located on the Tuolumne river, joining here her son, Thomas, who had previously crossed the plains and located in the state. To Mr. and Mrs. Beard were born the following children: Thomas K., who is located near Modesto (he married Grace Lewis, a daughter of Alfred Lewis and Diana (Brown) Lewis, and they are the parents of ten children who are all living); Alice F., in the Sandwich Islands, where she conducts an orphan school; William; Annie; Frank C.; Ida S. and John, the five last named being deceased, the last having died in infancy. Mrs. Beard has a pleasant and comfortable home in this city where she has lived for so many years, like her husband a familiar figure in the social life of the place. Like him, also, she is a member of the Christian Church and is active in religious work. Many donations have been made to various interests of the state by those who bear this name, and it is one which will long be remembered among those who best appreciate the devotion and self-sacrifice of those who laid the foundation for the greatness of this western statehood.

FRANK HICKMAN. For a number of years past Mr. Hickman has been faithfully discharging the duties of the federal office of postmaster, at Hanford, Kings county, Cal. He was appointed to this office by President McKinley, and reappointed January 31, 1902, by President Roosevelt. This office belongs to the second class postoffices and Mr. Hickman employs as his assistants four clerks and four rural mail carriers, besides three city deliverers; the gross receipts for 1903 being $12,000.

It was in the city of Clarksburg, W. Va., that Mr. Hickman was born, a descendant from an old southern family. His father, J. W. Hickman, is a native of the same state, where he still lives, residing on a farm. It was upon this identical farm that the boyhood days of Frank Hickman were spent, and, like other boys, he attended the common schools of his locality. Upon reaching his majority, in 1892 he went west to join a brother, who is now manager of the First National Bank at Hanford, in Kings county. During the summer Mr. Hickman worked with his brother in the bank and in November of the same year he entered the business college at Santa Cruz, from which he graduated in June, 1893.

Returning to Hanford he accepted a position as freight agent for the Southern Pacific Railway Company and filled this position in a satisfactory manner for six months. He then resigned to accept a more lucrative position as bookkeeper for Mr. Overman, with whom he remained two years. He next clerked six months in a clothing store and about that time his services were sought by the Mill & Electric Light Company and he officiated as bookkeeper for this company until July, 1897, when he resigned and went east on a vacation. He was subsequently appointed postmaster as previously mentioned and upon his return to California he assumed the duties of this office, and by his genial politeness he has won a large circle of friends. By his marriage, in May, 1903, Mr. Hickman wedded Annie Harris, formerly of Montana, and they occupy a high position socially. In fraternal circles, Mr. Hickman is allied with Lodge No. 104, K. of P.; Hanford Lodge No. 270, F. & A. M., and Hanford Chapter No. 74, R. A. M., all of Hanford. As may be inferred, Mr. Hickman is a Republican in his political preferences.

CHARLES F. PRECIADO. During the nineteenth century a Castilian, representative of an ancient family of Spain, crossed the ocean to America and settled in the western part of Mexico, where he acquired large mining interests in Sonora. His son, Y. Preciado, was born at Hermosillo, Sonora, Mexico, and at the age of eighteen years, during the excitement caused by the discovery of gold in California, crossed the desert in 1848 and was one of the first to try his luck in the placer mines of San Andreas, Calaveras county. Not meeting with the fortune he had hoped for, he sought other occupations and drifted into the stock business in Inyo county, where he was living at the time of the earthquake. Some years afterward he returned to Calaveras county, thence removed to Madera county, from there went to Fresno county, and in 1879 settled on a farm near Borden, Madera county, where he spent the remainder of his active years. Upon retiring from agricultural labors he came to Madera, where he now makes his home. Not only among people of his own nationality resident here, but among Americans as well, he is held in high esteem as an honorable citizen and one of the very oldest surviving settlers of California. After coming to this state he married Adilda Moraga, who was born in Calaveras county, and is a daughter of the late

Carlos Moraga, a Spaniard who was attracted to this country by the discovery of gold.

In the family of Y. and Adilda Preciado there are twelve children, namely: Albert E., who represents the Singer Sewing Machine Company in Madera; Rudolph R., who is a partner of his brother, the subject of this narrative; Ygnacio V., who follows the barber's trade in Madera; Alexander F., an artist living in Madera; Mrs. Lucy Cosgrove, of Madera; Carmelita, who is engaged in the millinery business in Madera; Charles F., also of Madera; Ida, who clerks for her brothers in their store in Madera; Benjamin W., who is a partner of his two brothers in the book and stationery business; Abram, Lita and Henry, who reside with their parents. It is somewhat unusual that all of the members of so large a family are still living and all remain in the town where their parents are passing their advanced years.

The seventh in order of birth among the twelve children was Charles F. Preciado, who was born at San Andreas, October 24, 1878, and passed the years of youth in Borden and Madera, alternating work on the home farm in summers with attendance at the common schools in the winter months. When seventeen years of age he laid the foundation of his present business by forming a partnership with his brother, Rudolph R., and opening a fruit, confectionery and cigar store on Yosemite avenue, Madera, in 1895. The two had a combined capital of $17. Naturally their beginning was a very humble one. A hole in the wall, 4x8 feet in dimensions, sufficed to hold their stock of goods. In a year they had outgrown those humble quarters and by 1898 they had leased the entire store. The firm of C. F. Preciado & Co. was beginning to be recognized as a growing one. Since then they have steadily pushed their way to a position among the successful business men of their town. They feel a just pride in the fact that no bookstore in the entire county is larger or more complete than theirs. A full supply of county school books is kept on hand, also the latest and most popular novels, a varied assortment of stationery, novelty goods for holiday sale, cigars of the best brands, confectionery, etc. In addition, the brothers are the exclusive agents in Madera for the San Francisco and other important daily papers. To meet the demands of their growing business, it was recently deemed advisable to build a gallery around the first floor, thus giving them practically two stories.

Rearing in the Democratic faith, politically Charles F. Preciado has always been a pronounced believer in the principles of that party. When he reached the age of twenty-one years he was appointed secretary of the Democratic county central committee and held that position for two terms. In 1902, as the Democratic candidate, he was elected county tax collector by a majority of one hundred and fifty, and in January of 1903 took the oath of office for a term of four years. While giving his attention to official work, his brothers maintain a close supervision over the business, thus relieving him of much detail work. He is a member of the Madera Chamber of Commerce and a contributor to movements for the benefit of the town. Included in his fraternal relations are associations with the Knights of Pythias, Woodmen of the World and the Ancient Order of United Workmen, in which he is past master workman. On the organization of Madera Parlor No. 130, N. S. G. W., he became a charter member and at this writing acts as president of the local body, besides which in 1892 he was honored with the office of deputy grand president of this district.

WILLIAM C. TIGHE. As an example of the opportunities offered by central California to young men of ambition, intelligence and tireless energy, the business career of William C. Tighe furnishes a fitting illustration. When he came to the town of Madera, which has been his home and the scene of his commercial activities since 1891, he had a very limited amount of capital and he lacked also the prestige given by experience and influence. In compensation for these disadvantages he possessed force of character and determination, decision of purpose and high principles of honor, together with that optimistic faith in the future which is one of the endowments of youth.

Not only by education, but also by birth as well, Mr. Tighe is a Californian, for he is a native of Oakland, Alameda county, born January 5, 1868. His grandfather, J. W. Tighe, a native of Ireland, followed the butcher's trade in London, England, where J. W., Jr., was born. After some years in that city he brought the family to California via Panama and engaged in business as butcher in Oakland. The same trade was followed by his son, J. W., Jr., who opened a meat market at what is now East Oakland. Later, however, he turned his attention to other forms of activity. For a time he operated in the mines of California and Nevada. From the west he removed to Howe, Grayson county, Tex., where he conducted a hardware store and also acted as postmaster. His death occurred in that village when he was fifty-two years of age. During his residence in California he married Maria Henry, who was born in Boston and died in Oakland.

The only child of J. W. Tighe, Jr., and Maria, his wife, was William C. Tighe, who was reared in his native city of Oakland and attended the local grammar schools. When thirteen years of age he began to clerk in a men's furnishing goods store on Broadway, between Seventh and Eighth streets, Oakland, where he acquired a thorough knowledge of that business and excelled in his ability as a salesman. Seeking an opening for himself, he resigned there and went to Fresno in 1891, but during the same year proceeded to Madera as offering, in his opinion, a better opening for a man with small capital. With a partner, under the title of Harris & Company, he opened a store in a small frame house occupying the present site of the postoffice. Here a small stock of men's furnishing goods was placed on sale. Reasonable prices and courteous treatment of all won and retained customers. On assuming the entire management of the business, in the spring of 1893, Mr. Tighe leased a room occupying a part of his present location, and to this he has added from time to time until the building is now 100x50 feet in dimensions, with four entrances. Conducted as a department store, the business is the largest of its kind in Madera county. A full and complete assortment is kept in stock of men's furnishing goods, clothing, hats and caps, boots and shoes, dry goods, notions and ladies' tailor-made goods. The equipment is thoroughly up-to-date in every respect. In 1901 the Tighe-Breyfogle Company was incorporated, with Mr. Tighe as president, and the business has since been conducted under that title. He is a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen, and through his membership in the Madera Chamber of Commerce he has done much to promote the material growth and commercial prosperity of his home city. He is thoroughly alive to the importance of movements tending to promote the standing of California as a member of the great galaxy of states comprising our nation.

JOHN Z. WILLIAMS. With the customary zeal of an intelligent cultivator, Mr. Williams, in his efforts as a fruit grower and more especially as a raisin grower, has been amply repaid for his industry, and no more productive fruit farm of its size than his is to be found in the whole of Fresno county. Born in Iowa, January 18, 1852, he is a son of Henry and Harriett (Long) Williams, both parents being natives of Tennessee. The father, who was a life-long farmer, in the early days located in Indiana, but a couple of years later went to Iowa, where he lived until 1868. Subsequently he located in Missouri, and it was there that his death occurred in 1886, when in his seventy-sixth year.

John Z. Williams was seventeen years old when the family moved to Missouri. He assisted his father in farm pursuits until the latter's death, and two years afterward, in 1888, he left that section of the country for a home in California. Being short of capital, soon after his arrival in California, he rented land in the vicinity of Selma, but two years later was enabled to purchase land and this has been his home ever since. His farm contains thirty-five acres of choice land and is devoted wholly to the raising of fruit and raisins. It is located seven miles from Selma, in Rosedale school district, being five miles south-east of Sanger.

The marriage of Mr. Williams, in Missouri, united him with Miss Lydia Elder, a native of that state. They have reared a family of five children, the two youngest being still at home. The others own ranches in Fresno county and as successful and prominent citizens all reflect great credit on their parents. These children are Mrs. Lena Donner, James L., Robert M., John H. and Lula. Although not an active politician, nor an aspirant to office, Mr. Williams is a faithful adherent of Republican principles and does a great deal of good in a quiet way.

PHILIP BEDESEN. For nearly thirty years Philip Bedesen has been a resident of Merced, Merced county, and during that time has been actively identified with its mercantile interests as proprietor of a meat market, having been one of the original members of the firm of Banks & Bedesen, established here in 1875. He has had a varied experience in life, coming from a foreign country to the United States when a boy; subsequently driving teams across the plains when danger from Indians or wild beasts beset every traveler; mining in Colorado in the days of rough experiences and settling in California in pioneer times, when hardships and privations had of necessity to be endured. In the various places where he has lived and worked, Mr. Bedesen has always been regarded as a man of integrity and honor, and in the community where he now resides, and to whose advancement and prosperity he is ever ready to lead a helping hand, he is held in great respect. A native of Germany, he was born, March 15, 1843, in Rhenish Prussia, near Trier, which was also the birthplace of his parents, John and Angeline (Staden) Bedesen. His father died in his native land when Philip was but a small child, leaving three children, of whom two are living. His mother married in Germany for her second husband, Peter Lux, and with her son and daughter they immigrated to America, and settled in Aurora, Ill.

Coming with his mother to Aurora, Ill., when thirteen years old, Philip Bedesen worked as a farm laborer in that locality for about four years. In 1861 he went to Pike's Peak, making the journey with mule-teams. Locating in Central City, he was employed throughout the summer in hauling wood from the top of Bald mountain to Nevada, after which he was employed as a driver in a freighter's train, driving a team composed of three yoke of oxen through a country in which the Indians were troublesome. Going to St. Joseph, Mo., in the fall of 1862, he remained there six weeks, and then hired out as a teamster, and drove a mule-team to Denver. Proceeding directly to Black Hawk, Mr. Bedesen worked in the Gregory mines for a couple of months, and then went with ox-teams to Virginia City, Mont., to try his luck in the new mines, known as the Grasshopper mines, and was engaged for a time in placer mining. Becoming acquainted while there with John Banks, a butcher by trade, the two men formed a partnership, and, under the firm name of Banks & Bedesen, opened a butcher shop in Virginia City, it being the second shop of the kind established in that vicinity. This enterprising firm subsequently opened another shop in Central City, and for awhile ran both markets, till selling out the Virginia City market, and later, in the fall of 1865, selling the other. In the meantime, Messrs. Banks & Bedesen had accumulated considerable wealth, having forty pounds of gold dust in their possession after selling out. Concealing this in buckskin sacks, placed either in their pockets or around their waists, they started east, traveling with their own horse and mule teams in a train composed of eight wagons, as far as Nebraska City, where they took a steamer for St. Joseph. From there they went by rail to Philadelphia, Pa., taking their gold dust to the mint, where it was made into coin, which they sold at a premium. After visiting for a time in Aurora, Ill., Messrs. Banks and Bedesen continued their journey westward to Missouri, locating in Daviess county, Mo., where, in partnership, they purchased four hundred acres of land, and were engaged in farming and stock-raising until 1875.

Disposing of their land in that year, they migrated to California, and selecting Merced as a favorable location, opened a meat market, the third one established in the city, and operated it together until the death of Mr. Banks, in 1898. They built a slaughter house on the creek, and also engaged to some extent in farming, owning forty acres of land in the Ash colony, which they devoted to the raising of sweet potatoes, and also raised grain on two hundred acres of land which they rented. Since the death of his partner, Mr. Bedesen has continued the business alone, meeting with marked success.

In 1865, in St. Joseph, Mo., Mr. Bedesen married Elizabeth Stuber, a native of Switzerland, and into their household thus established, nine children have been born, namely: Lizzie, married to John Peak, of Merced; Emma, wife of Judge W. M. Conley, of Madera; Gussie, married to

W. H. McEleg

Frank Ralston, and died in Merced; Charles, died in Merced; Burt, in business with his father; Frank, died in childhood; Frederick, a clerk in Merced; Mary, at home; and William, a student in the University of California. Politically Mr. Bedesen is a Democrat, and fraternally he is a member and ex-treasurer of the Ancient Order of Druids.

WILLIAM H. McELROY. Noteworthy among the prosperous and enterprising business men of Merced is W. H. McElroy, a well known contractor and builder of the city. Industrious, energetic and keen-witted, he has taken advantage of every opportunity offered for bettering his financial condition, and has had his full share of work as a contractor, his abilities being recognized and appreciated. He is also actively identified with one of the leading manufacturing industries of this locality, being proprietor of the Merced brick yards, located about a mile north of the city. Here he manufactures brick of a superior quality, using crude oil in burning them and has a large trade in this line of business, his manufactures being readily disposed of in the home market. A son of David McElroy, he was born, March 11, 1866, in Keokuk, Iowa. His grandfather, Thomas McElroy, was born and reared in Scotland, but removed when a young man to Ireland, settling in county Armagh, where he spent his remaining days.

A native of Armagh, Ireland, David McElroy was brought up on a farm. In his youthful days he learned the trade of a civil engineer and surveyor, and afterward worked as a railroad constructor in the old country. Immigrating to the United States, he settled first in Cincinnati, Ohio, as a merchant, and later was similarly employed in Keokuk, Iowa. Removing thence to Ringgold county, Iowa, he carried on general farming there for several years, and then removed to Fresno, Cal., where he resided until his death, in 1894, at the age of seventy-seven years. He married Jane Bell, who was born in the north of Ireland, and came to this country with her father, Adam Bell, and settled on an Iowa farm. She died in Iowa in early womanhood, in 1870. Of the four children born of their union, three are living, namely: Mrs. Elizabeth Vincent, of Iowa; Ruth, wife of Dr. G. L. Lang, of Fresno, Cal.; and W. H., of this review.

Reared on a farm in Ringgold county, Iowa, W. H. McElroy acquired a practical education in the district schools. Leaving home at the age of seventeen years, he served an apprenticeship of three years at the carpenter's trade. Entering then the employ of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railroad Company, he worked in eastern Iowa and Missouri, in the bridge department, and subsequently became foreman of bridge construction, having headquarters in Eldon, Iowa. Migrating to California in 1888, Mr. McElroy worked at his trade in Merced one summer, and then followed carpentering in Fresno for a year. Returning to Merced in the fall of 1889, he has since resided here, with the exception of a short time when he was foreman of work in Santa Rosa and Santa Cruz. Starting in business for himself as a contractor and builder in 1892, Mr. McElroy has filled contracts of all kinds, being kept busily employed at all times. He has erected many of the finest residences and business houses of the city and county, has built sewers and bridges, and taken contracts for paving, his work at all times giving satisfaction, being well and promptly done. He built the Merced county jail, and erected among others the Pednera, Barcroft and Smith Estate buildings.

Mr. McElroy married, in Merced, Rena Vincent, a native of Iowa, and they have two children, Helen and David. Mr. McElroy is a member of the Builders' Exchange of Fresno, and belongs to the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and to the Woodmen of the World. Politically he gives his cordial support to the Republican party. Religiously he is a member of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church.

ERNEST VOLQUARDS. Three miles southwest of Visalia, Tulare county, is located the ranch of Ernest Volquards, who is named among the enterprising ranchers of this section. He is a native son of California, having been born in San Francisco January 4, 1869, his father, Ernest Volquards, Sr., having emigrated from his birthplace in Schleswig-Holstein, Germany, in 1853. The elder man was a sailor in occupation, following this line of work from the time he was sixteen years of age until his retirement in San Francisco. This was in 1862, when he returned to California as first mate. He spent three years in mining in Placer county. His death occurred in his adopted state in 1898, in the home of his son. He is survived by his wife, formerly Erasmie Jensen, a native likewise of Schleswig-Holstein, Germany, and who now makes her home with her son. They became the parents of three sons and one daughter, of whom two sons and the daughter are now living.

The oldest child in his father's family, Ernest Volquards, Jr., was reared in San Francisco, receiving his education in the public schools of that city. Upon attaining maturity he engaged as an employe in a nursery, raising stock for four years. In 1886 he went to Fresno county and was employed in the Faucher Creek nursery for the period of five years. At the end of that time he removed to Tulare county and near Visalia bought his present property, which consists of forty acres of land under a high state of cultivation. This entire property is devoted to the raising of fruit; peaches and prunes occupying the greater part of his attention. One acre is devoted to nursery stock, principally peaches. In 1899 he further improved his property by erecting a beautiful residence.

In San Francisco Mr. Volquards was united in marriage with Emily Quedens, a native of that city, who died in Pasadena in 1900 while there for the benefit of her health. Fraternaly Mr. Volquards is associated with the Native Sons of the Golden West, being a member of Visalia Parlor No. 19, of which he is now serving as the second vice-president, and in which he has passed all the chairs. Politically he is independent in his views, reserving the right to cast his ballot for the man whom he considers best qualified for public office.

HARVEY J. OSTRANDER. Prominent among the pioneer settlers of Merced county is Harvey J. Ostrander, who for more than half a century has been a resident of Merced, and one of its most respected and valued citizens. In the development of the agricultural, manufacturing and mercantile interests, he has been an active and influential force. Full of vim and energy as a young man, he was among the foremost in establishing beneficial enterprises in the county, and has the distinction of having brought the first steam flouring mill to Merced county; of being the first to improve the land by irrigation; of sowing the first alfalfa seed in this region; and of being the pioneer orchardist and vineyardist of Merced county. The story of his early life reads more like a tale of romance than like the history of a plain, matter-of-fact agriculturist, being filled with thrilling incidents and interesting facts, connected with the early settlement of the state. A son of Alexander Ostrander, Jr., he was born, October 7, 1825, in Madison county, N. Y., of Holland-Dutch ancestry, being a lineal descendant of one Von Ostrander who emigrated from Holland in 1666 and settled in New York state. His grandfather, Alexander Ostrander, Sr., a native of Washington county, N. Y., served as an Indian scout during the Revolutionary war, and afterward settled as a farmer in Madison county, N. Y., where the Ostrander families removed after the war of 1812.

Alexander Ostrander, Jr., was born in Washington county, N. Y., but settled in Madison county with the other members of the families. He was engaged in various business enterprises, owning a good farm, contracting and superintending large business enterprises. Inheriting the patriotic virtues of his ancestors, he served in the war of 1812. He married Mary Annis, who was born of Scotch-Irish ancestors in New York state, being the daughter of an Indian scout during the Revolutionary war. She bore him thirteen children, of whom Harvey J., the subject of this sketch, was the youngest child, and is the only survivor.

Educated in the district schools, and well trained in the arts and science of agriculture by his father, Harvey J. Ostrander remained at home during the days of his boyhood and youth, completing his studies in the village academy. Going west in 1845, he made several trips as a boatman on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, and afterward spent a number of months in Wisconsin. Returning from there to New York, he remained in his native state until 1849, when he joined the gold-seekers, starting for the extreme western part of the continent in search of fortune. He came by boat to the mouth of the Rio Grande river, and thence up that waterway to within eighteen miles of Camargo, Mexico, where the boat ran aground and he had to help unload the goods, standing waist-deep in water. He then hired a man to take his personal effects, with those of some of his fellow-passengers, to Monterey, but that man dying of cholera, he hired another.

With eight of his companions, Mr. Ostrander purchased nine mules, one for each, and started across the country for Mazatlan. At Rhinaldo pass the company met some freighters camping. On the way out their guide, McNab, killed one of the party, a young doctor. At Mazatlan the company embarked on a schooner bound for San Francisco, on which there were many other passengers bound for the same point. When forty days out they made the captain land them, having been on short rations (one pint of water for cooking and drinking per day) for two weeks, disembarking about three hundred miles south of San Diego. Continuing the journey on foot, the party came on the third day to a spring around which there was about an acre of grass, on which a Mexican pack train had left a horse whose back was too sore to travel, and this proved a blessing to the almost discouraged travelers, who at once killed the animal for food. Mr. Ostrander and two of his companions walked on, traveling until ten o'clock that night, when they made a camp, built a fire of sage brush and cooked their horse meat, to him the sweetest morsel he had ever eaten. On the fourth day they traveled until sundown, when arriving at a dry creek at night, they dug down beside a big rock for about twenty inches, and to their joy found water. This day was one of the most trying he ever experienced, the heat being intense. Arriving at El Rosario, a small hamlet of six or eight houses, on the fifth morning, they were given food, consisting of a bowl of soup and meat from a beef's head roasted in the ground. The Mexicans fetched provisions back to the remainder of the party, being induced to do so by reason of the company's equipments, which were exceptionally good, consisting of blankets and clothing, no longer needed after they had crossed the first range of mountains. One of the men left at the spring had died from hunger and exposure.

From El Rosario Mr. Ostrander came as far as San Diego on horseback, having been able to purchase a horse near El Rosario, where he sold his animal. Walking thence to Los Angeles, he and his partner bought horses, each paying $10 apiece for them. Mr. Ostrander's proved to be unbroken and bucked badly, but as he was a born horseman, and could ride any kind of an animal, he succeeded in conquering the bucking horse, although he was thrown several times. At San Luis Obispo the partners sold their horses, and with one pack-horse between them walked to the mines in Tuolumne county, going via Monterey and Stockton. At the latter place they bought a supply of ham and crackers, and borrowing a pan and shovel engaged in placer mining on the Tuolumne river. Mr. Ostrander bought a rocker made from a shoe box, giving $6 for it, and made enough in a week to pay for all of his purchases, including overalls, shirts and provisions. He and his partner met with losses and reverses, but made a great deal of money, also. In 1849 they accumulated much gold on Indian bar, but lost it the following year by becoming interested in companies to erect dams at Rogers, Indian and Hawkins bars, to turn the waters from their natural beds, the price of labor being $8 per day. The dams were all swept away by the high waters that prevailed in September of that year. Mr. Ostrander succeeded in mining at the latter bar only, where in ten days he washed out $3,000. Always in search of something better, Mr. Ostrander and his partner went to Mariposa county, but were not at all successful there, and after wasting a month's time returned to the Tuolumne diggings, at which time they became interested in the above enterprises. Had he and his partner continued mining they would doubtless have made money, but they opened a store and by trusting the miners soon lost all their capital.

Disgusted with his ill luck, Mr. Ostrander came to the Merced river in the fall of 1850, took in another partner, and for two years was profitably employed in buying and selling beef cattle. Buying a steam flour mill in Stockton in 1853, he removed it to the Merced river, and here put up the first mill south of Stockton. He afterward sold both mill and lands. He assisted in building the first water mill in this locality, was the first to irrigate, set out the first orchard and vineyard, and sowed the first alfalfa seed, raising a crop which he at first found hard work to dispose of, but which, during the drought of 1864, he sold for from $40 to $60 a ton. Ever since that time Mr. Ostrander has been prosperously engaged in agricultural pursuits, including general farming and stock raising, and was the first man to use the mountain ranges for summer pastures for sheep, taking a flock to the Yosemite ranges as early as 1862. He is now paying especial attention to raising sheep, having four thousand head in Merced and Fresno counties. He was the first president of the Farmers' Canal Company, known afterward as the Crocker-Huffman Canal Company, the first large irrigation company in the state.
